I was in town during that period, though merely as a private spectator, and it seemed to me that the true position and the only safe policy of the bank was this. The new administration of the government of the United States will find itself, on the 4th of March, with very small funds, and its policy will be, it is possible, not to encounter at once the debatable question of a national bank, whatever may be its disposition heretofore. If, then, the bank to the United States is in a position to do the public business temporarily, it will, from its extensive connections throughout the union, be more useful than any other existing institution, and thus may gradually become one of the fiscal agents. To accomplish this, it must be in a situation of strength on the 4th of March, 1841, and should reserve its powers for that day. Hitherto the banks believed that they had no real standing against an administration of public affairs, and that the interests with which banks are most connected. A great political change has taken place, but the effects of it on the public interests cannot be seen till the new men come into power. We then, for that moment, see what the new administration intends to do for the country, what relief it means to afford, and then, concurring with its measures, you may resume permanently. Until then the Bank of the United States was not objectionable to me. The legislature had declared of all the banks, that if they did not resume on a given day, their charters were liable to forfeiture, but that did not affect the bank of the United States. When the charter of that institution was passing through the legislature, the provisions, common to all the other banks authorizing the legislature to alter or repeal it at pleasure, was inserted. But I then declared that I would not receive it on such terms, and when, for that reason, the bill was not passed, the legislature was stricken out, the bill did not go on further. Accordingly it was stricken out, and when this very question, whether the legislature had a right to declare a forfeiture for the non-payment of specie, was recently brought before the legislature, it was unanimously decided against the power of the legislature on the very ground of this rejection of the clause.

The legislature, it is true, had fixed the 13th of January as a day of resumption. But that day was then so fixed because they were in session, and had said that the banks should all resume—that the legislature was much more in the power of the banks than the banks were in the power of the legislature. How easy was it for the banks to say to the governor, you want to borrow $500,000; the state breaks on the 1st of February unless you can borrow it; you can borrow it only from us; and it we lend to you and resume specie payments, we inevitably break ourselves. And so they said. They authorized a suspension beyond the 13th of January, and we will protect you on the 1st of February. This would have been wise and easy. But, instead of this course, the banks resumed, and the $500,000, and then broke down immediately.

Believing the resumption unnecessary, as well as inexpedient, I think that all the borrowings of the bank, both at home and abroad, for the purpose of resumption, were very unnecessary. They complicated the affairs of the bank, they embarrassed the other banks, and were at last wholly ineffectual.

One of the reasons which made them ineffectual was the publication of the report of the 1st of January, 1841, giving a particular list of its assets without the means of estimating them, and calculated to inspire doubt and suspicion of its solvency. In fact, just on the eve of attempting to resume specie payments, a statement of the bank was put forth which made every body believe that the bank could not resume permanently, and induced the creditors to come immediately for their money before it was too late.

These counsels I could offer only as private citizens. I did I occupied the position I once did, I most certainly would not have permitted that resumption, and, though it may seem rash to say so, I have not the least doubt that but for that act of insubordination the city would have spared the sufferings of the last two months, the bank would at this day have been strong and safe, that it would have obtained a large portion of such government business as was done by banks, and that its stockholders, instead of deploring as they now do, its prostration, would have found its condition prosperous, and its stock worth five times as much as it now is.

I began by saying that I would prove that the bank, when it left it, was strong and prosperous, and that its present prostration cannot in the remotest way be ascribed to me. Do you not think I have proved it? With great esteem, yours,

N. BIDDLE.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL

On Thursday, January 23, 1841.

The pre-emption bill being again under consideration, Mr. CATTELDEN rose to renew in the senate the motion he had made in committee of the whole to recommit the bill with the following instructions: Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee on public lands, with instructions to report amendments thereto to the following effect:

1st. To distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states of the union in just and equitable proportions.

2. To grant to actual bona fide settlers upon the public lands the right of pre-emption to any quantity thereof not exceeding one-half section, or 320 acres, including place of settlement, at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, with such provisions as shall limit this right of settlement and pre-emption to actual bona fide settlers whose estate at the time of settlement shall not exceed the value of $10,000; and to exclude the wealthier speculators from benefiting under this law, and shall prevent them from interfering with, or participating in, the privileges and right of settlement and pre-emption which are hereby granted and intended for the sole advantage of the needy and honest settlers and cultivators of the soil.

My object, (said Mr. C.) in making this motion was merely to obtain a fair and full expression of the sense of the senate on an interesting and important measure. I had little hope that any thing that I might say would cause a majority of this body to adopt that measure. I had no such ambitious thought or purpose. Indeed, we cannot, at present, have even a full expression of what the senate of Virginia and another in the state of Massachusetts have within a few days been filled, although the senators elect have not yet had time to arrive. This is Thursday; by Monday next we may anticipate a full vote. Without any other purpose than to obtain such an expression, I shall submit a motion that the subject be postponed till Monday. I think that when the importance of the subject is considered, such a motion will be as well to be reasonable. A few days cannot affect the destiny of the bill in the other branch of the legislature; and if gentlemen will but consent to wait till Monday, when that day arrives they shall have my aid in obtaining the speediest practicable action on the bill.

Mr. C. said he was far from the further consideration of the bill till Monday.

Mr. CLAY, (of Ala.) said he should be reluctant to refuse the request of the honorable senator, if there was the least probability that this postponement would be in favor of the bill. The senator had reminded gentlemen that two new members of the body would shortly take their seats; but what chance would this occasion in the vote upon the bill? The senator, elect from Massachusetts, (Mr. BATES), might be in favor of the distribution, but the senator expected from Virginia had again and again voted against that measure on constitutional grounds. Unless, therefore, the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CHITTENDEN), expected to be influential in the senate, no such change of opinion in the senate, the postponement would produce no effect on the ultimate fate of the bill. The vote ordering it to its engrossment clearly indicated a purpose in the senate that the bill should pass, and the courteous objection against postponement was that it might go too late to the other house to receive legislative action there during the present session of congress. The bill was of the greatest importance to the interest of the west, and the general goal was, so far as the vote was concerned, he could not yield his consent to the postponement.

Mr. CHITTENDEN said it was not his object to occupy time in pressing the motion he had made. The senator's remarks on the bill were but, while there were 22 members of the senate. Two senators were absent. He therefore did not see how the vote given in committee was to be considered as so very decisive. The senator from Alabama had presented the bill, and from Virginia, he was already committed on the subject of distribution; but it was to be remembered that the question in its present form, viz: as connecting distribution with pre-emption, had never yet been presented to that body. It was a new question, and it was, as a very strange, for any gentleman who could vote to distribute the surplus revenue in the treasury might vote to distribute the proceeds of the public lands without any great struggle of conscience.

It is easily seen, therefore, that from Virginia, the difficulty. Mr. C. had no knowledge as to what his sentiments at present were, but this he knew, that the gentleman in question was abundantly capable of judging on this and other questions for himself. Should both the electors from Virginia and Alabama, his proposition, their votes alone would produce a tie.

But, (said Mr. C.) there is another objection urged against postponement by the senator from Alabama, which may well render us cautious how we press this measure too hastily through the senate. The object in pushing the bill is, that it may be in time to receive a discussion in the other branch of congress. Thus, in the expiring moments of a rejected administration, a measure of this importance is to be agitated, when we all know that the people have recently made great changes in both branches of the legislature—changes abundantly sufficient to alter the majority on the subject of this bill; yet a majority here, composed of men who have just been elected of the people, goes to become a minority, insist upon action, and are bent on rushing the bill through the senate even before those entitled to vote on it can get to their seats.

The case, he said, would be one of great importance to the west; be it so; yet those gentlemen who are to come into congress will be as capable of judging on that importance as we, besides possessing the additional advantage of bringing with them the last decision of the people of the United States. It is the sole and rightful proprietors of the public domain.

Mr. BENTON. This is certainly a very strange proposition. In a measure of a character so entirely its own the subject of pre-emption, it is strange to have refused to join it with its twin measure, viz: the graduation bill, allowing each to stand upon its own merits. In this state of things, gentlemen on the other side of the chamber are to stand down the pre-emption bill with a subject entirely unconnected with it. The bill has been delayed nearly an entire month by propositions to distribute the proceeds of the land and to cede the land itself. It is a new debate on a subject long since decided. It has involved a great deal of the people, and it is to be set aside, and, but unparliamentary, to bring in matter not germane to the bill, and by debating this to overtake the original measure. I hold this to be unparliamentary.

tribution was regulated under the confederation. The laws providing for contributions to the public expenditure are now entirely different; yet the contract remains as it was, and in all its force. These lands were vested for a particular purpose, and you are constituted the trustee; you are bound to continue your management of them as trustee; you cannot transfer your trust to another, any more than you can delegate any other of your constitutional you can designate any other person or persons and your contract under them, are laws and constitution to you on this subject. The question is a question of contract; the money arising from these lands is but as a drop in the federal bucket; and the question is whether it is just that the federal government should be relieved of the necessities of the treasury by the states. I think it is not just. It is not just that any reason that the states are to be deprived of that which is their due? Certainly not. We have ample sources of revenue; the states are given ample powers to raise revenue; and reasonable tax upon articles of luxury we can obtain an ample revenue; and we have no right to forbear imposing any duty in order to withhold from the states their due. You cannot, in order to relieve the federal government of its burden, take from the states their due. It is not just to you. If there ever was a measure of public policy which commands the universal approbation and support of the people, it is this. Where can another be pointed out which unites so many evidences of the popular will? Where can there be found a measure so generally approved by the communications of a few interested senators here? No. Unless we are determined to be deaf to the public voice which has made itself so audible to all the rest of the world, we certainly shall not be able to resist the voice of our countrymen, imposing too high an obligation on us to be nullified by the terms "unconsrns", "absurd", or "enormous." As to Pennsylvania, she has not merely expressed herself in favor of distribution, but she has denounced the idea of prospective pre-emption also.

Certainly ought to be the poor man's friend; if it were only out of sympathy, I ought to feel for him, and I do. I wish him to get his land and hold it free from all taxes, and I wish him to ask the minimum price which he pays for it may go to the states to whom it belongs. Let us give to others their due, and then let us provide for ourselves if we can. It would be better to have the people pay for their land, and let us have them to put their hand upon the people for what they want; the people would be the more apt to attend to the manner in which their money is expended. We have seen the influence of the silent majority in the election of 1860, and the election of 1864. In one single year the government received over twenty millions of dollars from this source alone, and this with the other receipts from the customs accumulated a surplus in the treasury of $100,000,000. What has become of it? Have we anything to show for it? What has become of so much of it as went into the states? Can you show the roads which have been made; the canals which have been built; the railroads which have been cleared out; the ships of war that have been built; the fortifications which have been erected? It is true that something has been done by the states, and they can account for some of the money they have; you have you, the general government, to show for all the vast amount of treasure you have expended! What great public work remains as the monument of this administration? Their hundred millions of dollars which you have had in your coffers! Your redoubtable scheme of a sub treasury has been condemned by twelve hundred thousand voters. A part of the hundred millions of dollars the money is now what have they got? Part of this was delivered to you from the public domain; you insist on retaining this source of income as being the most competent authority to do with it hereafter, and from the past I am justified in inferring the future. The worthy senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) insists that there has been no extravagance in your expenditure, that you have not taken a cent from the treasury to sustain the charge; he might as well deny the Allegheny was a mountain, and challenge us to put our fingers on a single spot that was a mountain. He is a man of great intelligence, and I regret that his honorable attitude is absent.

I am glad to see him in his place, and I now tell him that Mr. Van Buren has spent in four years a hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars. What has he done with it? I ask the senator from Pennsylvania what he has done with it? He tells me to give him items. Why, twelve hundred thousand people—yes, two millions of them—cannot get food in a table and look into items, and cipher out the particulars of a long account of expense; the people must look at great results—they look at aggregates—they inquire for totals. And what do they learn? That one hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars have been expended in the management of the war by this administration. It is a large sum; and what are the results? How has it been spent? How much of it can they find in roads and canals? How much in the improvement of the harbors? How much in the obstructions in harbors? In constructing military roads along our frontier; establishing posts; erecting fortifications? In repairing and building ships? In arming our forts and protecting our maritime and inland commerce? How much in the purchase of peace or war? Out of your one hundred and thirty-five millions only seven millions in all. And the two millions appropriated before, and you have the residue of the war. How much of it is gone? Of the rest, what remains? It has left no trace, no shadow on the land. Yet this is not extravagance! The president is a very great friend of economy; yet he has expended more than thirty-five millions of dollars in the management of the war. And this has not been the results. May I not throw on him the burden of showing what has been done with such a sum of money—especially when we do know that this country has been able to do more than any other? Twelve years ago an administration was turned out of power as extravagant, which expended but thirteen millions a year. It was cried down as a most prodigal administration. Well, the same course was pursued by the next administration. It was the same policy pursued in their hands, and their rate of expenditure, instead of thirteen millions, was thirty-one millions. And yet, here, the senator says I must give you the results. I will call it but extravagance, but put your finger on a single item of extravagance." Well: I have not made much minute calculation about the particulars, but even a general and superficial observation enables me to accept the senator's statement. I have not time to do more. I think there has been some little extravagance in the management of the Florida war. What sort of an arrangement was it, in point of economy, to resort to the use of the militia? It was a most wasteful and extravagant use of the militia. It was the extravagance of the peninsula of Florida against a remnant of some five or six hundred Indians, while volunteers might be had at any time from Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi, all of whom would have been glad to have fought in the remote region of Clay county, on the Missouri river, to bring down horsemen to traverse the swamps of Florida! Can there be any thing like a military education of the militia? It is a waste of money. Or any service? The troops dragged from one momentary service had to be taken round by sea—a storm overtaken them—and we have had to pay for more than 200 of their horses which were lost overboard. A number of Kentucky volunteers were sent down by water. The honorable senator ought to know something about this matter, for he had charge of the Kentucky volunteers, and he was the agent of the expense. Was there no extravagance?

I will give the honorable senator another instance. There was collected somewhere in Tennessee a magazine of provisions to the amount of half a million of dollars. Not being wanted for the use of the army, it was sold by the government on the spot, in the midst of the war, and the proceeds of sales was not over $50,000—leaving a clear loss to the government of $450,000. The articles were of the most valuable kind, such as coffee, sugar, grains, corn, bacon, and the prices at which they were sold were almost ruinous. The government lost by this sale more than $450,000. The honorable senator put his finger on one thing; I put my finger on these two. Economy in military expenditures is, I admit, very difficult. The possession of large stores of money rendered men careless in their expenditures, and it was impossible to get them to economize. But for waste like that I have referred to any administration is justly responsible. This administration has squandered millions on millions, and what they fly to show for it? What have we seen lately? We have seen a new army of 100,000 men raised, although that, though congress positively refused to raise a new military army, we were no sooner gone, and the president, who seems to have been viewed as a sort of residuary legatee of all power in the government, has raised a new army of 100,000 men, exclusive artillery, 500 mounted men, and 1,200 infantry, militia, were immediately raised for the Florida service. In regard to these 1,200 militia, an entirely new species of policy was invented. These militia were sent to the front, and were to be sent home, disgracefully to pursue their own business, and never, on any account, to move more than twenty miles from their own habitations! [Laughter.] They were termed—and very justly, I think—and called "home guards." [Laughter.]

Yes, twenty miles was to be the extent of their their expedients. If they happened to be in full pursuit of San Jose or Tigertail, the moment they arrived at that prescribed limit they were "sedulously" to turn round, and "sedulously" to return, [laughter]; and then were to be paid for the sedulous return, [laughter]. The senator [Mr. Stewart] then asked the senator says there was no extravagance. He may say (and that is all he does say) that the objects on which the money was expended were proper objects in themselves. That may be. But can extravagance be shown in spending money on such proper objects? Surely it can. It was equally manifested, and most commonly, in private as well as in public life, by unwise and wasteful applications of money to objects in themselves fit and proper. And that is the extravagance that I complain of here,—not that the government expended money on such objects as bacon and corn for the use of the troops; but was it not extravagant to heap up $500,000 worth of these supplies, and then to sell them off at auction for less than one-fifth of their actual cost? Corn that was bought at two dollars a bushel was sold for 124 cents; wheat at $1.50 a bushel was sold for 124 cents; and cents a pound in the market, was sold for two or three cents; and the rest in like proportion. Was this not extravagance, improvidence and gross mismanagement,—to lose in one stroke half the provision that was bought for the army's campaign?—do I not complain of the actual loss?—do I not complain of this practice of encouraging jobs; of tempting our town officers to become speculators on the public waste of economy. To set up more than half a million's worth of valuable public property at auction for less than one-fifth of its value, where there are no buyers,—what was it but to offer a bait to men whose play is not so overboard as to place them before temptation? And then to bring down half the money from the remotest borders of Missouri, where there were militia in abundance in the States close by, and to expend the public money in making a campaign like this!

I could give this honorable senator more instances; but his challenge has been fully met already. He asked for items, I have given them; he called for particulars, he has them.

I thought to apologize for following the senator's high example in departing from the subject immediately before the senate; but he has challenged me to point out instances of extravagance in the administration of the public finances, and this must be done. I have, therefore, the honor to inform the honorable senator to the effect that the branch mint—namely, where the gold is made, though much was expended in the most ridiculous and wanton manner—but I forbear. I say that much of this extravagance is owing to an administration's having money flowing into their possession, and that, when the money is not so plentiful, no suspicion is excited, and they care not to take to consider the money in their hands rather as theirs than the people's. I am for giving the money into the people's own hands. I am for distributing it among the states, and not for leaving it in the hands of the government. I am for making the people, little better under the country administration

But now, to return. There has been another curious topic of inquiry suggested by my friend from Alabama, as to what the opinions of gen. Harrison are or are not on this subject of pre-emption, do you not very properly inquire for our inquiry. The gentleman would like to know whether the subject of pre-emption, should he know whether the gentleman's convictions on this subject were as distinctly announced before the people of Alabama, during the late canvass, as they are now known to us by the present proceedings, and if not, whether we should consult the public interest, as well as the dignity of the senate, by following what we ourselves consider proper on any point of public policy, rather than by occupying our time on an inquiry that may not be of much importance to the public. In order to speak here, in debate, of the opinions of a President actually in power; the same course of reasoning ought to render us very cautious to observe a reserve as to the personal sentiments of a private citizen, and I am myself concerned, I am entirely careless what opinion I may entertain on that subject. But if his researches have shown that gen. Harrison is in favor of pre-emption, do not the same proofs show to equal evidence, that he is in favor of distribution? If he takes gen. Harrison as his guide, he will be equally thorough; let him take any proposition for pre-emption admitted with distribution. Has he not the same aversion of the opinions of gen. Harrison for the one as for the other? He has, and, I think, evince it with little difference. He says that nature has as any weight in the matter, the weight may be great; but I regret the aid of any such authority; if not a fit subject for our consideration; we should let like independent men, from our own judgment

In all this argument, our references to the recent actions of the people seem to attract no regard from gentlemen on the other side. When we ask them to pause, because the people have since acted, and their newly chosen agents are not yet here, our argument is said to be inconceivable. The senator from Missouri cannot understand the people's action, he says it is more mockery to call it an election. According to another organ of the party, it is the effect of ignorance and drunkenness. According to another, it is the work of foreign bribery. And according to yet another, the people are being duped and plained by referring to the operation of log cabins and coon skins! [A laugh.] Yes, without purpose or principle, the American people have fallen down and worshipped the effigy of a log cabin adorned with coon skins. In this fit language to be held by American senators, gentlemen, I admit, have cause for grief—for inward grief; but I should say it was not, at least, very politic to sooth their grief by sneering at the people. The gentlemen stand very high; their authority is no doubt of great weight, but to sneer at twelve hundred thousand voters has in it something a little ridiculous. They are too many, entirely, to sneer at. It is going a good way to say that they are an ignorant drunken set, and that their decision at the ballot-box is all a matter of gross fraud and coon skins. It is not very politic to say they were bribed by British gold. The whole country knows better. Where is the man who has not witnessed the late glorious assemblages of the people? And who that saw them gathering by thousands and millions, and cheering and shouting, and the other, could doubt where the expression of the public will came from? It was the deep, self-moved, spontaneous movement of an indignant people. This people, the people, they must bear the brunt of the gentlemen's calumnies. The end of 200,000 voters is quite sufficient to prove that none of the causes which have been assigned are the true ones. We are right, it is the judgment of the people on a rejected administration; it may have been erroneous; long personal animosity may still be in the very breast that ever existed; but it is neither they nor that is to be the judge on that subject. Although they have spent 153 millions, and have nothing to show for it but the receipts—(the gentleman says he has got all the papers before him)—[A laugh.]—but it may all be very right. Still, the people, by the constitution, have been constituted the rightful judges; they have sat upon the question, and it will not suffice to set aside the verdict of such a jury and say they were moved by coon skins, or plained by the operation of a log cabin, or, to continue the climax of corruption, that a senator was actually seen to walk in a procession of the common people! Well, I suppose I am called to take my share of the burden. I acknowledge to the gentlemen that I am a senator (and this, perhaps, the very crime alluded to) was one of a long procession marching as proudly and as triumphantly as ever men did march to the rescue of their country; yes, and feeling myself prouder to be one of the people moving in the majesty of their might, than ever I felt, even by my place upon this floor. And should senators, like other folks on a march, suffer the inconvenience of a little dust, why, they can bear it. I do not see, when the people are thus walking in solemn procession to the rescue of their country, that senators or any other dignitaries are greatly soiled or defiled, or exhibit any very great show of condescension, should they happen to get a little of the soil of freedom deposited in the folds of dust upon their fine white coats, or even in their fine stockings. (For a senator, too, as they were almost choked.) Is it a degradation for a senator to go down among the people? Is it going down? Does he degrade his senatorial dignity by walking with his fellow citizens, cheering and encouraging them by his presence as he marches to the rescue of the Union? In my opinion, The gentleman may call me a federalist, by which, I suppose, he means an aristocrat; but my federation does not consider it as the least reproach to walk with the people. I am one of them, and I hold it no degradation to be seen by their side. Other gentlemen may hold themselves bound by their dignity to eschew such gatherings, and may shrink, like a ball-room exquisite, from the contact of a little dust—I cannot feel, or think, or act with them. For my part, I have seen nothing, nothing of the origin which they so-called the feelings of an honorable senator. I saw nothing but countless gatherings of the people, not, under a common impulse, for a common purpose, reporting themselves in a station of honor, but to be seen in this season, and understanding what they were about at least as well as we do.

But all this is said with a view to weaken the coming administration. Gentlemen who despise this people—yes, those democrats who consider it degrading even to walk with them—are beginning to destroy the people's president by prejudice they hold him to be contempt, as a man chosen by bribery, by drunkenness, and by ignorance, that he may be condemned beforehand. They are mustering forces for the battle against the people and the people's candidate. I will enter no such ranks. So long as my feeble voice and my vote can go, the people's choice shall be respected, for I believe they are capable of understanding and acting for themselves, even if they are the ignorant, corrupt and drunken set which their heretofore adorners represent to be.

[Mr. DE HANAN. The gentleman looks toward me; did I ever represent them as ignorant or drunken?]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Never, never. The gentleman will excuse me for looking at him. [A laugh.] He never did. But I say that this is done for the sake of opposition to the president who is coming into office; it has been determined on before he has had an opportunity to perform one official act. But it is in vain. This coon skin blunbaggery is all to be put aside. The idea of March—the idea of March is coming, and already this blunbaggery against an untired administration has commenced. I desire the people to know it. I wish them to understand how the man whom they have elected to bear the weight of government is to be received. No means of warfare, however unrelenting or fierce, are to be spared. Already the sound of battle is hurrying in the air. It has been resolved, by calumnies and slanders in advance, to undermine, if not to overthrow the new administration. But the calumnies are so great that they will divert rather than provoke the people. I do not say that all who are opposed to gen. Harrison will pursue such a course; but I predict that this will bear the weight of active and assiduous action of the party in opposition. No president ever took office amidst such difficulties as the president elect will be called to encounter. You leave him a country embarrassed; you leave him a treasury swept out clear as your face, Pennsylvania says—[A laugh.]—[Mr. BUCHANAN. No, I did not.]

[What, indeed, have you left untwisted? You do, indeed, leave him a law authorizing the issue of treasury notes—the glorious privilege of going into debt for money—he comes into office. Will the gentleman say they leave him one dollar of this one bad dollar of the "constitutional currency"? This bad money government—a government which for twelve years has been proclaiming every thing trash but the constitutional currency—after twelve years of palmy administration—now is to come to leave the house of the people, what does it leave behind! The honorable senator from Pennsylvania could not find any thing left but the privilege of issuing a promissory note. No; not a dollar could he put his finger on. The secretary of the treasury says he shall not be able to pay up to the 1st of March, and therefore he asks for an issue of treasury notes to answer his own purpose. President Harrison, then, is left to come into the government without one dollar at his command. You have spent one hundred and thirty-five millions in four years; your treasury does not contain a dollar; and you bequeath to your successor nothing but debt. You have sold and administered on all the goods and chattels of the government. [A laugh.] The debt due you from the Bank of the United States you have trafficked off; you have collected all extra income, and spent it, together with all the accruing revenue, and you have no money left to pay the debt. The gentleman says millions of surplus revenue in the treasury; you soon ordered the issue of five millions of treasury notes; the secretary, to make all sure, took six millions. Of the thirty six millions ordered to be distributed among the States you reserved one million and from the Bank of the United States you got eight millions, making, in all, twenty-three millions of dollars surplus over and above the revenue; and yet, now our secretary of the treasury comes and preaches us lectures on economy, and says that the Harrison administration may get along for a year without a dollar to begin with, and with all the debts of the past administration on its shoulders. He calculates nineteen millions from the customs, when the calculation is seven. He says that he will reduce it for the first quarter to three millions, which would make his receipts for the year but twelve millions. He makes a long count for Harrison, and calculates he may get along if he will reduce the expenditures. The gentleman says he will leave us in the legacy of economy; he bequeaths us sage lessons, very good, to be sure, particularly when accompanied with an empty treasury; and, to complete the inheritance, he adds a vast experience of the ill-effects of extravagance.

But I am going too far away. There is one other ground taken by the senator from Alabama, and which he seems to grasp at as his last hope. There comes, he says, a better, more democratic way to run the gauntlet of this administration. "No democrat." In our political contests terms change and shift so much that it is not easy to know what is intended; but let me inquire of the honorable senator what he means by "democracy."

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Very good. Now I will tell the gentleman what I mean by a republican: I understand by a friend to a republican government as established by the constitution of the United States; a man who is ready to defend all the rights of this general government, and state governments, and of individuals, which they possess by virtue of the constitution. By democracy I mean a republican government as established by the constitution. That is constitutional democracy. Who goes for that is a democrat. A man may be more, or he may be less, but I hold him to be a democrat who acknowledges and values both by reason and practice. I trust the time is coming when democracy of this stamp will have no gauntlets to run. Of that we have had enough, in all conscience. In this sense, I may say, I was born a democrat—I was raised a democrat—I feel myself educated to this democratic standard. When I hear gentlemen of every political stripe parking something of the loco focus, something of the federalist, and distinguishing chiefly by devotion to executive power, all labeled "democracy," I feel that any body may take such democracy that likes. "I'll name it." But when you come to genuine constitutional democracy, I will put my foot as far as he who goes furthest. That is my democracy. I inherit it; it is mine both by education and practice. The gentleman, I believe, did not claim democracy as theirs exclusively. There may be some pretzel for such a claim when those who make it are in a very decided majority, and under such circumstances, though they may take what does not belong to them, they are guilty only of trespass under color of title; but now—now that the verdict of the people has been given, gentlemen would do well to mind where they take their neighbor's nauga or pind. When a man takes what does not belong to him as challenging your right to the title, and as claiming it, in the name of the people, for their president elect. The name of "democrat" is the people's name; it is the people's property; they have the sovereignty; they have the right; they have stowed it on their true friends. In giving the name of these times, I should denote you by an alias; and call you "federalists alias democrats." [A laugh.] I hope you will take this as a friendly warning that, after the 4th of March next, I shall consider it more than a trespass if you take the term democrat against you. Gentlemen must not look away from the people the name of democrat. If the people are not democrats, who are? They are what you have basely called them, "the democracy"—"the democracy of numbers"—and this democracy of numbers have, in every practicable form, consulted upon and demanded the distribution of the proceeds of the public domain. Let us heed their voices. Let us heed their instructions. It does not seem to me that any of us should be dissatisfied with the measure I propose. I think there is in that measure so much of the nature of compromise as might, of itself, render the idea acceptable to the people. The gentleman says the union is but a compromise upon a large scale; new states are anxious for more territory; I assure them of my entire and perfect sympathy, and I shall ever be ready to go as far to advance their policy in this respect as the people's will allow me to go. I think, if this compromise is made, I shall be at liberty, as a trustee, to adopt the whole as a wise and well-balanced system for the administration of the public lands.

After all, I can hardly hope that my proposition will be adopted; but I have accomplished my whole desire, at this time, by bringing it before the people of the United States. I desire the remotest settler on our frontier to know that though he may, as a settler, have thought no him, may, I am willing to grant him a pre-emption if he takes only consent to a just distribution of the proceeds of this sale. Though my plan is not adopted here, my hope is that it may be extensively known, and that it will directly save any and every man's accusation or injury on any partward to the settler of the wilderness. And now let me close with one remark: a solemn conviction of duty, and an ungrudging regard to the poor and meritorious cultivator of the soil, have led me to the sole motive for my action here.

CHRONICLE.

BANKS. An important decision. In a case recently before the court of common pleas in Dauphin county, judge Parsons decided "the true rule of policy and of law, to be that when bank notes are current at the place in which they are paid, and they are received without objection, and paid in good faith, without any knowledge that the bank had failed or where, from the facts, it could be inferred that it had, although at the time, the notes in the place where the bank is located, are not current but utterly worthless, still, in law, it is a valid payment of a pre-existing debt, and when so received, and the debt or judgment satisfied, it is a payment, and the original debt is relinquished."

The case has been removed to the supreme court for re-argument.

BANKRUPTCY. By a return of the failures which occurred in Paris during the year 1840, it appears they were 326 in number, and amounted to $2,263,000, say $10,000,000. The assets are set down at $2,306,000, but the amount is merely ideal.

The total number of bankruptcies in England and Wales, par-taken the last year, was 1,425, (and amounted to $100,000,000) being an excess of 312 over the year 1839.

BORON—length—duration—the number of persons in that city who pay taxes to the amount of $500 and upwards is as follows:

125 persons paid $500 and upwards.
10 " " 2,000 "
6 " " 2,500 "
3 " " 3,000 "
1 " " 7,000 "

The taxes of John Parker, are $7,011; those of Peter C. Brooks, are $5,026.

BRITISH OUTRAGE. Capt. Wyse, of the Leonidas, stationed in Baltimore from the day of January, states that on the 16th of March, in lat. 9 30 S. long. 33 47 W. he was fired into and brought to by the British ship-of-war Rose; the boat went on board, the papers demanded and examined under the plea of supposition that she was a slave. After detaining him for some time, she was allowed to proceed.

BRITISH CLOTHS. The following abstracts from the official report to parliament of the export of woollen fabrics, mixed with cotton, linen, &c. from Great Britain to the U. States, show a remarkable increase, which perhaps some of your readers can explain.

In 1838, 138,529 yards. Official value £18,408
1840, 1,108,519 " " " 85,553

BUSINESS CONVENTION. We notice that in several of the counties of Pennsylvania, meetings are being held for the purpose of electing delegates to the convention of business men, to convene at Harrisburg on the 25th of May next, to promote the agricultural, manufacturing, mechanical and mining interests.

COTTON—Imported. The sales of the week, ending the 27th inst. were 18,550 bales; 3,370 (valued at $1 to $3) 5000 Mobile, &c. $1 to $2; 5,500 New Orleans, $1 to $2.

The sales of the week, ending April 24, are 18,700 bales, of which 1,700 of America are placed to speculation account, and 1,300 of various descriptions for export. There is also forwarded into the interior about 1,000 bales of 1840, and 1,000 of 1841, at all descriptions [d. to] lower this week, with a flat and heavy market at the decline.

DEATHS. During the last week, in New York, 163, of which 29 were of consumption, and 53 under 21 years of age.

DELAWARE STATISTICS. From the 1st of January to the 1st inst. there have been 74 murders and 63 suicides. Of the suicides, 19 came to sudden death by temerity; 12 by taking laudanum; 5 by cutting their throats; 5 by drowning; and 5 by shooting themselves. Of the murders, 6 were in New York, 6 in Ohio; 4 in Georgia, 4 in New Orleans, 2 in Virginia, 3 in Vermont, 2 in New Jersey, 2 in Kentucky, 1 in Arkansas. Of suicides, 32 were in New York, 9 in Pennsylvania, 1 in Massachusetts, 6 in Connecticut, 1 in Maine, 1 in Kentucky, 1 in South Carolina, 1 in Wisconsin, 1 in Rhode Island, 2 in Virginia.

ELECTIONS. The general election took place in Virginia on Thursday last, the 23d inst. Congressmen were elected in Rhode Island on the 20th inst.

FISHERIES. Shad in the Potomac are abundant. Superior quality are selling at Georgetown at $4 60 a hundred. At N. York they bring $35 a hundred.

THE EXPEDITION. Sailed from Oahu, Nov. 10, U. S. S. Kearney, comm. by Commodore M. C. Perry, 2d ship Peacock, Wm. L. Hudson, commander; and schooner Flying Fish, S. Knox; 3d ship Vin-ces, G. M. Smith, commander—all on a cruise.

FLOW. Prices remain with hardly a variation as last quoted. New Orleans, April 14. There have been 4,000 barrels of flour sold at $2 30 cash. The stock in port for now fully 25,000 barrels, of which 11,000 are in transit, for Rio de Janeiro there are, of this amount, 7,000, and for St. Thomas and a market, 4,000.

FORT WASHINGTON. We learn from the Alexandria Gazette, that under the appropriations for Fort Washington, passed by congress at its last session, the letting of that fortification has commenced.

REICARD HARRISON. The talented and indefatigable editor of the Boston Atlas is no more! The Mercantile Advertiser of Mr. H. Haughton, in the Atlas of yesterday morning, announced his intention of proceeding to Europe, in the Acanth; and at about 10 o'clock, while engaged in his editorial duties, he was suddenly seized in the possession of as much health as he had enjoyed for some months past, he was suddenly attacked with illness, probably apoplexy, and immediately expired.

Mr. Haughton was well known as a man of letters. In industry and enterprise he has seldom been equaled—his political knowledge was very extensive, and under his direction, the Atlas has exercised a great influence in matters connected with our state and national governments for several years. Perhaps no paper in the union has furnished more important and in bringing about the late great political revolution, which resulted in the election of William Henry Harrison.

Mr. Haughton had many warmly attached personal as well as political friends, for his possessed many qualities honorable to human nature—and his sudden and premature death, he being only about forty-five years old, will carry sorrow to many a lonely bosom.

ICE. An English paper mentions that one of the American ships at Calcutta, recently landed 400 tons of ice, which sold at the wholesale rate of one penny per pound, netting a profit, exclusive of port duties, of upwards of £2,700 sterling.

Afterwards, Judge Van Vleeton, who is elected mayor by a majority of eight votes. Last year the whig mayor had 266 majority. The aggregate vote is larger than it was last year, but the whig vote was 27 less.

Six out of the ten wards have elected whig councilmen.

Mr. WILLIAM LADD, extensively known as a man of warm hearted benevolence, who for a long series of years has devoted his time, his property, his talents, to the dissemination of the principles of peace, died in Portsmouth, on Friday evening last.

NORTH NEWS. The account of the fire which took place at the college, at Washington, the main building of the mansion and nearly all the furniture was saved—mainly by the exertions of the Irish laborers from the vicinity.

NATIONAL INSTITUTION. We understand that Dr. Owen has lately forwarded to Washington the collection of specimens of rocks and minerals which he made during his geological survey of Iowa and Wisconsin also a selection made by him of European minerals from the collection of Mr. Sturges, esp. Both collections are destined for the National institution, lately formed at the seat of government.

Dr. Owen, we learn, is endeavoring to make a collection of specimens along the Ohio, from the states of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky. From this collection a complete set of geological specimens, illustrative of the formations along the Ohio river, will be forwarded to the National institution.

(Louisiana Adc.)

OUT. The U. S. Gazette says: "We will astonish many, but not contravert with the business, to learn that the old saw-mill, which was the engine on the Columbia road, seventy-one miles from Newburgh, cost last year sixteen thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars and ninety cents. A good large whale ship, well manned, in the last season, would scarcely supply the demands of the rail road."

FOR THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS. The steamer Tiptoe, belonging to the American fur company, left St. Louis on the 10th inst. for the Rocky Mountains. The crew were a large number of hunters, all of whom appeared in the highest spirits, and the deck was strewn with their paraphernalia. She will be absent about four months.

SNOW STORMS. In the vicinity of Hartford, beginning 25th of October, 1840, to the first of March, 1841, we have had 17, average about 41 inches deep. Aggregate on level about six feet six inches. In all to March 17, aggregate 5 feet.

STEAMER. The Acadia left Boston for Halifax and Liverpool, on the 16th, with 85 passengers, 7,500 letters and 7 large bags of newspapers. Capt. Miller was so much mortified by the accident, that he is unable to go out to her, and Mr. Scott has taken command.

STEAM FRIGATES. On Monday an experimental trip was made with the steam frigate which have been built at New York for the Spanish government. The result of the trial was very satisfactory. There are 2 of them, named the Luigi and English, each of 670 tons—breadth of beam 30 feet 8 inches, do. over all 49 feet 6 inches—length 102 feet, 184 feet over all at 170 feet. Each vessel can carry fuel for 30 days' consumption, and of course, can easily make voyages across the Atlantic. They have round sterns and are perfect for twelve cannon—arranged in pairs, and can be fired, each one of the Paixans guns in the stern. Their figure heads are carved to their nauses.

(San.)

CAPT. JOSHUA STURGES. of the revenue cutter Hamilton, stationed in Boston harbor, has been presented by the American ship-building company, in that city, with a splendid gift, built up a new model, in consideration of his having saved the lives of eleven dead in the summer of 1840.

SUGAR. By a document concerning the cultivation of sugar, transmitted by the legislature of Louisiana to congress, it appears there are 525 sugar estates in that state, employing 40,000 hands and 10,000 horses, and that the average crop is equal to 70,000 bushels of 1,000 lbs. or 70,000,000 lbs. sugar and 3,000,000 gallons molasses; the average value of sugar is six cents per pound, exclusive of freight and other expenses.

TOWN AFFAIRS. The inhabitants of a town in Connecticut, it is said, have voted that, whereas the selling of rum is profitable to the seller and deleterious to the town, the town will take the business into their own hands, and sell rum at a low price, and for the benefit of their town, voted him a salary, ordered the select men to furnish the rum, and directed the agent to register every man who bought the rum, and the quality sought.

TREASURY NOTES. Treasury department, April 3, 1841. Amount of treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of congress of the 15th October, 1837, the 21st of May, 1838, and the 2d of March, 1839, is $19,375,066 28

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The Great Western arrived at New York about 1 o'clock, on Saturday, the 24th inst., having made the passage in sixteen days—a very short one for this season of the year.

Among the passengers are Mr. Bates, managing partner of the late firm of Barrington, Brothers & Co. with his lady and a party of friends; also professor Wayland, Joseph Hann, esq. lady and daughter, Miss Jordon, &c.

The news brought by the Great Western will be read with deep interest.

ENGLAND.

Non-arrival of the President. Up to the closing of the mail from Liverpool to London, on the 7th inst., the steamer President had not arrived, and it will be seen by the following extracts from the London Courier, that the most painful anxiety prevailed concerning her fate.

A rumor prevailed on yesterday, and was pretty generally credited, that the President, about which such painful surmises are afloat, had been seen making for the Azores, in order to procure fuel. The statement turns out to be incorrect, but as yesterday was Sunday, was almost impossible to trace it to its origin. Two vessels arrived here yesterday from St. Michaels, one of the Azores—the Lynx and the Star of the West. They sailed in company on Thursday week, and arrived with the same tide. The captain of both vessels says that the fate of the sailing until reaching the Channel, they saw no falsehood whatever. This is conclusive as to the falseness of the report. There can be no doubt that the President experienced the same hurricane which the Carolina steamer encountered on the 15th and 16th ult., which is described by some old captain on board as being one of the most severe they ever witnessed in the Atlantic. In the mean time, public anxiety is stretched to its utmost tension respecting her fate; and it also forms the almost exclusive subject of conversation.

7th, P. M.—The accounts received from Liverpool this morning describe the excitement existing on account of the President to exceed any thing of the kind ever known in connection with shipping. As yet we have nothing on which to found any satisfactory opinion respecting the cause of delay.

The Liverpool Albion says—nothing whatever has been heard of the President steamer, if she sailed to the southward, and made for the Western Isles, for the purpose of replenishing her coal, she is not yet due. The Liverpool steam ship was, in the winter of 1839, compelled to run to the same islands to replenish her coal, being blown 27 days on the passage from New York to Liverpool, via Fayal. The prevalent opinion is, that the President must have run to the Western Isles, and that she may be expected to arrive in a few days.

Vol. X—No. 9.

[From the Shipping Gazette of April 7.]

Half past three—2½ per cent. has been paid out of doors on the President, and there is a doubt whether any thing less than 20 per cent. would be accepted in the subscription room at Lloyd's. She was first insured at five per cent.

House of commons—Care of Mr. Loock. Viscount Palmerston said that the next motion in the paper was one of the honorable member from Kilkenny, relating to the differences at present existing between this country and the government of the United States, and to the arrest of Mr. Loock. He put it to his honorable friend whether, at the present moment, he would think it necessary to bring this question under the consideration of the house. For his part, he did not see the expediency of bringing forward this question at the present moment.—(Hear.)

He trusted that there existed, on the part both of the government of the United States and that of this country, an anxious desire to bring this matter to an amicable and satisfactory termination. (Hear.) These matters had excited a strong feeling both at this side of the Atlantic and the other, and whilst these matters were the subject of commination between the two governments, any thing which might tend to their details could not be desired, perhaps to defeat the object, not only of his honorable friend, but that of the English government and the government of the United States.—(Hear, hear.) He hoped, therefore, his honorable friend would postpone his motion. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Hume said, no person was more anxious to see relations of friendship manifested between this country and the United States. He was opposed to war of any kind, but a war with the U. States he would not postpone his motion. (Hear, hear.) After what has been stated by the honorable lord, he had no objection to postpone his motion.

Last night, in the house of commons, Mr. Hume was about to move for the correspondence in the Carolina affair, but desisted, at the request of Lord Palmerston, who stated that if the negotiations are made public at present it might embarrass proceedings between the two governments—both of whom were desirous of preserving peace. Mr. Hume said, he would postpone his call till after the recess.

Preparations. The London Naval and Military Gazette says that sixteen war steamers are ordered to be built, six of the first class and ten of the second, all to be armed with guns of ten inch calibre. Several of these will be laid down immediately, and the frames of the whole covered without delay, so as to be ready against the engines are prepared.

The robbery at Windsor castle. April 6th. This morning Richard Lovegrove, the party suspected of being concerned in the extensive depredations at the castle, and who was advertised in the Police Gazette of Friday, arrived at Windsor by the eight o'clock train from Paddington, with the high constable of Windsor and another person named Neham, to whom, it is stated, (but from the secrecy observed it is impossible at present to obtain the correct particulars), he gave himself up in the custody of yesterday.

Thomas Stevenson, ex-mayor of Stafford, has been examined and held to bail on a charge of forgery.

There was another rumor, coming by way of Russia, on the 6th, that the Chinese dispute had been adjusted, but it was not credited. Even the Globe, anxious to grasp at any thing favorable, could only present the following:

The source of the report which we gave yesterday in our city correspondence, respecting the settlement of the dispute between this country and China, was letters received via Petersburg by parties who, on a former occasion, (the arrival of our expedition near the mouth of the Pekin river), had intelligence of it by the same route some weeks earlier than the India mails.

Without, therefore, being able to confirm the report from other sources, we hope that its substance, the concession of our claims by the Chinese, will prove correct, and that the next arrivals from the East will confirm the satisfactory conclusion anticipated.

Count Saurville (Joseph Bonaparte) has been alarmingly ill, but was considered better at the last account.

Corn market—Liverpool, April 6. Since last market day the arrivals have been of fair amount, both of wheat and oats, and also flour, from the U. States. The weather is variable, but on the whole very reasonable. At to-day's market the better kinds of British and foreign wheat were both more in request; and though the sales were limited in amount, they fully realized the prices of this day week. Inferior kinds, however, were 1d. or 2d. lower.

A reduction of 6d. per barrel and 1s. per sack was submitted to, but at the reduced rates the sales were entirely of a retail description. No sales in bond are reported. Oats declined 1d. to 2d. per 45 lb. and were dull of sale. Oatmeal was also 3d. to 6d. a sack lower, and only in very limited demand. Other articles were steady at former quotations.

Cotton market. We have had a steady market to day, at which 2,000 bags of all descriptions have been sold, including 200 Orleans at 8d. for export, and not in bond. Prices are steady; in fact we notice no change whatever.

FRANCE.

There is very little news of importance in the Paris papers, which are still occupied to a great extent with the fortification bill. The journals, the most opposed to the project, seem to think that even now some means may be devised to prevent it from being carried into execution.

The copyright bill has been rejected by the chamber of deputies. The main principle of the bill was to give the family of an author or artist an exclusive interest in his works for thirty-years after his decease. This principle appeared at one moment to be agreed to; but other difficulties arose, and the bill, after a fortnight's discussion, has been lost.

Military and naval power. The forces of France, by sea and land, amount to 492,671 men, and 112,774 horses, for the army; and for the navy to 120, armed vessels, 200 ships of the line, 10 frigates, 43 corvettes, brig, &c., 35 steamers—manned by 46,418 seamen, besides 4,350 artillerymen, and 15,551 infantry, to defend the ports, arsenals and colonies.

AFRICA.

The Monitor publishes advices from Algiers of the 23d ult. The departure of the expedition destined to retake the garrisons of Miliana and Medeah had been delayed several days, in order that the duke de Aumale might accompany it. It was to consist of 10 battalions of infantry, and a regiment of African chassours, with a battery of field artillery, and would remain 15 days.

An order of the governor general, which placed the national guards of the colony under the command of the military authorities, had created considerable dissatisfaction among the European population of Algiers. This excitement had been greatly increased by the proclamation of Gen. Bugeaud, declaring Algeria to be under martial law.

A letter from the Journal des Debats dated the 2d instant, says, that an immense fleet of timber, larger than any which is remembered to have descended to the Loire since the wars of the empire, has passed Pont de Ce on its way to India. It is said, however, that not a fourth of the cargo, which is to be supplied by the country washed by that river. This timber is designed, it is said, for the construction of the French trans-Atlantic steamers which are to be completed by the end of the present year.

TURKEY.

Affairs of the east. We have advices from Constantinople of the 27th ult. The Ottoman fleet returned to that capital on the 16th, and had resumed its former station along the European bank of the Bosphorus.

In a conference held at Therapia, at Lord Ponsonby's house, the reply to the porte to the petition of Mehemet Ali had been discussed. The result of this conference is affirmed to be that the porte is left to the alternative of yielding the modification sought by Mehemet Ali of that part of the hatt-i-sheriff which relates to the hereditary succession to the pashalic, or of relinquishing all claim to the future intervention of the four powers in favor of Turkey. The divan is it is there supposed, will conform to the wishes of the ambassadors. This state of things is generally regarded as equivalent to a settlement of the eastern question. Thus far we report from a well informed Constantinople correspondent. Upon his statement we need only remark that the united interests of the four powers upon the decision of the divan cannot fail of success, that influence being exercised in support only of the reasonable petition of the pasha.

The treaty or convention initiated, (paragraph), on the 15th ult. by the representatives of the five great European powers and the ambassador of the porte, contains:

A preamble of considerable length, stating and recognizing the rights of the Ottoman porte as an independent power in her relations with the other European nations.

Articles 1 and 2, which stipulates the closing of the Dardanelles against all foreign ships of war, without distinction.

Article 3, which consists of an invitation to all friendly powers, not parties to the treaty, to accede to it; and Article 4, which relates merely to the exchange of the ratifications within a given time.

The above are the entire contents of this important convention.

SPAIN.

We have received by express intelligence from Madrid of the 27th and 28th ultimo.

The regency question was more than ever the order of the day. In case the cortes should ever the principle of a single regency, the duke of Victoria will certainly be raised to that elevated station. But, if that of the triple regency should prevail, the authority will in all probability devolve on the duke, M. Arguelles and general Evaristo San Miguel.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The steam ship Watches, captain Swiler, arrived from Havana, with dates to the 15th inst. She brought over 70 passengers.

By the Conier of last evening, we learn, that a few hours previous to the departure of the Natchez, intelligence reached Havana, that 62 negroes from Jamaica, believed to be abolitionist emissaries, had effected a landing on the south side of Cuba. Thirty of those black subjects of queen Victoria had been arrested, and ordered to be shot. The Spanish authorities were in pursuit of the others. Otherwise every thing was tranquil on the island.

PRESENTATION OF AN AMERICAN MINISTER.

President Tyler received the diplomatic body on Saturday, at two o'clock, at the president's mansion. In the absence of the British minister, Mr. Fox, (who, we are sorry to say, was kept away by indisposition), the Russian minister, Mr. Rodzico, appeared at the head of the corps. We give below his address to the president, on behalf of himself and his colleagues, and the president's reply.

As the members of the body were respectively presented, the president spoke to each of them of the relations, present or past, between his country and the United States, and of his hope of the continuance of amicable relations; and received from all congratulations and the assurance of the desire of peace and amity with his country.

In these short conversations with gentlemen, mostly stranger to him, the president was particularly happy, and this, his first official intercourse with the representatives of other nations, was, we doubt not, exceedingly satisfactory. Nothing, indeed, could be more appropriate or in better taste than the president's remarks, and the replies of the several members of the corps. [Nol. Ind.]

Mr. Rodzico's address—translation.

MR. PRESIDENT: The United States having been suddenly deprived of its supreme head, the constitution has invested you with the chief magistracy of the union.

The diplomatic corps has the honor to appear before you, Mr. President, for the purpose of expressing through me, its organ, its concern in the melancholy event which has so unexpectedly removed general HARRISON from the hopes of the American people. The diplomatic corps, hastens also to offer up its vows, Mr. President, that your administration may be distinguished by the maintenance of the existing friendly relations, and by a constant increase in the prosperity of the United States.

The diplomatic corps embraces this opportunity, Mr. President, to assure you of its earnest desires to merit your confidence and esteem.

The president's reply.

MR. MINISTER: In my character of chief magistrate of the United States, and in the name of the people thereof, I have to return to the diplomatic corps whom on this occasion you represent, my acknowledgments for their expression of condolence on account of the bereavement which this country has so recently sustained in the death of its talented and illustrious president. I take occasion, at the same time, to give the assurance that my most earnest desire, as his constitutional successor, will be to maintain and cherish the friendly relations which now so happily subsist between our respective countries.

The people of the United States regard their own prosperity as intimately connected with that of the entire family of nations, and the cultivation of the feelings of mutual amity as the best mode of advancing the important end.

I sincerely desire that the residence of the diplomatic corps near this government may prove every way agreeable to them; to accomplish which nothing shall be wanting on my own part.

THE COTTON CROP. We gave it as our opinion on the 1st of March, that the falling off in the crop for the latter part of the year, would be greater in proportion than for the preceding five months, and on this we based a calculation that the present crop would not exceed 1,600,000 bales. The receipts for the month of March indicate that it will fall short of that. And nothing is more certain now, than that the deficiency is general, although more oppressively great in South Carolina and Georgia than in the southwest. On the first of March the excess of the last, over the present crop, was as we stated, something more than 200,000 bales. The following is a table of receipts of cotton at the principal southern ports at dates nearer the first of April.

New Orleans, March 31,	628,458	709,312
Mobile, " 27,	265,500	278,000
Florida, " 27,	83,050	—
Georgia, April 2,	96,363	193,258
S. Carolina, " 3,	145,252	217,586

Total, 1,199,553 1,199,553

Deficiency of present crop. 311,869

It appears from this that the receipts of March, 1841, have fallen short of March, 1840, by 100,000 bales, which indicates that the crop is nearly exhausted, for March is ever a brisk month and the navigation for the greater part of it has been good. The spring may have had some influence, but for a brief space only. In short, the prospect of the crop for the remaining part of the year is gloomy enough, and should warn all men to spend as little money as possible.

In regard to the disposition of that part of the crop which has already come to market, there is little to remark. The export coastwise is influenced by so many circumstances, that it is not easy to draw any conclusion from it. This item has increased the present season about one hundred thousand bales, and as this is not explained by any considerable increase in the aggregate of foreign exports and of stocks at New York, we may suppose that the domestic consumption has already advanced.

In regard to the direct foreign exports, it should be observed, that the exports to Great Britain rose on the first April last year, very nearly equal to the exports of this season to all foreign places. Still the stock on hand in the southern ports is much less than in 1840.

The export of Sea Islands approaches much nearer to the crop of last year than was anticipated. The comparison on the 1st of April is as follows:

Of all the southern states Georgia will suffer the most from the deficiency. Not only because the demand is there greatest, but her citizens are greatly in debt; her banking system is in the extreme confusion, and a number of safe works in progress, involving a greater expenditure. The enlargement of the state with rotten banks will add to the distress, if it does not bring about public bankruptcy and a gradual explosion of the credit system in Georgia.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

The restrictive system of Great Britain. The last number of the Edinburgh Review contains an article based upon the report of the committee appointed last year by the house of commons "to inquire into the several duties levied on imports into the United Kingdom" with reference to the effects of the same on the revenue.

The Review advocates a reduction, and the report of the committee testifies in favor of it. But as high as the duties on imports are, the rates of British duties at present upon all articles from abroad that may come in competition with home productions, or which may be made to yield revenue, that a very considerable reduction might be made throughout the whole system, and still leave the standard of duties higher than the friends of a tariff here would wish to see fixed in the United States.

One reason that is urged for a reduction of the restrictive duties in England—and no doubt a very good one—is, that unless the productions of foreign countries are admitted upon more favorable terms, the reciprocity of retaliation will be adopted against English productions. "But it is not the duties that the United States and Brazil will impose on our manufactures will in all probability be so entirely prohibitory, unless we consent to admit the productions of those countries into our ports, that the duty is not so much the subject of question, as must be seriously met—whether it is fit that we should go on sacrificing our greatest national interests to the practice of giving protection to the private interests of a comparatively small portion of the community."

The corn laws, according to the estimates of the committee, impose a tax of eleven millions pounds sterling on the British community annually. This employing 11,498 spindles, 160 looms, 417 persons, and a capital of $299,000.

Excitement, burglary, murder and arson at St. Louis. About 1 o'clock on the night of the 17th April, the large building occupied by Simmonds & Morrison, as a commission house, and by W. G. Paine, as a bank, was discovered to be on fire. On opening the door to the banking house, the dead body of Jacob Weaver was discovered, bearing the marks of a pistol shot over his eye, and sundry other wounds inflicted with a sharp instrument. This young man was a clerk of another firm, but in the habit of sleeping with Jesse Baker, a clerk of the commission house. Baker was missing. The fire extended. In the course of it, one of the walls fell and killed a fireman by the name of Ansel S. Kneibell. His remains were soon after recovered from the ruins. The body of Jesse Baker, the other clerk, was found on Monday morning beneath the ruins of the bank vault, his head and neck burst to the bones—it is thought he was killed by the robbers, while attacking them or defending the vaults of the bank. A report of a pistol was heard that night in this banking house.

The excitement in the city of course was at the highest pitch and every story was tending to detect the perpetrators.

A meeting of the citizens was held—a committee of 13 for each ward appointed, to arrest the murderers, and the mayor offered a reward of $5,000 for the arrest and conviction of the perpetrators of the act. The St. Louis fire company offered an additional reward of $500.

The loss by the fire is estimated at $12,000. It is supposed the burglars were after a large sum of money which had been deposited in bank the day previous, but if so, they were fooled for the money and papers were found after the fire was extinguished, safe in the vault.

An old woman had also been murdered in Flair-out township for $100. The murderer was committed to jail.

FLORIDA.

Gov. R. K. Call. Fifty-eight guns were fired in this city by the whig party, on the receipt of the intelligence of Richard K. Call being appointed governor of this territory. [St. Augustine News.]

Wild Cat. Extract of a letter from an officer of the 1st regiment to his friend in Albany, dated New Orleans, April 2.

"I am here on my way to Arkansas, with 200 wretched Seminole Indians. They are the remnants of a Spartan race. The men are nobles, hardy-looking fellows, whom you may not suspect, though they have murdered the innocent and unoffending; but the women and children excite your pity and compassion. On our tedious voyage hither they lay about the deck, perfectly roused and apparently indifferent to their fate, careless of life and fearless of death."

"I was at Fort Cummings when the noted chief Coconocoe, or Wild Cat, came in for a talk." This man is remarkable for the many incidents in his life, and for his bold and daring spirit. He was once a prisoner, but managed to escape through a hole in the walls of his prison so surprisingly small that an ordinary man's head would not enter it, and, after he was through, jumped twenty five feet to the ground. This fellow has committed more murders and scalped more women and children than any other Indian in Florida, and this man we were to take and detain, by the hand in friendship. He came into our camp, bringing with him seven 'trustworthy' squires, who, in looks, dress and manner, might well be painted to illustrate and personate the old man himself—a little effusion of brimstone, a blue flame, and a few tails would have made the picture complete. Wild Cat's manner, upon coming into the presence of so many officers, and surrounded as he was by so large a body of soldiers, was somewhat confused, but he soon recovered himself, and spoke with ease, and not ungraciously. He is about thirty years of age, five feet eight inches high, well proportioned, with a calm, settled, manly face, and a dark fierce eye beaming with intelligence. The colonel talked to him openly and frankly. He returned it, and promised to cease fighting and emigrate. His little daughter, a child of five years, who had been taken prisoner, and separated from its parents some five or six months, was then given up to him, and, for the first time, an Indian, I saw the evidence of feeling and affection.

"I consider the Florida war as at an end. All the chiefs and Indians are surrendering. These I am now taking off have been the most desperate in the country, and are acknowledged to have been the very spirit of the war. I left at Tampa more than a hundred men who were waiting the arrival of their friends, when they will embark for their new homes."

WISCONSIN.

New towns and villages are constantly springing up in this garden of the west. The Madison Enquirer gives the following account of two new villages in that vicinity:

White Water, in Walworth county, about midway between Madison and Milwaukee, on the Port Atkinson and Mequaque road, is a beautifully situated and thriving village, surrounded by a farming country of the best kind, already settled and improved to a great extent. At this point where by a dam at the outlet of a little lake a good and never failing water power has been created, is Dr. Tripp's flouring mill—one of the best establishments of the kind, in the territory, judging from some specimens of his manufacture that we have seen.

Clinton Prairie, in this county, 12 or 15 miles east of Madison, on the Port Atkinson road, from its proximity to the city requires no special notice, it is a desirable point for farmers, may well be recommended to the attention of emigrants on the lookout for good locations. A large number of settlers, we have been told, are expected on this prairie during the coming season.

CASE OF McLEOD.

The importance which this case is assuming, both as a question between the United States and a foreign country, and as a question between the federal government and a state authority, requires of us carefully to register whatever transpires in its progress. We gave in our last number, under the New York head, a brief abstract of the debate which took place in the legislature of that state upon the resolution submitted by Mr. Swachamer, and the amendment thereto offered by Mr. Hoffman, requesting the governor to issue a habeas corpus in the case of McLeod. The Albany Argus, of the 19th inst., furnishes the debate at large, and from their columns we extract it. In reference to it the Albany Argus observes: "It will be found, we think, highly interesting, as indicating the public feeling and temper, both in this stage of the discussion, and in the final result. The house met again this afternoon for the purpose of taking up this subject, when, if it comes to a vote on Mr. Hoffman's amendment, which gave rise to the debate, and which is supported in a masterly speech, we apprehend it will show the untimeliness of the small effort of the Daily Advertiser to give it a party direction, by carefully stating the two democratic speakers on one side, and only the federal speakers on the other,—omitting all allusion to the able speech of Mr. L. S. Chaffee."

It may be proper to add that Mr. SWACHAMER is a Van Buren member from the city of New York, and Mr. HOFFMAN is attached to the same party, and from Herkimer.

From the Albany Argus.

DEBATE IN THE NEW YORK ASSEMBLY, APRIL 17. Mr. Swachamer offers the following:

Resolved, That the governor be requested to communicate to this house the correspondence, if any, which has taken place between the executive authority of the United States and of this state, and whether any arrangements whatever may have been entered up by such departments in reference to the case of McLeod, now in prison at Lockport, in this state.

Mr. Swachamer. In introducing a resolution of this importance, it is due to myself and the house to offer a few words of explanation. And I would remark in the outset, that I have not drawn up the resolution under the impulse of the moment, but have taken time to reflect upon the consequences to which it may lead. Neither is it my design unnecessarily to agitate the question involved in it, or to fan the flame already kindled on our northern borders.

I was a little surprised to see it announced in the public prints, that the attorney general of the United States had left his appropriate post at Washington, and come on here with special reference to this case of McLeod, which I conceive to be exclusively within the cognizance and jurisdiction of the state of New York. I presume I may assert here, without fear of contradiction, that such a visit, on such an errand, by the attorney general of the U. States, is without precedent in the history of this country. I have seen it, so far as I know, only in the form, where the executive authority of the union, through its chief prosecuting officer, has ever taken on itself to interfere with the criminal jurisprudence of any of the sovereign states of this union. It will be recollected that shortly after the return of the attorney general of the United States, to what I conceive to be his legitimate sphere of duty, it was currently reported, and without contradiction from any quarter, that he in conjunction with the attorney general of the state of New York, had examined this case of McLeod, and had asserted, as the result of that investigation, that there was no third party in the case to warrant his conviction. And this too, after McLeod had been indicted by the grand jury of the county of Niagara, and held to trial for one of the most heinous offences known to the laws of this state. Sir, his legitimate sphere of duty, it was the authority of the United States, have no more right or power to interfere in this case of McLeod, in this stage of the affair at least, than it had to interfere in the case of Robinson, after he had been indicted for the murder of Snydeman, and before trial. And I would ask, in all sincerity, what think you the people of New Jersey would have thought of such an interference, on the part of the attorney general of the United States, after a true bill had been found against Robinson? Is not this interference an intrusion, to an attempt to interfere with the opinion of a New York jury, upon a case which sooner or later, must come before them for a verdict of acquittal or condemnation?

I trust this subject will receive the consideration to which it is entitled. I may be told that it was necessary for the government of the United States to take this case under its special care, because England has threatened vengeance on the U. States, if but a hair of the head of McLeod is injured. But let me ask, did we complain, when the patriots, as they styled themselves, citizens of the United States, misguided men if you please, who had entered Canada in aid of what is called the rebellion, were taken up, and either executed or transported, under the mere form of a trial? Was there any attempt on the part of the proper authorities of the United States, to arrest the course of the law, martial or civil, in the province of Canada? No, sir, they had their trial, such as it was; and although condemned for the political offence of rearing the standard of liberty in a land of despotism, they were consigned to an ignominious death, and suffered the utmost rigor of British laws, without interference from this side of the line. Why should not the laws of New York take their course in a case like this of McLeod, where the charge is the murder of an unoffending man, and the wanton destruction of the property of a citizen of N. York? And why should we and our laws be made the subject of interference from any quarter?

Sir, I trust this inquiry will be instituted. For I hold that the representatives of this sovereign state, and through them the sovereign people of N. York, have a right to know whether there has been any improper interference on the part of the executive of the United States, with our local jurisprudence, and whether the executive and attorney general of this state, in conjunction with officials of the general government, have sought to scene a culprit from justice, in a case coming exclusively within the cognizance of our laws. And on the other hand, it is due to this executive and attorney general of this state, under the circumstances, that the facts should come out—to the end that if there has been nothing wrong on their part, they may be exonerated; and if otherwise, that measures may be taken to avert and vindicate the sovereignty of the state and the rights of her laws.

Mr. Hoffman here took the floor, but his opening remark was not distinctly heard. He was understood to say, that in one respect at least, he entertained similar opinions with the gentleman who had just taken his seat. He (Mr. H.) had been called to order, as he was not to introduce any party spirit that had been in use with the other party against the bill. He meant to say, (he continued) that he was a state rights man to the entire extent.

As the law of this state stood for a long period, (Mr. H.) held that it was a prerogative, when a person had been arrested, whether a person had been indicted for any offence whatever, the prosecuting attorney had a right, against the will of the court and on his own responsibility, to enter a nolle prosequi to the indictment. He did it as a part of the executive government, and under this responsibility determined to do it in this case. It was part of the duty of the attorney general to exercise that right to give him this right. I believe he ought to have it now. It is the exercise of high and sovereign power, made necessary under certain circumstances. The case alluded to by the gentleman from New York, was a case where the attorney general is one where it is necessary to exercise that right. But the legislature of this state, under peculiar circumstances, growing out of what is known as the Morgan excitement, has crippled the attorney general in the exercise of this right. I may be mistaken, but as I understand the law, if he exercises it, it must be by order of court, and the judicial tribunals must always be the judges. It will be seen that if this be the law, and a case should arise in which the sovereign power of the state, not for reasons which address themselves to the judicial tribunals, but for reasons—I use the word in the highest and best sense—reasons of public policy, public justice, public security and the public peace—should feel itself under the necessity of staying a prosecution, the action of the executive might be and would be most seriously inconvenienced.

I have had this subject under consideration at my private room. It is one of a delicate and difficult nature. I have not felt at liberty, according to my sense of propriety, to canvass the matter over with members generally. What I have said has not extended beyond my colleague and associate. I have been deterred from bringing it before the house, not because I thought it ought not to be brought here, but because I was undivided as to what the action of the federal executive should be. I may be mistaken. I saw very well that it might be, that the United States government—I speak of the executive government, that has this matter specially in charge, and whose acts may result in peace or its opposite—might be unwilling to hold this thing where it is, until negotiations between the two sovereignties, the case might be reached. It was with a view that I might judge rightly on this question, and under an apprehension that I might interfere with the progress of the matter in negotiation, that I forbore to bring it up.

Let me be more explicit—because questions of this nature are somewhat new to us. In the exercise of our powers of sovereignty, limited as they are, we have no foreign relations in theory. But we may have them in point of fact. The controversy with Virginia, shows that though strictly we can have no controversy with a neighboring state, yet you may have them in point of fact. External relations do exist. Take, for example, the case of Spain. Suppose the sovereign power of Great Britain had applied directly to the executive of this state, and had said in so many words, we have authorized and do ratify and confirm the act of this man. You have him and are prosecuting him until he dies. Suppose the sovereign power of Great Britain had applied directly to the executive of this state, and had said in so many words, we have authorized and do ratify and confirm the act of this man. You have him and are prosecuting him until he dies.

Would it be an answer for the executive to say, we can't hear the application—you must go to Washington? Such an answer might be given, but it must be apparent to what result it might lead. The sovereign making the application may say, we take no notice of your internal arrangements; our confidence—your constitution. We find you here in embodied wills under an organized executive government. We find you here acting on one of our own citizens for doing an act which we have authorized, and which we approve of, right or wrong, and we ask his release. What, sir, is the alternative presented? Apologies, polite and civil expressions, such as your humble servant, at the end of a note, may answer very well in private life to get rid of a difficulty and yet say nothing. But when a sovereign speaks he means something. He may not withdraw a request without dishonor and disgrace in the eyes of the world. The request once made, such in my judgment would be the condition of the sovereign that must receive it. The request is presented. The sovereign to whom it is addressed may or may not, at his pleasure, reply; but he assumes on himself, whatever may be his course, the responsibilities of his position. They meet each other face to face, and each assumes the responsibility of what which they are the heads—the one asking the release and the other refusing it, as the case may be, and in the judgment of the civilized world, the question must be brought to an amicable adjustment, or the country is left to the consequences of friendship or hostility.

There is no such thing as an appeal or certiorari to the supreme court. They must separate amicably, or resort to force and violence. That being the case, I put it to the judgment of this house, whether the attorney general should not be empowered, without consulting the courts, for high political reasons, to withdraw the indictment, to cease the prosecution, and thus leave the executive government to consult as to what remedy it would pursue under the law and the constitution, for an injury committed, how to be punished through the judicial tribunals.

Mr. H. here went into the facts connected with the case of McLeod. He said, he had gained possession of Navy Island. They were largely done them by the United States. He said they might say their general and commanding officers were citizens of the U. S. States. With hostile violence they assailed the shore of the neighboring provincer, and put in jeopardy the lives and property of the subjects of a power with which we were at peace. The almost efforts of the general and state governments, acting in co-operation, were insufficient to repress this movement, or to roll back from the Canada shore this cloud of danger and disturbance. By the rules of international law, the sovereign whose territory was thus immediately endangered, had a right to repel the aggressor, in the language of a memorable man, now no more, if, in doing so, he should momentarily pass the line between his own and the territory of a friendly power, the act might be a subject of negotiation or complaint, but could hardly be deemed justifiable. The local authorities of Canada believed themselves to be thus endangered, and believing also that it was necessary and proper to destroy the boat which they knew had been plying between our territory and the island, in possession of the rebels—to use their own words in their own sense—they took on themselves to fit out an expedition for that purpose. Did any man doubt, that they thought this measure necessary and a matter of undoubted right. Whether they judged right or wrong, the material is not the subject of inquiry, in which the subject presented itself to his mind. Their object was to repel the danger that threatened them. They resolved to destroy the boat, and in the execution of that design, ordered by the military authority, they incidentally destroyed the life of an American citizen within our territory, and for this the accused stands indicted before the judicial tribunals of the state.

I submit (continued Mr. H.) to this house—I know there is some diversity of opinion as to the legal mode—whether the judges may breathe out of law, whether an act of this kind, if it should turn out to be as I have stated it, judged by the local law, would be murder? I put it to those who have devoted themselves to the study of international law, and the decisions of the judicial tribunals that have taken cognizance of it, especially those who have been led to look into the decisions of the admiralty courts, whether the prisoner can make a defense before the judicial tribunals of this state, on the ground that the state of which he was a member was in imminent danger of invasion? That the authorities there ordered him on this duty? It may be mistaken, but my convictions are settled and strong that he must be judged by the laws of the state of which he was a member, and acting in obedience to the orders of his superior officer, the judicial tribunals must consign him to infamy and death. But I put it to the sober judgment of this house, if it be true that the local authorities of Canada, under the belief that they were innocent, and endangered by the hostile gathering on Navy Island, did order this expedition, and that it was under this order that McLeod acted; whether he did not do for his country what every man not only American by birth, but every man who has a spark of American feeling in him, would do for his own? If, sir, sedition or rebellion should rage on the borders of this state, its standard collecting from Canada, arms and munitions of war as well as recruits, preparatory to an invasion of the very heart of the state—and in sight of the forces gathered to resist the danger, a boat should be found plying daily between the camp of the insurgents and the opposite shore—and if under the belief that this boat was in the service of the enemy, orders should be issued to destroy it—would it be murder? I ask if there is any man in this state, be he citizen or foreigner, who has set his foot here to dwell, that would hesitate one moment to obey the order of his government, to destroy the boat, the crew of this house and the country, though with a frame suited to engage in conflicts of violence, I am not prepared to confess to that degree of human baseness that would make me hesitate to obey.—And I affirm, for all others to do so, that the constitution of this state, and the shock which results from the independence of the country, and who would again into the conflict when the conflict was renewed—that there is not a man of them that under such circumstances would have flinched in grilling himself to have, and contributing his best services, and his means towards repelling the expected invasion.

I say therefore, whatever the judicial tribunals may determine as to the accused, that he is not guilty of murder. I say that in what he did, he rendered a service to his country, which no other free man has ever been willing to render, and cheerfully. The sovereign for whom he acted has approved the act, and in that approval assumes the entire responsibility of it. If it had been done in an ordinary case, and in an ordinary case, it would be an ordinary warfare. It is for these high reasons of public policy that I say the executive government should be empowered to withdraw the indictment.

Judged by our law he must be condemned and executed, and I believe there is no escape for him. Judged by those high moral principles that constitute the basis of human society, he is not guilty. To execute him would be to stain the state with the guilt of murder—to draw down upon us the reproaches of the civilized world. It would be to invoke the vengeance of Heaven against a people that should so outrage the dictates of humanity and patriotism. I say that if we were to act in the field—if the military force not only of these two millions of people but of the sixteen millions with whom we are united, were now marshaled to punish this aggression on our territory, they should act with the same regard to the same conduct to his sovereignty. The controversy is not with him. To prosecute him is revenge—to execute him is murder. Send him to his sovereign—the sovereign he has served as we would serve ours. If we have cause of complaint, let us wage war not against the individual, but against the nation in whose name and by whose authority he acted. Let us take care, that in the event of an appeal to our sister states and to our own people for their co-operation against this aggression, we will not occupy an advance enforce our cause by punishing in the person of an enemy that which we must not only commend in a citizen of our own state, but on which we must rely for success. No, no, sir. If we expect the business of the world to be done in these controversies, as it was with our forefathers, if we expect the deep toned religious sentiment that distinguishes us as above every other country under Heaven to go with us—if the open courage and magnanimity of our ancestors, our army and navy, is to be enlisted warmly in our cause in a future conflict—we let us not sin the banner under which they are to rally. So also, in reference to the admitted controversies between this country and Great Britain—I repeat, it is not to draw upon ourselves in advance any collision that we may incur the prejudices of the civilized world? Who does not see that in a controversy for territory with a nation that has grasped one hundred and twenty millions of people in the east—that has not only seized on a new continent of the west, but has seized a part also of the continent of Africa—that has in a word extended itself every where—it is important that we retain what the character and genius of our institutions have won for us abroad—I mean the sovereignty of the sea, and the right of the civilized world. But when the story shall be told that it required all the energy of the general and state governments to prevent certain restless spirits on our borders from rushing into a neighboring province in lawless parties—after this man had been indicted and committed and set at liberty on his way again consigned to imprisonment at the behest of a mob—rely upon it, sir, this mob which numbered perhaps more stumps than men, will figure abroad as the people the lawless, and it will be believed to be the result of the ascendancy of mob violence in this country over law and order. Not one of the one hundred and fifty millions in Europe, but will set that down in the account against us. Is it prudent or politic that we should arm against us the prejudices of the civilized world in a contest of the kind I have alluded to?

I beg gentlemen to reflect that postponement is no remedy—that this matter must be brought to an amicable adjustment, or that hostilities will be the result. The matter is not one of those that either separate in perfect kindness, or resort to the ultimatum of sovereigns. I ask if it be wiser to put this man forward in the front of this controversy, than to place ourselves in the commanding, that any gentleman who should have taken the position of honorable, generous position, I have endeavored to point out. For my own part, I am entirely willing, any anxious, that this man should go from among us—that the controversy should be carried on between the sovereigns of the sea, the United States and Great Britain—and I submit in perfectly to the result. I trust, since this question has been stated that our action may be such as to put it in the power of the executive government to give this man a safe conduct to his sovereign, and that the controversy on the merits of the case, in regard to which every civilized world will coincide with us. If, therefore, this call is made on the executive, I trust it will be qualified in the usual manner, in order that he may not be obliged to respond if he shall deem it to be his duty to do so. I have endeavored to do so—for although we may command him, yet this is a point on which he should be left to judge for himself, on his responsibility as a chief magistrate. But after all, that in my judgment is not the best disposition to be made of this case. The part that belongs to us is evident. It is to correct the error in the existing law—and I therefore move indemnity, if any, is to be given by the English government to the owners and crew of the Caroline? We say, if any, because the referred may hold that, though the seizure was lawful, so was McLeod's trial, and that he must take his indemnity, if any, from the British government; or the referee may hold the seizure unjustifiable, but yet that the services to which the Caroline has been put, deprive those coerced with her of any right to satisfaction.

The local authorities must administer justice to us, an attempt to evade trying Mr. McLeod by admitting him, (certainly by a great stretch of law, for murder is not a bailable offence), to bail; the mob, however, interfered and caused him to be detained.

Now as far as those proceedings have gone, of whom have we a right to complain?

In the first place, of Mr. Macleod, for having, in violation of sir F. Head's express orders to resist on the defensive and do nothing of which the American government could justly complain, began his campaign by an act præsumptively illegal, and defensible only on the extreme pins of necessity.

Secondly of lord Palmerston, who allowed the American remonstrance, on so grave a subject, to remain three days unanswered. We are aware that it was a disagreeable question. We had to face ourselves by the same means, the same arguments, recrimination; and lord Palmerston probably thought that the conduct of neither party having been irreproachable the best plan was to make no answer, in the hope that no answer would be required. And we are not sure that this conduct might not have succeeded. But the folly, and if the facts which we have are correct, the vanity of McLeod, in going among a people before whose tribunals he must have known that the burning of the Caroline was a questionable act, and boasting of his part in it, have revivified the success of lord Palmerston's dilatory policy, and now force on the controversy, and certainly under unfavorable circumstances.

But have we also not a right to complain of the American authorities, either of the supreme government or of the local authorities? We say decidedly that up to the latest intelligence, we have a right to complain of neither. The American authorities have done precisely what we should have, and indeed must have, done under similar circumstances. If a mixed band of French refugees and English ruffians were to take part in a French civil war, to land on the French coast, and plunder the neighboring country if they derived recruits and supplies from our shore, and before our government could prevent their doing so, a steamer should run from Dover to France and carry them arms and men, and return at night and moor in Dover harbor. Under these circumstances, a band of French volunteers should at midnight enter Dover harbor, attack the steamer, lose her from the pier, and endeavor to kill the crew and scuttle the vessel, should we, or should we not, on the alarm being given in the town, interfere to stop such proceedings? If we should interfere, it could be on the ground only that such proceedings within our territory, were unlawful. If the whole matter were effected before our coast guard could interfere, should we, or should we not, attempt to intercept the actors in their retreat? If that could not be effected, should we not remonstrate with the French government? If that government gave no answer and a person describing himself, or described by others as implicated in the attack, came to Dover or in any part of Kent, would he not be arrested and committed for trial? And if the French government required him to appear, would he not be obliged to attend in obedience to the lawful commands of his superiors, would not the answer, be—"This is the first time we have heard of this act actually let it be pleaded at the trial, let the court decide whether he acted in obedience to his superiors, and whether the act was of such a nature as their command could justify. But we will not, (the Americans say they cannot), interfere till the trial is over."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

[AN UNKNOWN mistake was made in making up the last number of the Register, which was not discovered until after it was published. The record of Mr. Biddle's letters was inserted instead of the first—both having been prepared.—The subjects treated in these were entirely distinct however. The first and third of his letters are interesting; the second, the fourth and fifth will be inserted in our next—a sixth is announced.]

From the National Gazette.

FIRST LETTER FROM NICHOLAS BIDDLE, ESQ. TO THE HON. JOHN M. ANDREWS.

Andalusia, Bucks county, April 8, 1841.

Hon. John M. Clayton, Dover, Delaware.

MY DEAR SIR: During your late visit to Philadelphia, you were good enough to express your opinion of the peculiar hardship of my position in respect to the late meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States. For sixteen years I had been the president of that institution, which up to the late war, I felt it enjoyed a measure of prosperity. Two years afterwards it fell into great trouble, and it seems to be the desire of those now connected with it to ascribe all its misfortunes, including the fatal resumption a few weeks ago, to the late war, and to the mismanagement of the late directors. I am, however, inclined to think that in a fair and open and manly way, no one would have been more ready than myself to meet that question. But instead of this, what was the course pursued? The committee of stockholders has been three months at work with all the printed papers of the bank under their control, raking up every thing which by distortion may injure my administration, or revenge their own personal griefs, or tender to the morbid appetite which prevails abroad about banks and those connected with them. From all comminution with that inquisitorial body I was studiously excluded; and I understand that I proposed to invite my attendance or to apprise me of what they were doing, was rejected. They ended at last by reporting exparte and partial statements in regard to myself; and, as you saw at the meeting, no opportunity was given to me to be heard, and no opportunity was given to the report is widely circulated, where no official authority in distant places, has an explanation of mine can ever follow it. Now all this seems to me a signal act of injustice. I know that misfortune has a right to be querulous, but this summary condemnation without a chance of explanation or defence, a privilege never denied to the humblest criminal, cannot fail to be regretted even by those who are joined in it, when the passion of the moment has been allowed to prevail. I leave on my own account, however, than because I think such an act of injustice inflicts a severe injury on the bank itself—I regret it still more because, although separated from the bank, I felt a sincere interest in its fate and had prepared with great industry what I deemed the means of reviving its prosperity, which I meant to submit to the stockholders.

All that, of course, is over now. But as I know you are desirous of ascertaining the truth, I shall proceed to explain to you as a personal friend several matters, very simple in themselves, but which have been so widely misinterpreted, or, at least, so misunderstood. You heard in the register a long and elaborate story about cotton purchases, and it is so often said, that many begin to believe it—that the Bank of the United States speculated largely in cotton, and lost a large sum of money by it. I deeply regret it to disturb so established a fact—but the truth is, that during my connection with the bank, it never owned a bale of cotton—and will not, I believe, lose a dollar by any operation in cotton, unless by great mismanagement hereafter. That whole matter has been to me a source of so much pride, from its benefits to the bank and to the country, that I take pleasure in stating the real history of it.

In the year 1837, the bank went to the relief of the city of New York, by issuing its bonds payable in London. The question was how to provide the means of paying those bonds. Hitherto the only mode of doing it was by the purchase of bills drawn at the south on shipments of produce—but the difficulty now was, that in the general prostration of credit at the south, there was great danger in taking private bills drawn there—while many of the bills were not paid, and the losses were usually drawn were themselves embarrassed. It occurred to me, therefore, that the only mode of avoiding these dangers was to purchase no bills at all, except founded on direct shipments of produce under the control of the bank. It seemed equally the mercantile part of the directors to engage in that operation—but finding none of them disposed to large operations, I determined that as it must be done, I would do it myself. I accordingly requested Messrs. Brevin & Humphreys to carry out the plan, which was simply to let their agents at the south draw on them domestic bills, for which they would receive the notes of the bank, purchase the produce, and send it to France or England; then as their domestic bills came to maturity in Philadelphia, to pay the bank, by sterling bills on the houses in England and France, to whom the produce was sent, and by whom it was sold. This was the whole operation, which was carried out in the summer of 1837 to the fall of 1839. It was undertaken without the least idea of any pecuniary advantage, and the only understanding on that subject, was a verbal assurance from me—that if after repaying these advances to the bank, there should be any excess, as the bank could not by its charter buy this produce, or of course take any profits arising from it, such excess should be given to those who encountered the trouble and the responsibility. Nor was there the slightest desire to enrich it. On the contrary, all the correspondence and entries, I believe, passed through the bank—it was announced over and over again, in publications known to come from the bank; and it was particularly described in a published letter of mine to Mr. Adams, on the 10th of December, 1838, of which the following is an extract:

"In like manner, the derangement of the currency placed the staples of the south, entirely at the mercy of the foreign purchaser, who could have dictated the terms of sale to the prostrated planter. It was thought proper to avert that evil by employing a large portion of the capital of the bank in making advances on the south produce. This had two effects. The first was to provide remittances to pay its own bonds in England, issued to New York merchants in their extreme distress, for, as the bank could not purchase these staples, it made advances upon them in the south, receiving, in exchange, bills on Europe—the second was to introduce into the market a new competition, and thus prevent the unconditional subjection of the planter to the foreign purchaser. These advances, as we made not as in past years, on the mere personal security of the merchants, which the confusion of all private credit would have rendered too hazardous—first, on the actual shipment of the produce to an American house in England, and second, what I call to protect American property, from the reckless waste with which it has been often thrown into the market, with an entire disregard of all American interests. The consequence of this measure, the application of capital on this side, and the prudent reserve on the other—has saved to the planting interest an amount which it is difficult to estimate below ten or fifteen millions of dollars. I believe that nearly one-half of the commercial debt of this country to Europe has been paid by the mere difference between the actual sales of the securities and staples, and the prices they would have realized, had they been thrown unprotected into the hands of European purchasers. These measures were of a temporary nature—they were measures of emergency, adopted in the midst of a public calamity and to be discontinued with the necessity which caused them. The time will come when the staple and industry of the country had time to subside into their accustomed channels, these operations were relinquished, and now they have totally and finally ceased."

In the same time the benefit was very great alike to the bank and to the country. To the bank, because it got the advantage of a large circulation of its notes—it got the premium of its drafts from the south—it got the funds in Europe without the least risk, and a large collection in the southern States. What is more important still, the possession of these funds abroad was the means of protecting and saving the agent of the bank; and, of course, the bank itself from prostration. Of this, the most decisive evidence is a declaration made by the president of the bank himself, in a letter to Messrs. Brevin & Humphreys, of the 5th of February, 1840, in which he says—"The state of the debt due by the bank to Messrs. Humphreys and Biddle of Liverpool, has been for some time the subject of great anxiety. These gentlemen have, with a zeal in favor of the bank, to which our thanks are particularly due, sustained Mr. Jaudon in many periods of his long struggle with the bank, and advanced large funds, but with all they could raise on their credit, and have enabled him to meet his payments, when but for their assistance, he would not have been able to extricate himself."

Finally, the operation was of great use not merely to the bank, but to the whole country. The total prostration of all means and all credit in the south at the time, placed the whole crop at the mercy of the foreign purchaser. The purchasers made no purchase of our staples, and the foreign purchasers to give something more like the real value to southern produce—it made an actual difference in favor of the southern states of at least twenty or twenty-five millions—which was a great benefit to the south, and a great loss to the northern states as well as to the bank itself.

While these operations were in progress, I left the bank—about two years ago—and the whole matter of the bank was left to the hands of Mr. Cabot, of the house of Messrs. Brevin & Humphreys, and the bank, there of course, could do this whole business on the intermediary between the bank and his house. His statement was as follows:

story should be preserved, not merely to show the suffering stockholders the influence which have mislead them, but as a curious illustration how abuse and insignificant causes produce great disasters. I pay you therefore to follow me down through these my stories.

On the docket of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia—on the equity side—in the following entry:

Chasney Hickman for the use of the president, directors and company of the Bank of the U. States, and the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States,

Manuel Eyre & Chas. Massey.

Here is a suit the purpose of which is to decide a claim for a sum varying from 15,000 to 40,000 dollars, according to an account which the bank wishes to compel the parties to render.

Without meaning to give any opinion about that case, the simple fact that the bank had just brought a suit against Mr. Charles Massey, was of itself sufficient to prevent his being a member of the committee of investigation. Before any tribunal he would have been rejected as a juror, and a sense of propriety should have induced him instantly to decline the appointment. His partner, Mr. Manuel Eyre, had been appointed a member of the committee of complaint against him was hit out of the board at the last election—a source of keen disappointment. These feelings found other stimulants to support them. Mr. Eyre is understood to be the largest stockholder in the Schuylkill Navigation company, of which he is appointed to be the president, and these three persons, Mr. Massey, Mr. Lippincott, and Mr. Eyre, and their friends are believed to have nearly all their fortunes dependent on the success of that work, while they have no interest in the bank—Mr. Massey owning only two shares, Mr. Eyre three, and Mr. Lippincott five. It was at one period thought a probable speculation, but every day it is encroached on by later improvements, and more especially by a rail road going directly to the very mouth of the river, so that its stock which was sold at $170 or $180 a share, is now on its decline, and has already reached $65 or $60. These parties are extremely sensitive on the subject of every new improvement which may interfere with them, and they are more particularly bitter against this Reading rail road, which, when completed, will probably supersede the river navigation. Now the Bank of the United States has been obliged to take for debt a large number of shares in the Reading rail road, and with a view to protect its own interests has given facilities to finance the road so as to make it productive; some of the officers and directors were also holders of shares in the road, and what was still more criminal, Mr. Jaudon, while in England, had secured a mortgage loan or loan from the company. Now the owners of the navigation company saw clearly that if these persons should be rendered odious, if the Bank of the United States could be broken down, it would carry down this Reading rail road, and increase the profits of the company. This is really the foundation of the whole of this attack upon the bank.—It is the vengeance of the Schuylkill Navigation company against the Bank of the United States for lending money to the Reading rail road.

Of that I argue the stockholders of the bank have been already the dupes, and I am very much afraid will be the victims.

To carry it on, availing themselves of the confusion of the annual meeting, in which Mr. Lippincott, prepared a committee of which he was of course made chairman, Mr. Massey another member, and four others completed the committee, which had power to fill their own vacancies. Three out of the six members declined serving, and the remaining three filled their places, and as of these remaining three Mr. Lippincott and Mr. Massey were the majority, the committee is in fact a committee of the Schuylkill Navigation company. All this our gallant friend capt. Stockton began to explain in his meeting, but he was silenced at you said, by the impatience of the crowd. Very soon after they began their labors, which were originally confined to an examination of the assets of the bank, came the last suspension of specie payments—and then for the first time they received from the board of directors a resolution declaring "that the board is ready to afford them every facility in the prosecution of any investigation which the committee may be willing to make of the affairs and transactions of the bank and its directors of its officers, and that it is the wish of this board that the committee should make such investigation." Up to the date of the suspension, and while the bank believed that they could go on continuing specie payments, they determined to keep this committee of investigation to their proper sphere of verifying the assets, and had so instructed the committee of the board appointed to meet the committee of investigation. But the moment they found that they could no longer confine their proceedings—in the alarm and confusion which followed, they appealed to the committee of investigation and begged them now to examine the causes of their prostration. That the purpose of this was to relieve them by throwing the blame on their predecessors, cannot be doubted, nor is it less evident that the committee as perfectly understood it as if it had been in the resolution, for the most remarkable character of the report is this—that from the beginning to the end there is not a cause, nor a remedy mentioned, any transaction of the bank within the last two years. There seems to have been a tacit understanding that the committee might investigate what they pleased if they would only abstain from touching the present board. "We cannot," says the committee, "an examination of the affairs and transactions of the bank, and the causes of its actual situation"—and yet they find no cause, no transaction, no reason for the actual situation, but that it is not at least two years old. It seems to me as if my administration had been sold to the committee by these directors at the price of their own safety. Had they nothing to say about the protest by Messrs. Hottelinger & Co.—nothing of the injury to the credit of the institution by the late note notes in the fall of 1839—nothing of the publication of the 1st of January—nothing of the resumption—nothing of the third suspension?—Not one single word. The stockholder wanted to know why his stock was reduced from $116 in March, 1839, to $17 in March, 1841. He pointed to the protest by Messrs. Hottelinger & Co. reduced the stock $16 a share—that was a loss of $5,000,000 dollars;—the publication of the 1st of January, 1841, brought it seventeen dollars a share lower—that was a loss of $6,800,000 dollars;—the suspension in February still further reduced it $30 a share—that was a loss of about $10,000,000. None of these trifles seemed worthy of these anxious inquirers after truth, but having at last obtained permission to examine the private accounts they repaid it by confining their attention to those only whom they hoped to injure, and abstained from all serious notice of what concerned those in power at present. Accordingly during these three months' inquiry, they examined the private accounts they repaid it by confining their attention to those only whom they hoped to injure, and abstained from all serious notice of what concerned those in power at present. Accordingly during these three months' inquiry, they examined the private accounts they repaid it by confining their attention to those only whom they hoped to injure, and abstained from all serious notice of what concerned those in power at present. Accordingly during these three months' inquiry, they examined the private accounts they repaid it by confining their attention to those only whom they hoped to injure, and abstained from all serious notice of what concerned those in power at present.

Accordingly, when they have finished these gossiping, they seem to have done their work, and all that they have to do is to give their information to the board of the bank is that during the existence of the late Bank of the United States on the 6th March, 1839, the committee of exchange was authorized to make stock loans at five per cent. and they object: That such a power ought not to be delegated; That the committee made too large loans to individuals and firms;

That they ought not to discount but only buy bills of exchange;

That they kept no minutes but gave verbal orders to the officers of the bank; and that

Their transactions "were never submitted to the board at its regular meetings nor is it any where mentioned on the minutes as having been reported to the board, or as having been approved."

Now, what I mean to prove is this: That these exchange committees have been in use since the foundation of the bank—very beneficially to the bank.

That this board have from time to time granted to other exchange committees the same powers heretofore delegated in 1835.

3d. That the board have instructed them not to confine themselves to exchange—but to make discounts, and to accept promissory notes on the necessity of reporting their proceedings to the board.

4th. And finally, I mean to prove that of all the directors of the bank, from its commencement to this hour—the man who has been the most decided in his support to the doing of the committee of exchange—the man who again and again declares that the committee of exchange should not confine itself to mere bills, but should make discounts, and should not report its proceedings to the board—that man, this honorable member, Mr. John Lippincott, who now, as chairman of the investigating committee, denounces these committees and boards for not doing this very thing, which he himself insisted they should not do. I shall at the same time prove that next to Mr. Joshua Lippincott, this individual who was most zealous in the same cause, is Mr. Manuel Eyre, the real member of this committee, through his partner, Mr. Massey.

5th. With regard to the exchange committee: In the year 1834, a committee of the senate of the U. States was appointed to investigate the Bank of the U. States, and of that committee Mr. Tyler was the chairman. The recent elevation of this gentleman to the chief magistracy could not induce me to believe that he would not preserve me from saying, that no man ever went into that bank with a more sincere disposition to seek the truth, and to expose what he should find wrong; but his inquiry, though thorough and severe, was conducted in a tone so decided and at the same time so gentlemanly, that it was a pleasure to give him every information he sought. One of the objects of his inquiry was the history and formation of the exchange committee. He traced it from its beginning in 1817 to its more regular form in 1821, and he concludes with this: "The committee on exchange was created at the same time with the committee on the offices and other committees, has continued ever since, and exists as your committee believes not only in strict conformance with the laws, but with propriety to the bank and convenience to the public."

2d. As to the power heretofore conferred on such committees,—On the 9th of July, 1830, on motion of Mr. Alexander Henry.

Resolved, That the committee of exchange be authorized, and the committee of exchange be approved public stocks large sums of money at a rate of discount not lower than five per cent.

On the 17th of September, 1839, this power was extended by a resolution offered by Mr. C. Fisher, as follows:

Resolved, That a resolution adopted by the board on the 9th day of July last, authorizing the committee of exchange to loan on the pledge of public stock, be so modified as to permit such loans to be made on the same, or other approved securities, at a rate of interest not less than 4½ per cent. per annum.

Now let us see what was done by this committee of exchange, of which Mr. Eyre himself was chairman. Under this resolution of 1839, a loan was made which happened to attract the attention of the committee of congress, in 1832, on which occasion Manuel Eyre, made, under his own hand, the following startling statement:

"Resolved, That the committee of exchange be authorized to make investments at any rate of interest not less than four and a half per cent. As chairman of that committee I called upon Messrs. T. Biddle & Co. several times and passed with them a considerable number of their operations with us, and urged them to take two or three millions of dollars or more at five per cent. and for as long a time as they wished. They were not willing to take the loan for as long a time as they wished, but they were not willing to give up as much as might suit their convenience. The committee, upon undoubted security, loaned them upwards of 1,000,000 dollars at 5 per cent.—which loan is now reduced as your committee has observed, to 600,000 dollars, and will pay an interest of six per cent. It was thought a very advantageous arrangement to obtain such a large investment at 5 per cent. on such undoubted security, when the committee were authorized to loan of four and a half per cent. I have always regarded the operation as one in which the bank was the favored party, and I think it may be safely and truly said that the account of Messrs. T. Biddle & Co. has been one of the most advantageous accounts in the bank."

MANUEL EYRE.

April 5, 1832.

Here is a chairman of a committee of exchange, who urges a single house to take two or three millions of dollars or more for as long a time as they wished, and then declines to do so, and declines to give up as much as might suit their convenience. The committee, upon undoubted security, loaned them upwards of 1,000,000 dollars at 5 per cent.—which loan is now reduced as your committee has observed, to 600,000 dollars, and will pay an interest of six per cent. It was thought a very advantageous arrangement to obtain such a large investment at 5 per cent. on such undoubted security, when the committee were authorized to loan of four and a half per cent. I have always regarded the operation as one in which the bank was the favored party, and I think it may be safely and truly said that the account of Messrs. T. Biddle & Co. has been one of the most advantageous accounts in the bank."

3. That the committee of exchange should be authorized to make discounts as well as purchase of bills. Now this was done in consequence of instructions in fact given by Mr. Lippincott and Mr. Eyre the trustees, of which the following is a copy:

On the 21st of April, 1833, the following preamble and resolution were offered:

"Whereas it is proper that the ordinary business of the board should not be transacted by a smaller number of directors than that required by the charter, and whereas the business of discounts and purchases of bills is of such a nature as to be properly transacted as heretofore it has been at the meeting of the board. Therefore,

Resolved, That the duties of the committee on exchange shall not extend to the business of discounts."

On this resolution you will of course suppose that these great champions of loans exclusively by the board would have heartily embraced this proposal. Well—this resolution was made the order of the day for the 18th of April, on which day it was called up, when, strange to say,

Mr. Eyre moved that said resolution be postponed to the day fixed for the consideration of the rules of the bank, and said motion, equivalent to a rejection, was agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Eyre, Lippincott, White, Henry, Sargent, Fisher, Newkirk, Lewis, Holmes, McKim, Biddle—13.

Nays—Messrs. Macalester, Gilpin, Sullivan, W. Elder, Wagner, Taylor, Astop, Neff, Brown.

On the 2nd of May, 1833, the board proceeded to the order of the day, the consideration of the new rules and regulations for conducting the business of the bank [being the same which were adopted and are now in force in April, 1841].

On that occasion, the following amendment was offered:

"The committee of exchange shall act as a daily committee at the bank, and afford their aid and advice in all cases relating to the interest of the bank of the institution, but their duties shall not extend to the business of discounts. They shall lay before the board at every stated meeting, a statement of their proceedings which shall be read before the discounts of every day are settled."

This amendment was rejected, by yeas and nays, as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Sullivan, Wager and Gilpin—3.

Nays—Messrs. Lippincott, Eyre, Bevan, White, Fisher, Chauncy, Newkirk, Macalester, Lewis, Holmes, Potter, Biddle—13.

At the same sitting, this amendment to the rules was proposed:

"A statement of the proceedings of the committee on exchange since the last stated meeting shall be reported in writing and read," which was rejected by yeas and nays by the same inflexible haters of loans by the committee on exchange. The votes were—

Yeas—Messrs. Gilpin, Wager, Sullivan, Willing, White, Macalester, Potter—5.

Nays—Messrs. Lippincott, Eyre, Bevan, Fisher, Chauncy, Newkirk, Lewis, Holmes, Biddle—9.

The decision by this vote was in fact an instruction to the committee that they ought to include discounts in their business, and that they need not report their doings to the board.

Mr. Lippincott and Mr. Eyre, as members of the committee on investigation, think it wrong for the exchange committee to discount—still more wrong for a cashier alone to discount!—and they were doubtless here added, if they had thought such an anomaly conceivable, that the extremity of wrong would be for a director to obtain discounts from the cashier without the knowledge of the board—yet I am assured by the latter committee that both Mr. Lippincott and Mr. Eyre, while sitting as directors, frequently asked and obtained from him large loans which they did not submit either to the board or to the committee. These acts of kindness ought to have prevented any very violent indignation on their part against loans by the cashier.

But say the committee, the exchange committee keep no minutes—make no entries—but having decided any thing, give verbal orders to the officers to carry it into execution. Well, in what other way do the committees report? Mr. Lippincott has been, I believe a director for more than twenty years, has been a member of many of the committees, and chairman I believe of them. Did he ever keep minutes? Did he ever prepare such a thing—think of such a thing? Does any exchange committee of any bank in Philadelphia keep minutes? And now at the end of these twenty years he comes to reproach his ancient colleagues with not doing what he did not do himself.

And now we come to the final and most important part of this report.

In a year or two after the vote of the bill rechartering the bank in 1832, it prepared by degrees to retreat back to Pennsylvania by the gradual sale of its branches, and by the concentration of its assets in stocks which might at any time be available in any aspect of its affairs, either to wind up or to expand under a new charter.

Accordingly on the 6th of March, 1835, there is the following entry on the minutes:

The president submitted to the board a general view of the situation of the bank; its means and liabilities; its circulation and deposits; and the probable future demands upon it showing its ample resources and power of expansion.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Cox, seconded by Mr. Henry—

"Resolved, That the committee of exchange be authorized to make arrangements on the security of the stock of this bank or other approved security—and if necessary, at a lower rate than six, but not less than five per cent per annum."

Let us see then who are the persons composing these exchange committees to execute this resolution. They were according to the appendix to this report:

In 1836—March 4. Messrs. Platt, White, Newkirk. Oct. 7. White, Lewis, Price.

In 1837—Jan. 6. Messrs. Lewis, Price, Platt. July 11. Cope, Humphreys, Taylor, Astop, Neff.

In 1838—Jan. 5. Platt, Cabot, Wain, Oct. 9. Wain, Lewis, Vanderkamp.

In 1840—Jan. 7. Price, Lewis, Newkirk. July 7. Price, Cabot, Handy. Oct. 13. Wain, Handy.

This then was the settled course of policy of the bank until its future fate could be ascertained. No one can deny that this was the true course for the bank. Now this, according to the committee, is the source of all the disasters of the institution—and they assign as reasons the size of the loans made, and the want of minutes by the committee, which they admit answered for "bills receivable," in a small memorandum book under the charge of one of the clerks. And then we are led to imagine that these irregular loans having once got into this gulph of bills receivable lay hidden from every business man.

This was undoubtedly what this committee would have persuaded the stockholders—this was what they meant to insinuate without asserting it. But by one of those lucky accidents which sometimes attend the origin of a very fortunate discovery, and by one of those unconscious put forth statements which not only fully contradicts the whole of their report, but convicts their chairman, Mr. Lippincott, of the grossest negligence or coyness. As long as the committee wished to prove that the officers of the bank and the exchange committee were guilty, it suited their purposes to represent these persons as concealing their proceedings. But having accomplished this, there were still some directors—some stockholders probably of the Reading Bank—who were to be persuaded, and sought to, therefore, turn short round, and declare that these very proceedings were constantly before the directors, who, they insinuate, are guilty of neglect in not examining and stopping them. Thanks to this blind rage for more vengeance, they thus reveal what completely answers all that they have previously written, and never, certainly, was seen at the quarter sessions, any witness caught more completely in his own trap. All that is seen in the following extract from the report:

"By the thirteenth standing rule of the bank, it is provided that the committee on the state of the bank, composed of five members, and elected by ballot every three months, should at least once a month, lay a list of service examine and count the discounted notes; and compare the amount thereof with the balance of the amount of bills discounted in the general ledger; they shall also count the cash, and the printed and the unprinted paper in possession of the cashier—examine the evidences of the public debt and property of the corporations, make an inventory of the same, to be compared with the books in order to ascertain the agreement and report to the board." The custom appears to have been for this committee to confine their examination exclusively to the cash, bills discounted on personal and other security, the issues, and the printed and unprinted bank paper on hand. The account, however, of the general state of the bank, submitted to the directors at every stated meeting, contained the items of "bills receivable on the bank stock and other security," which included as well the bills receivable for sale of branches as the loans made in the manner heretofore advertised, and "foreign bills of exchange," under which had been continued the advances on shipments of merchandise. Thus, on June 28th, 1835, on which day an examination was reported by the committee on the state of the bank, there stood to the debit of bills receivable the sum of $13,106,074 55 cents; and of "for-foreign bills of exchange" the sum of 7,216,109 dollars, 34 cents.

This is truly astounding. Here it appears by the declaration of this committee itself, that at every stated meeting of the directors for many years, all these loans were deemed so secret—all these advances on cotton—every species of investment which is the subject of reproach was submitted to the directors. Every day did these directors see on the table before them this list of loans and advances, and any director who wished for the particulars had only to ask for it and the whole details would have been immediately brought into the director's room. Not merely every director examined—but every director saw the amount of the special duty it was to examine it, according to the bye laws, every three months.

Now who were these committees on the state of the bank, whose business it was to control the exchange committees? They were:

In 1836—March 4. Lippincott, Neff, Brown, Trotter, Beyerland. October 7. Neff, Troth, Beyerland, Newkirk, Cope.

In 1837—January 6. Newkirk, Lippincott, Bohlen, Vanderkamp, Handy, Taylor, Astop, Neff, Lippincott, Bohlen, Lewis, Hickman.

In 1838—January 5. Lippincott, Lewis, Bohlen, Brown, Connell. October 9. Cope, Neff, Cabot, Astop, Hickman.

In 1839—January 11. Wain, Hickman, Astop, White, Newkirk. July 5. Astop, Hickman, Wain, Newkirk, Ingersoll. December 17. White, Newkirk, Cabot, Cope, Price.

In 1840—January 7. Wain, Neff, Connell, Handy. Cabot, Astop, Taylor, Astop, Neff, Brown. October 13. Neff, Lewis, Martin, Byrne, Brown.

But more especially let us follow Mr. Lippincott.

We have just seen by the above extract from the report of the committee that on the 28th of June, 1838, on which day an examination was reported by the committee on the state of the bank, there stood to the debit of "bills receivable," the sum of $13,106,074 55, and of "foreign bills of exchange," the sum of 7,216,109 34.

Here then was every item of all these loans and cotton purchases before a committee whose business duty it was to examine them. Who was this committee? What directors were they, so lost to their duty as not to examine them? Let us now propose them. Who, above all, was the chairman of that committee, the natural leader of that great reform? Amos, for human infirmity. In the appendix of the committee's report is a list of all the committees for several years past, which it appears that on the 29th of June this vigilant committee on the state of the bank, stands recorded, and at their head is

LAWRENCE LEWIS,

JOHN BOHLEN,

JOHN A. BROWN,

JOHN CONNELL.

And now when this Mr. Lippincott goes before the stockholders to complain of abuses, let him be asked by some independent man what he did on that occasion. Say to him did you examine these statements? If you say no—then you betrayed your duty—then you were faithless to us. If yes—then why these proceedings which now, nearly three years afterwards, you come to us to denounce. You are unjust to us in either way, and we fear that all this pretended zeal in our service is but a mask to conceal your own selfish purposes. Let us now candidly say that to him, and see what he will answer.

On the whole, my belief is, that this movement is a conspiracy got up by the managers of the Schuylkill Navigation company, aided by a few great persons for several years past, to ruin the hopes of their selfish associates—that to carry their objects, they have by misrepresentations irritated the stockholders into a measure which cannot fail greatly to injure their interests, and that the Board of directors have been sacrificed to the jealousy and the despair of the Schuylkill Navigation company.

And now I have occupied you long enough with these mis-usable intrigues, and will release you with the assurance of the sincere respect of,

N. BIDDLE.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1841.

Mr. WRIGHT said it would be unnecessary for him to say that he had not power to answer the remarks of the honorable senator from Kentucky who had just taken the seat, (Mr. C. J. H.) He (Mr. WRIGHT), had been too long there, and was ion well known in that body, to attempt to follow the unhappy course of remark—the keen and cutting satire of the honorable senator from Kentucky. He was a naive plain and humble part—dancer so far as he understood them, and of argument so far as he was able to bring arguments to bear on their facts. He could not be an unexpectedly called upon to address the senate to immediately reply to the senator from Kentucky. The senator on his right, (Mr. BUCHANAN), to whom the appeal had been more particularly directed, had given no floor to him for a particular answer, but being prepared, as he, (Mr. W.) was not, without examination into the facts, to answer the remark which had been made on the subject of certain items of public expenditures.

He should discuss but one single topic, first briefly noticing, and very imperfectly, some of the remarks of the honorable senator from Kentucky. But first it was due to himself that he, (Mr. WAIGHT), should offer his humble apology for the interruption of the honorable senator, not that it was noticed by the senate, but because it was disconcerting on his part. Still it was a compliment to the gentleman's powers as a debater, for it was an interruption which nothing could have drawn from him but the rapidity and force with which he was rushing to conclusions calculated to carry his hearers along with him, and to lead the senate, as Mr. WAIGHT thought, to erroneous impressions upon the points he was discussing. Hence the interruption, for which he could not but feel his pardon.

[Mr. CHITTENDEN courteously remarked, in an under tone, that apology was wholly unnecessary.] Mr. WAIGHT continued. The honorable senator then told the friends of the present administration, they had attempted to bring an apology for his party. Now, if he had said or done any thing which should seem to have given the honorable senator just cause for such an imputation, he had said and done what he did not intend to say or do. He, (Mr. WAIGHT), came into a minority floor in this country, and he had been called upon on various occasions, since the meeting of the senate, to say that he desired to demean himself with all becoming modesty and humility in that unfortunate condition; but yet he might say to the honorable senator, while that honorable gentleman was presenting to him 1,200,000 votes on his side as too large a body to be ascertained, that 1,100,000 freemen, as a minority, might look and smile, though they should not sneer. He admitted that the administration, which was in control, did not do much to cause in by a vastly larger vote than any which had preceded it; and he would tell those gentlemen—and he did it with feelings of kindness—that they came in, in the face of a minority, in numbers and proportion much more powerful than any previous administration ever yet met. Let, then, on all hands, the admission of the honorable senator be looked to; for, while it does not belong to the minority to sneer, the majority have not advantage enough to exaggerate. The great sea of public opinion cannot bear deep agitation, without some stanger of a change of power, when the difference between the contending parties is so small, and a change of ten per cent. may easily be wrought against him who here excite this immense sea of mind, even upon the surface. Let all, then, look well and carefully to their measures and to their policy. He took the reproof, or desired to do so, with which the honorable senator had favored himself and party; and he would not be glad to reply by it. At the same time he wished to impress the honorable senator and his friends with the palpable truth that a strong party must do right or be overthrown. He appeals to the public judgment of the freemen of the country. He cheerfully acknowledged the priority of the tribunal, and its perfect jurisdiction, while he believed the representatives of majorities might be sometimes wrong, and that constituent majorities were easily changed or over-confidant on the part of the representatives, and by consequent measures having some reference to interests and classes than to our entire constituency.

Another position of the senator, in the course of his interesting argument, was that they, (the present majority), "was a dying party, upon the last stage of their condemned term," were endeavoring to do—what? To occupy the ground of the future administration, and forestall its measures. Was that so? Had the majority of the present period, in which they had had the measure of distress together, warranted such a charge? They had, it was true, introduced the measure under discussion—a pre-emption bill—a prospective pre-emption—and this, it was true, in that respect, was not a legislative act, but a policy of the future administration. What were the great measures of policy, as he believed—for no man could speak with any certainty on the subject—which were looked to by the whole country as the measures of the coming administration? A destruction of the system of finance of the present administration was, he supposed, the most prominent. Were they, (the present administration), responsible for creating that? Or were the other honorable senator from Kentucky would discharge them from such an accusation, for he would feel honored in acknowledging that he had himself called upon them, (the present majority), to undo what the present majority had done, to do by those which govern the gentleman opposite, they had done. He, (Mr. WAIGHT), complained not; yet surely they ought not to be charged with attempting to forestall the measures of the coming administration. Thus far, the present majority, the law establishing an independent treasury for the country was thrust upon them almost as soon as they were in their seats, and from one of the great leaders of the opposition to that strictly constitutional and truly republican measure.

Next, as to the proposed distribution to the states of the proceeds of the public lands. Was not that looked upon every where as one of those measures which would be favorite and prominent with the coming administration, and as a measure against which the present majority, and any friends who have sustained an immovable opposition? Where they then to be charged—and he would observe, if he should appear to speak warmly, that he spoke with no unkindness—were they to be charged with attempting this measure before they had, by acting upon it, forestalling the measures and policy of the new administration? Certainly not. The honorable senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CHITTENDEN), should concede that it was through his influence that the present majority, and any friends of the present administration, that this question has been forced on this body, and calls for its action and its judgment.

Taking the facts, then, as they stood, were the friends of the administration chargeable with forestalling the policy of the triumphant administration which was now so near? It had seemed to him that they were not. There were many other remarks of the honorable senator which he might notice, but he brought it to a question, before the senate, for the purpose of discussing before the single point which had called him to the floor.

The proposition before the senate was to recommend the bill to the committee on public lands, which he would do it, with instructions to report a bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands to the states, as a part of the instructions proposed. The point he wished now to discuss related to this part of the instructions; and although, at the commencement of the debate, he had proposed to himself to discuss this whole subject of distribution, his present intention was to examine one single ground upon which the policy of distribution was urged.

He had been persuaded to take this course of this topic, because he had seen the short period which remained for the transaction of business during the present session of congress, the press of business to be done, and the great anxiety of the peculiar friends of the pre-emption bill for its passage.

This should control his present efforts. But if the debate should take a different direction, or if he should retain a seat in the senate, and a future occasion should arise, in consequence of a future prosecution of this policy, he might then claim the right of discussing this subject at large upon the proposed measure in all its aspects.

At the present time he would consider but one of the arguments by which it was supported in the country, and in the minds of a portion of the constituents of the present congress. He referred to its connection with what is familiarly known as the tariff, or the protective policy of the country. It must be known to many members of the two houses of congress that, with a large portion of the people of the New England states, and he believed the same thing was true of portions of his own state, this policy of the distribution of the proceeds of the lands was popular, not so much from any love to the appropriation and application of these proceeds as from a wish to have that amount, whenever it might be subtracted from the treasury, that there might be an occasion to increase the duties on imports to an equal amount. This idea, if indeed it did prevail in the tariff states, must, it would be said at once, rest upon the supposition that the more duties there were imposed upon imports, the more protection must be afforded to domestic manufactures or products coming in competition with the imports thus burdened with duty. Is this a sound inference? He was aware the inquiry was addressed to some states, which were supposed to be favoring the protective policy. He was not sure the position was sound or practical, but it seemed to him to be both. He was also sensible that it might, at the first impression, strike the minds of the members from the anti-tariff states as being an argument, if it had any force, in favor of the policy of the distribution. He entreated all to listen to the suggestion, and to pause a moment, with them well before they should be made the foundation of official action upon either side of this important question.

When, then, does a duty commence to be protective? Is it so either to our manufacturers or our producers while the foreigner has the entire and exclusive possession of our market for the sale of his manufactured article or foreign production? All would say so. The duty, under such a state of things, would be a mere impost, a mere tax, and not, in any possible sense, protect any domestic interest. The operation of the tariff of duties must commence to be exclusive and prohibitory before it can begin to be protective. It must, to some extent, take the foreigner from our market, and open it to the domestic manufacturer and producer, before its protective features can be of all value; and when this process once commences, the further it is carried in its exclusive and prohibitory action, the more protective is the tariff and the which it takes place.

But what mer be the effect upon the revenue of this protective action? In the precise proportion in which it is exclusive and prohibitory, it must diminish the revenue upon imports. In other words, as far as the tariff is a mere impost, it is not, in effect, just so far it must be a tariff not the most perfectly fitted for the purposes of revenue. That tariff which is best adapted to the purposes of revenue, by itself considered, must be that which promotes the greatest amount of importation, and the greatest amount of revenue combined. That tariff which is best adapted to the reasonable purpose of protection is the one which shall place American and foreign interest of the same character upon a level with our markets, and this is the least amount which the tariff interest can desire.

Try, then, the policy of this measure with these interests. It is now proposed to separate from the treasury, to give away the revenue from the lands, our principal source of internal revenue, and that for the many taxations to be imposed, to increase higher duties where protection is desired. This is acting upon the principle, not simply that the higher the duty the greater will be the protection, but also that the higher the rate of duty the greater will be the amount of revenue.

A single reflection will convince any one that this will be true only while the foreigner has the exclusive possession of the market, and, by necessary consequence, the duty is not protective at all. If the high rate begins to exert the influence of driving out our own produce or manufactures compete with him in the market, the question of revenue immediately becomes incidental, and its amount will depend, regardless of the rate of duty, upon the advantage which the state of trade and of the market gives in the foreign or the domestic parties, at any given period. If the protective influence shall predominate, the foreigner will be driven from the market, and the revenue will fail. How, then, is it to be supplied? Most clearly, if it is supplied only resort, by a reduction of the rate of duty, until the foreigner can again come into the domestic market, upon grounds of advantageous competition. In other words, by taking from the tariff its protective and exclusive pre-emption. Can there be a doubt that this must be the principle of action in all such legislation?

How, then, is the principle of protection to be preserved consistently with its action? By giving away or destroying all our source of internal revenue, and by increasing our treasury wholly dependent upon imports? Or by fostering and preserving every source of internal revenue, so far as the state of the treasury will permit, that when our tariff for revenue shall, by the course of trade, or exchange, or national policy, be compelled to reduce our rates of duty, to invite the foreigner into our markets to undersell our own citizens, that our treasury may be sustained from the duty to be imposed upon the importations? The proposition now under consideration is to give away to the states, to take from the national treasury, our richest source of internal revenue, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, an amount of from three and a half to four millions of dollars annually, and to throw this revenue into the hands upon a revenue from customs for dependence and support. This, too, is proposed to be done at a time when the whole revenue from lands and customs is not equal to the payment of the ordinary expenses of the government, and when it is a large policy to be adopted? Why is this most stable source of revenue to be cut off, and given away in gratuities,

Among other grounds assigned for the strange policy, one is that it had mentioned—so far the protective policy, by making the occasion for increased duties upon imports. Could it be necessary for him to say more to show that this ground was not untenable—that this policy would be suicidal to the interests it was advocated to protect? It seemed to him not. The proposition was too plain to admit of amplification. Duties, to be protective, must, to a greater or less extent, exclusive and discriminatory—must have a tendency rather to restrain than to increase revenue, by giving a fair portion of the market to domestic products and manufactures, to the exclusion of foreign; and, when there is a deficiency of revenue from imports under such a system, it must be supplied from internal sources, or the protection must be surrendered, the duties reduced, greater advantages given to the foreigner in our market, and the importations be thus increased. Under our system, the internal sources of revenue are the proceeds of the lands, excise and direct taxes. Give away the former, and who expects a congress will ever be found to resort to either of the latter to raise revenue, when it can be raised by duties on imports? Who will believe that excise, or any taxation on the people, will be resorted to as a protective tariff? No man acquainted with the feelings of the people, or the action of legislative bodies elected by the people, would indulge such a hope.

Our sources of internal revenue, which do not depend on taxation, are not, as the protection is, protected, or a protective policy cannot be independently pursued.

Take the articles of wool and woollens, the great northern and eastern interests. So regulate the tariff of the American wool, that it shall be equal to the foreign article, and that American cloth can enter into the consumption of the country in fair competition with the foreign, and then experience, as at this time, a deficiency of revenue, that arising from an immense public domain having been taken from the treasury, and given to the states. What are you to do. Will higher duties produce more revenue? Not in the case supposed; for when the competition is even, or balancing in favor of the domestic interests, higher duties will be a disadvantage, and while protection may be rendered perfect by such legislation, all revenue will be lost. You must reduce the duty, then, and thus invite importations to raise your revenue, and, having no other resource, the treasury would be empty.

It is a mistake, then, to assume that this measure will necessarily favor the protected interests and the protective policy. It may injure both. It is a mistake to suppose that forcing the treasury to an exclusive dependence upon revenue from imports will secure the system of protection. It may destroy it. The treasury of the nation must be supplied; and its such imports as are consistent with the system of protection do not yield the requisite revenue, the protection must be yielded to the necessity for revenue.

There is another consideration growing out of the policy of making the treasury dependent upon a revenue from imports alone, which deserves the serious examination of all who are in favor of adopting the policy for our country. Where will rest the control, both as to our supply of revenue and the protection of our domestic interests under such a policy? Will it be in the hands of congress, or in the hands of the executive? Will it be in the hands of foreign hands? Make the treasury of the nation an exclusive monopoly, importations. Those interests which regulate the trade of the world govern our importations; and they are, at all times, subject to the influences of foreign interests and foreign policy, as well as our own.

By exclusively depending upon these importations, and, it, too, must be equally in subjection to the same influences. The protective features of our tariff become, in their operation, injurious to some important interest of our country. It is a policy which is to extend, and produce a desire on the part of that country to change our rates of duty. Our treasury is solely dependent upon revenue from imports, and, by consequence, proportionally dependent upon importations from the countries in question. It shares the trade with us. Our revenue falls out, and our treasury is made empty, while we are told, reduce your rates of duty and the suspending trade shall be renewed and extended. Can congress regulate this attempt to control our policy by a foreign power? Can it contravert policy if it will that will not produce revenue, or fill our treasury; and, if our sources of internal revenue be destroyed, or given away, it can only be adopted and sustained by a resort to direct taxation. What, in such a case, would be likely to be done? Would our system of protection be adhered to, or our duties be reduced? If we have the land revenue to supply the treasury, the contraverting policy will be likely to govern us, but if it is to be resorted to at the expense of direct taxation, protection will be very sure to be yielded, and the treasury supplied by a reduction of our rates of duty. In short, if we place our treasury in a condition to be exclusively dependent upon customs, our policy must be to invite importations, to burden the country with a policy, which they are not likely to foster by giving away our sources of internal revenue, and forcing ourselves into a state of entire dependence upon foreign trade for the supply of our national treasury? It seemed to him not.

Nor could this view of the operation of this distribution, properly considered, condemn the measure as the policy more acceptable to the anti-tariff interests. They desire the least possible amount of duties consistent with a healthy and certain revenue; and, it is admitted, on all hands, that the distribution to the states of the land revenue will produce the most necessary of an increase of duties to the full extent of the money taken from the treasury for distribution. Whatever, therefore, may be the effect upon the protective policy, the influence of the measure upon the free trade principle cannot be equivocal.

These suggestions had been hastily and crudely given, and yet he hoped he had sufficiently developed the views which should be bound to be taken, and understood him. It was to them he desired to address himself upon that point. They would reflect upon the ideas he had thrown out, and he knew they would also take all the weight they deserved, if, indeed, they should be found to be correct.

He would take up but a very few moments more of their time to briefly replying to some other observations of the senator from Kentucky. If he understood that honorable senator—and he begged him to believe that he did not wish to misunderstand him—he said that the present administration had spent one hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars in the four years of its term; and that upon roads, harbors, canals, ships, fortifications, &c. there had been expended nine millions of dollars.

He (Mr. WATSON) said he did not mean at all to examine this matter, but he believed in the four years they had been in the habit of passing bills annually for fortifications of from a half to a million of dollars, and of from five to ten millions for the navy, separately from the support, repairs and the like, as well as ready large appropriations for steam ships, or harbors, large appropriations nearly annually, if not entirely so; though for roads and canals, he was happy to know little or nothing had been done, because he considered all such expenditures by this government wrong in principle and injurious to practice.

Mr. CHITTENDEN said, in justice to himself, he should explain that he did not include the repairing of ships, and the pay of the officers and the men, but the new building of ships.

Mr. WATSON had understood the senator to speak simply of the ships, and not of the pay, but he supposed he had intended to include rebuilding, repairs and similar expenditures.

Well, then, the senator said there were some one hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars which had been expended within four years, and how expended? Why, expended in pursuance of appropriations made by themselves (congress), and for that whole period they had had the honorable senator's personal supervision and care over them, and he believed he did that honorable senator no injustice when he said, that if he had seemed to feel more dissatisfied at one time than another with the votes of him, (Mr. WATSON), it was when he voted against appropriations. He said that he had never seen him have been abused in expenditures—he was not prepared to say there had not been; but he said cheerfully—what the honorable senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) said yesterday—made him feel that he was not in the right, but with a patriotic feeling towards the country and its interests. If there had been abuse, let exposure and punishment be visited upon the guilty; on him, if he were the man on his head—tied; on any man, wherever he might be, in this vast nation, who had embroiled the public money, who had squandered it improperly, or who had been unfaithful in a pecuniary trust. He again said, examine, but examine with justice and truth. That was all the favor he asked, and he would appeal to that gentleman, for the vote of the members of which he cherished a feeling bordering on friendship, and to do their opportunity—let tell the truth of them—and to put them only when they should be found, after careful and fair examination, to deserve it. The papers and records were soon to pass into their hands, and the means of investigation would be ample. Let not the desire to find fault be paramount to the obligations of truth and justice.

Another subject has been employment to the honorable senator's talent for saline in no stated measure. He referred to the proposition of the president of militia, which the president is said to have organized, to prosecute the Indian war in Florida.

Previous to the late elections, the honorable senator and his party found a very different story touching the military and the investigation would be ample. Then his purpose was a "standing army" of 200,000 men—militia, it is true—to be used, not to subdue the murderous Seminole, but to prostrate the liberties of this free country, to break down the constitution and the union, and establish a military despotism upon the ruins.

He (Mr. WATSON) could not forget the startling ground of the opposition during the late contest, because he had then, as now, constantly found himself contending upon this point before meetings of the people, and then, as now too, as the result had proved, contending against outgunnia who were more than a match for him. Then the president was a Federalist, and tyrant, and through the instrumentality of his neighbors our brethren, our brothers, sons, the militia of the country, converted into a standing army, out of regular soldiers with their permanent officers, but of militia, was to destroy the liberties of this country, and to rule over six million of people as a despotic spot, supported and sustained by these 200,000 citizen soldiers!

What is the present now? In what frightful aspect does the senator present him to the country on this day? As imbecile in the extreme; as a tyrant an Indian war of some four or five years' duration, which has baffled the efforts of our whole gallant little army for that entire period, by means of a sedentary troop of six or seven hundred, a corps of sedentary militia of that formidable number.

One thing he (Mr. W.) hoped he might now assure himself, and that was, that this new army of six hundred soldiers would not frighten from their property the soldiers who were in the country. The senator was no distinguished a member, nor render them unconsciously uneasy in regard to the safety of the liberties of the country; most especially so when a few weeks must terminate the command of their present officers.

Look at these positions. That men who, on the first days of November, was to cleave down the liberty of the people by a standing army of militia, was now, in January, to defend the country by 600 men, whose duty it was to sit still, and stand, and who were limited to an employment within twenty miles from the place on which they sat. Now, he thought there was a little extravagance in all this; and he could not believe, after all, that there would thereby be much added to the expenses of the government.

Mr. CHITTENDEN read the order of general Rusk, to which he had referred, but the reporter could not obtain a copy. Of the authority of the order, Mr. C. said he knew nothing. It had been placed in his hands, and was a publication from a newspaper.

Mr. WRIGHT had only referred to the matter because it had been introduced by the honorable senator. He thought it was a subject which he felt before the senate, and was not disposed to consume further time about it. What he had learned from the remarks of the gentleman, and the extract he had read from an unknown authority, constituted the whole of his information upon the subject. He had never before heard of even the existence of this militia force—this sitting army; and he certainly did not desire to extend remarks upon a subject about which he knew nothing.

A word more to be said. The honorable senator complained that there had been a wanton expenditure of money for supplies for the army in Florida and the Creek and Cherokee countries; that provisions had been purchased for high prices, which were not used; and that they had been sold at public auction for low prices. These might be facts. The senator read from a printed document which he (Mr. WATSON) had never seen, but which he presumed was good authority for his positions. Did it follow, however, that the present president was in fault in the matter? Did it follow, by necessity, that any person was in fault; and, if any person, would it not be more just to state who was the officer in command, who had charge of the purchases, and to whom the public agent the property had been thus sacrificed?

There had been a period in our history, if he was not mistaken as to facts, when provisions purchased for the use of our armies, at a dearer rate even than those referred to by the senator, had been piled together and burned, to further light for a distinguished retreating general from a retreating enemy; and yet, neither the general, nor the administration under which he served, was condemned either for the military achievement, or the loss of the public property. This did not take place, as his manors told him, upon the southwest coast, but upon the northwest frontier, and not during the Florida war, but the war with England of 1812—13.

Had the officer in charge of this property in the Indian country pursued this course; had he, instead of his auction sale, burned the supplies, and made a precipitate retreat, the result might have been as well as himself; might have been spared these sharp censures. He, however, as Mr. WAIGHT believed, had accomplished the duty assigned him, and was ready to dismiss his force, to their homes, just as they were mules, and other service so far as they were regular; and the supplies not being wanted at the station where they were, and transportation being the principal ingredient of their cost, he took, whether wisely or not, the expedient of a public sale, and a second transportation. If the prices paid at the sale were low, the loss was the greater, but it was not a total loss, nor was the property consumed to furnish a light, nor for a purpose, but retreating generally. He thought it would be authorized to say that if the entire public loss in the one case was not cause for censure upon the general, but rather for his greater elevation, the partial loss in the other could not be a broad ground for the sweeping condemnation of a man and his administration.

Mr. WAIGHT. I rise to say a few words in answer to the honorable member from New York, (Mr. WAIGHT), on the amendment which has been moved by the member from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN), and which proposes to connect with this pre-emption bill a provision for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the states.

I have been of opinion, for several years, that such a distribution, made on principles of justice and equity, doing justice to all the states, new and old, is a proposition which makes daily progress in public favor, and must at no distant day, receive the sanction of congress. I have, indeed, little doubt that the measure will pass at the next session, carrying with it a proper provision, by way of pre-emption, for actual settlers. I have not, however, the expectations of those of the new states to whom less of the public land has been given for purposes of improvement than to the others. But I shall not discuss this subject now.

The honorable member from New York has intimated that the general feeling in favor of distribution, which prevails in the northern and eastern states, arises from the hope that, when the treasury shall be deprived of the income from the land office, it will become necessary to replenish it by laying heavier duties on importations, and in this manner greater protection to American manufactures may be secured. In other words, being not in favor of distribution, he invokes against it the fears of a high protecting tariff.

It is not for me to say what reasons may actuate others, but such is not my ground of proceeding. If there were not a single article produced in the country which needed or deserved protection, I should be of the same opinion I now am.

Whatever reason there may be for the objection lies in this, that, looking to the original object of the revenue made by Virginia and other states, and to the fact that the debt of the revolution has now been paid, a fair case is presented to the states to say that the proceeds of the public lands should be divided amongst them, according to numbers, as the nearest approach that can now be made to the original intention, in the transaction of commerce.

This is the general ground. No doubt it is a measure affecting the finances and the state of the treasury, and this part of the case has not been overlooked.

I know, of course, that distribution among the states, of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, reduces, by so much, the general receipt into the treasury, and for one man quite ready to make up the deficiency by new duties, to be imposed on certain articles of luxury. I have always spoken of such articles as proper subjects of duties. I have referred particularly to silks and wines—which are not of the class of protected articles. It is true, congress has been strenuously petitioned to protect the silk manufacture, but the rate of duties which has been suggested would probably be little efficacious for such a result.

But looking at the subject in a merely financial point of view, it appears to me that duties ought immediately to be laid on these articles. Why not? They are articles of consumption almost entirely by the more affluent. They are not of the necessities of common life, or essential to any branch of our own industry. Why then not collect duties from them; I am of opinion that an ad valorem duty of twenty or twenty-five per cent. would probably quite supply the deficiency caused by withdrawing the proceeds of the lands from the treasury. And this is exactly what I recommend to be done. Distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the states, and make up the loss to the treasury by a duty on silks and wines. This is my policy, my true policy, and I have no objection to this question, thus stated, steering clear of all dispute about duties for protection. It puts the simple question, at once, is it better for all the people that silks and wines should continue to come in free, or that they should be reasonably taxed at a custom house, and the proceeds of the sales of land be divided among the states? This is the plain, narrow, direct question.

The honorable member from New York supposes it not wise to rely entirely on duties on imports for the support of government. Certainly, in times of war, or apprehension of war; but such duties have been our main reliance for two-thirds the history of the government. Their amount is, of course, somewhat uncertain, and fluctuating, but, hardly less in times of peace than during the period of land sales. At the close of the late war, the income from the sales of lands was very small. I remember to have called on Mr. Madison, on the 4th or 5th of March, 1817, the period of his retirement from office. He spoke upon the subject of the public lands, and remarked that northern and eastern gentlemen were not sufficiently sensible of their importance, and went on to observe that, in his opinion, no prudent management they might in a year produce a million and a half a year, or certainly a million! So low was even his estimate at that time of the income to be expected from this quarter. We have seen it reach, at least, in one year, twenty times that amount. But even with such high hopes from the public lands, the amount of justice or a hundred millions, the internal taxes were repaid, and the nation trusted to commerce for the supply of the treasury.

The honorable member from New York seemed to be in reasoning into the form of a syllogism. You rely on importations, he argues, to furnish revenue, and yet you lay duties to check importations.

[Mr. WAIGHT signified dissent to this statement.]

Mr. WAIGHT. I so understood him; but, of course, he can best explain his own meaning.

[Mr. WAIGHT explained. He said his argument was that, his idea of protection was this. The idea of protection by duties carried with it the idea that they should be such as to preclude foreign competition; and to be protecting duties they need not be revenue duties; nay, they might operate to stop revenue altogether.]

Mr. WAIGHT. So I understood the honorable member, exactly. And none can doubt that if a government relies on duties upon importations for its revenues, it would be absurd to lay duties so high as to prevent importation. Certainly, I maintain no inconsistency of this kind. But it is not always true that moderate duties diminish importation at all. Sometimes even high duties have not that effect. There is no reason to suppose that a small duty on silk would greatly diminish its importation. It is certain that it would not. It would raise the price. Although the general rule is true, that duties are paid by the consumers, yet there are instances in which the duty falls on the producer, by depressing the price in the market of production. Our made up experience in some articles, and the idea of traffic has shown cases of that kind. All this depends on the nature of the article, on the number of markets which it finds in the world, and on the proportion of its whole produce which usually finds a market in the country where the duty is laid. But this subject is too extensive and various to be discussed now.

In my opinion, duties necessary for revenue should and may be so laid as to give accidental protection to our labor and industry. In this respect we have wide field for just and careful selection. But it is my opinion also, that duties must be laid, sometimes, on articles, the labor of which we do not produce, and therefore where no such incidental benefit accrues. And such is the case of silks and wines. The whole matter, I think, can be satisfactorily adjusted, if all parts of the country, and all interests, will consider the subject calmly, and not under the influence of any false alarm.

Much has been said of the late election, its causes, and its probable consequences to the country. It is not my habit to discuss such things in the senate. I do not indulge, however, in extravagant hopes of the immediate restoration of our former prosperity. Things will mend, but their amendment must be the work of time as well as of wisdom. The deep-seated disease is, derangement of the currency, and, in my opinion, this will never cure itself.

I may be permitted to say that I think the friends of the present administration may gracefully endeavor to abstain from angry declamation in advance against that which is to succeed. The coming administration may fail to satisfy the country—that is uncertain; but the present administration has failed—that is certain. One has been tried, and has not been fortunate; let the other have a fair trial. I believe the person who has been elected to the presidency will bring to the discharge of his duties as much uprightness of purpose, as frank and honorable feeling, and as impartial a regard to all parts of the country and all interests, as any man ever brought to the performance of public duties. And I doubt not that those who are elected, or who are to be elected, to seats in the next congress, as they will come fresh from their elections, and with a full knowledge of public opinion in various quarters, will be in a condition to act usefully and acceptably on leading public measures.

I had hoped that gentlemen here would have been found willing to leave these important questions to their successors. We are already past the middle of the short session. There is no reason to believe that the pre-emption bill, or any other measure respecting the public lands, can get through both houses. I say, then, again, in words of measure. Why consummate this so profitably? On the subject of pre-emption, I have differed from many of my friends.

I am favorable to it, and have supported pre-emption bills before. I will not, however, vote against this. But I am only wasting time upon it. In the next session of congress, I have no doubt, a distribution bill will pass, with proper provisions for actual settlers engrailed upon it. Such seems to be the general sense of the country, and since nothing can be done this session, I regret that so much time should have been consumed, and that so much more is likely to be consumed if the debate should be continued. For my part, I have no wish to be drawn into a general discussion on the subject of distribution at present. I see no benefit to be obtained by it.

Mr. WAIGHT rose to rejoin. It has been contended, said he, that the revenue for the present year will be inadequate to the expenses of government. But this is only wasting time upon it. In the next session of congress, I have no doubt, a distribution bill will pass, with proper provisions for actual settlers engrailed upon it. Such seems to be the general sense of the country, and since nothing can be done this session, I regret that so much time should have been consumed, and that so much more is likely to be consumed if the debate should be continued. For my part, I have no wish to be drawn into a general discussion on the subject of distribution at present. I see no benefit to be obtained by it.

I know that after one year more your revenue on luxuries is to fall fearfully, and I thought that one of the best resources against the revenue likely to be created by such a state of things was to leave a moderate tax on those articles which are subjects of luxury. He believes that it will do to take away three or four millions of the proceeds of the public lands, and to tax luxuries to make up the deficit. He would, however, take this laid revenue only to pay the interest on the debt, and to make this money from the treasury to give it to the states, the people must be immediately taxed to supply the deficit. Why not let them be saved from this roundabout proceeding? Why not lay a tax at once and distribute it? There is the direct way.

[Mr. WAIGHT, across, will tell you.] I suppose that the senator will say that, with respect to the public lands, there is a peculiar obligation growing out of the articles of cession; but I will endeavor, even against him, (and if I can against all Congress,) to show that the earth to demonstrate that there is nothing in the deeds of cession under which we have received the land that in the least contradistinguishes the proceeds from the public domain from any other branch or portion of the public revenue, and that the latter has never been regarded in practice. If the payment of the debt of the revolution was the contingency on which our enjoyment of the proceeds of these lands depends, that debt exist at this moment as a charge on the treasury. But I will not enter on that question.

Mr. BENTON said he had heard a condensed argument from the senator from Massachusetts in favor of the constitutionality of distribution. That argument (said Mr. B.) contains all I ever heard

GREAT BRITAIN.

Duties. There is no question at present under discussion so likely to affect the elections, or calculated to produce so great an amount of immediate tangible good, as the financial reform suggested by the report of the committee of the house of commons upon import duties. The existing tariff is felt as a burden in every house. There is not a washerwoman who sits down to her shawl of bread and butter and eulogizes it but feels its pressure. In the large body of evidence delivered to the committee on import duties, there is nothing more striking than the account of the rapid improvement of the habits of the working classes under the influence of temperance coffee houses, and the check which has been given to these institutions by the operation of our custom duties. Our traders with Brazil and the United States dread reprisals on account of our prohibitory duties. And all our great merchants feel their operations limited by the tendency of these duties to prevent the national expansion of our commerce.—The conviction is daily gaining ground, that inasmuch as all are consumers, the interests of the consumers ought to be the principal object in determining the amount and distribution of imports duties. The spirit of Hutcheson's legislation has survived, although there has been no statesman to catch up the torch he let fall; the cause has grown, although the noise of other discussions has diverted attention from its progress.

There is a vessel only waiting for fair winds to leave our country on a perfectly novel mission.—The Hecla, captain Fremont, is under engagement to convey Mr. Barclay, the agent general for Jamaica, in Sierra Leone, in order to offer to the natives of Africa, a passage to the West India as free emigrants, and so to participate in the advantages, without the pains, already enjoyed by their countrymen who have left their native land as slaves. They are to be quite unfettered by engagements before embarkation, and free to choose their own employers, and make their own terms on reaching their new world. To them the change from a barbarous to a comparatively civilized country must be beneficial. To those who look beyond the surface, this encouragement of an African emigration, which may one day supersede the slave trade throughout the world, will give no common gratification.

[Rome.

The Constitutional publishes a letter from Rome, which states that the feast of languages was celebrated on the 12th ult. at the college of the Propaganda, cardinal Mezzofanti presided at this solemnity, unique in its history. All the strangers of distinction in Rome were invited and assisted. The festival commenced by a psalm in Latin, delivered by an Italian. A young man from New York then recited a poem in Hebrew. Two Chaldeans, a dialogue in the idiom of the Rabbis. Abdiabib Asseman, a native of Lebanon, declaimed in Syrian verse; and a young man from Bethlehem delivered a discourse in Samaritan. A Persian spoke in Chaldean. Two Turks, one from Al-pipo, another from Constantinople, declaimed in Turkish poetry. The young Indians of Pegu spoke in Burman, the younger of the two, only twelve years of age, declaimed with so much skill that he received unbounded applause. Some Armenians read a Latin elegy, a discourse in ancient Greek, and verses in modern Greek. A Card read verses in the language, remarkable for the hardness of the sound.—An American of New Scotland an idyl in Celtic. Afterwards followed Illyrian, Bulgarian, Polish, German, Dutch, English and French. A negro from Gloucester spoke in American. An inhabitant of California sang a song in the barbarian dialect of his nation, accompanying himself with castanets. He was applauded, but the greatest applause was reserved for the Chinese, Joachim Kuo, from the province of Ho-nan, speaking the language of his country, composed elegies of unspeakable beauty. A second speaking the Chinese of Canton. In fine, two other Chinese of Sei-an, presented themselves in their national costume, and read verses in the idiom of their province, terminating their academic exercises by a most harmonious Chinese song. The greater part of the auditors, understood but one word "salutis," which occurred frequently. The loud applause bestowed by the young men, Catholic and Protestant, proved to the young men how much their performance was admired.

CHINA.

Lin's visit to the Americans. About a week since the ex-governor, Lin, the Foyren, several other high Canton mandarins, and some officers lately arrived from Peking, went to Whampoa, or boarded two American ships here, where they staid some time. Our correspondent suggests that this visit may have been caused by some plan of an intended improvement of the China navy being entertained.

[Canton Press.

We have been favored with the following letter, giving an interesting account of the proceedings in China.

Canton, 22d December, 1840.

DEAR SIR: The sailing of the Panama, for the United States, gives me an opportunity, of which I am happy to avail myself, to inform you of the present state of things here. Shortly after the return of the British fleet from the North, Kexien, the new imperial commissioner, made his appearance in Canton. Without any delay, communications immediately took place between himself and the English plenipotentiaries, and have been continued until the present time. As it is perfectly well known that the admiral and captain Elliot were determined to have no unnecessary delay, it is a fair inference from the length of time that has since elapsed without any hostile measures on the part of the English, that the Chinese have given satisfactory evidence of their serious desire for peace, and of their readiness to do what is necessary to secure it. As we can learn, the demands of the English are briefly these: compensation for the opium; free official intercourse; social and commercial ameliorations; the removal of the trade on a different footing; and a disruption of Lin's acts and measures. The first demand, to obtain the right of trade at other ports, and to do away with the cohong and the whole present system. However far the Chinese will yield to these demands remains to be seen. If they do not grant all, they will certainly grant many, and this will be less difficult about the money compensation, than about territorial possession, or extension of the trade to other ports than Canton.

Greatly to the surprise of the Chinese, the tone of their authorities towards the English has wholly changed; and the documents which issue from the high officers now for the first time speak the language of civility and equality. It would be more satisfactory to the public feelings so far as we can judge, if the English public feeling should be so changed; at once against England; but the present commissioner was a man of great talent and intelligence, and, as what Lin never did, the means which the English used of annoying China—the chief of which is the port of preventing the trade at the junction of the grand canal, which leads to Peking, with the great river Yangtze Kiang, by means of which they could at once cut off the whole trade with the imperial court; furthermore, the surrender of Chusan depends on the settlement of the present difficulties, and if this remains in the hands of the English, as a permanent position, they can at any time carry terror into the neighboring large cities of the coast. We are, therefore, decidedly of opinion that the Chinese must come to terms—perhaps not before a blow is struck at the Bogue, which their ignorance believes to be impregnable, but which probably could not resist the force that would be opposed to it for an hour. Opinions, however, are by no means unanimous as to the prospect of peace, for some of the old residents believe that the chance of it is so small as not to be worth calculation; but we repeat that to us there seems little doubt that an arrangement will be come to. 'Tis certainly known that the English were determined to take the forts by a given day, provided they did not see clearly that the Chinese were disposed to yield; but the day has passed, and the forts have not been taken. The two ships which have been detained at Whampoa, and the commencement of the blockade, in June, have at last been able to load; doubtless on assurance from the English plenipotentiaries that they should be allowed to pass without molestation; but this makes it proper to say that the conduct of captain Elliot towards the Americans, has been throughout, marked by a courtesy and friendliness which have been evinced by very few of his countrymen.

It seems hardly worth while to go into any particulars at present with reference to the market for tea. The supply is large the present season, and the crop of blacks is chiefly down; greens have not yet come forward freely. The quality is as good as usual, and that of the various kinds is little better. The supply of silk will be large, but neither for silk or tea can the Chinese be induced to name a price which would authorize speculation in either of them. A large smuggling trade is already going on, and there cannot be a doubt that if a settlement does not take place very soon, it will be large. A large amount of tea, &c. will find its way to the United States in this manner. The present season most of the blacks have been brought to Canton; but another, they would be allowed to remain in the neighborhood, at places from which they could easily find their way out to Macao. The impossibility of putting down smuggling in this country is evidenced by the present state of the opium trade. The drug was never so cheap in Canton as at this moment. Many ships, American and English, are already outside, or are daily expected, waiting to see what turn events will take. Should the trade open, therefore, we may look to see them loaded and immediately despatched to every quarter; before they could arrive in Europe or the United States, information by the overland route will have been received, and markets immediately be affected.

Every hour may bring news either of an adjustment or of an attack on the Bogue; but should nothing be certainly known before the Panama sails for New China, we repeat now that our own opinion is in favor of a settlement.

INDIA.

British tyranny. The rev. J. Piermont gives the following description of the horrid tyranny of the British government in this unhappy region:

"The sanguinary wars by which Great Britain has subjugated the hundred millions of India, and the stern despotism with which she rules and starves them, that her mercenary princes may roll in splendor and lap themselves in voluptuousness, have a voice and a weight thicker than the bones of the globe cannot keep out of our ears. 'A more beautiful country,' says a brother emigrant, recently of this city 'than that from Cuddalore to Tanjore (in Malras) cannot possibly be imagined. The dense population and rich soil give their energies to each other, and produce a scene of surpassing loveliness. But the taxes and other causes keep down the laborers to a state below that of our southern slaves.' 'Turn your eyes backward,' says a speaker of their own, no longer ago than last September, 'turn your eyes backward upon the scenes of last year's Calcutta, and the northwest provinces of the Bengal presidency, and I will show you the bleaching skeletons of five hundred thousand human beings, who perished of hunger in the space of a few short months. Year died of hunger in what has been justly called the granary of the world. The air for miles was poisoned with the effluvia emitted from the putrifying bodies of the dead. The rivers were choked with the corpses thrown into their channels. Mothers cast their little ones beneath the rolling waves, and they would not see them draw their last gasp, and feel them stiffen in their arms. Jackals and vultures approached and fattened upon the bodies of men, women and children, before life was extinct. Madness, disease and despair attended the progress of human power against their progress. And this occurred in British India, in the reign of Victoria the first. Nor was the event extraordinary or unforeseen. Far from it. 1835 witnessed a famine in the northern provinces. 1832 beheld one in the plains. 1822 saw one in the Deccan. They have continued to increase in frequency and extent under our sway, for more than half a century.* Under the administration of Lord Clive, a famine in the Bengal province swept off three millions; and at that time the British speculators in India had their granaries filled to repletion with corn. Horrid monopoly of the necessities of life! Three millions died, while there was food enough, and to spare, locked up in the storehouses of England! To add to the shock, and which he had been called upon to regard the last dreadful famine, (that of the last year), we are made acquainted by the returns of the custom house, with the fact that as much grain was exported from the lower parts of Bengal, in 1835, as in 1834, while millions who perished, for a whole year. Yet this awful oppression and these diabolical famines must go on, that England may export a hundred millions of dollars every year, from her hundred millions of Hindoos and Europeans, must grow instead of what, that, at her cannon's mouth, she may force her opium upon the three hundred millions of the Chinese, while some one solitary marshall, perhaps, is translating the Bible of the Christians, to bring these countless millions to accept the banner of a nation that stands ready at this moment to destroy one-half of them by war, that it may destroy the other half by poison.

PRUSSIA.

Many sovereigns would meddle thrones amid the acclamations of an enthusiastic people, eager to anticipate from their new ruler all that the policy of his predecessor withheld; and many sovereigns have seen the confidence of their people shaken on their own purposes, when they have perceived that their throne was furnished but with a few scraps of what, with no common insight the policy of the court of Berlin in the few months which have elapsed since the accession of the present monarch, for there the acts of the king have surpassed the hopes of the people. The differences which had given rise to serious dissensions respecting the conflicting rights of the church and the provincial governments have been promptly allayed. The deliberations of the foreign states belonging to the commercial league, for the adjustment of the tariff and the commercial interests of Germany, have been conducted at Berlin with a degree of intelligence and harmony between the various states which cannot but tend to strengthen the political union of Prussia to that vast national confederacy. The capital of Prussia has become the hospital refuge of men of the greatest distinction in letters, philosophy and in the arts; and the king appears to have received them in the character of representative of the European community in Germany, as well as in that of her principal intellectual ornaments. The last intelligence from Prussia announces the opening of the diet by a decree which contains the elements of constitutional government in the country. The crown pledges itself to convocate the states every two years; to give publicity to the debates and the proposals of the states; to submit to the states various bills relating to the administration of justice, and a plan for a considerable reduction of taxation, and it is possible to foresee how far the resolution of the king or the course of events will promote or check these important changes; but it cannot be doubted that the present policy of Frederick William will speedily place him at the head of the great body of the German nation, and extend the influence of his government beyond the territorial limits of his kingdom. NEW SOUTH WALES.

The Liverpool Courier, of the 1th, contains intelligence from New South Wales up to 26th October. A great want of laborers was felt there. The colonial legislative council were devising measures to encourage immigration. High prices are offered in the papers for laborers of all kinds, especially printers, coopers and watchmakers. To illustrate the advantages presented in this colony for enterprise and industry, the deposits in the Savings' bank at Sydney are stated to have been £127,000 in August, 1840, whereas in December, 1839, they amounted to only £24,469. The export of fine wool, which amounted in 1837 to only £245 in 1839 was £6,957,861. This is said to be a commodity which may be produced in that colony to any required extent. The total amount of exports, including the produce of the fisheries, had risen during the interval between 1826 and 1839, from £66,000 to £2,500,000.

At the cape of Good Hope, the export of fine wool during 1838 amounted to £26,627.

PORTUGAL.

The queen of Portugal has conferred upon viscount Palmerston and Lord Howard de Walden the grand cross of the order of the tower and sword, in testimony of her approbation of their services in adjusting the differences between Spain and Portugal.

BRAZIL.

Slavery in Brazil. A circular from the Brazilian minister of foreign affairs, to the ambassadors and consuls in Europe, was recently issued in one of the official journals. It urges the necessity on the part of the consuls to employ every means in their power, to promote within the empire, the moral and material improvements of which a new, vast and rich country is susceptible. One of these means is then alluded to in an effort to call to the aid of the consuls, the greatest number of the emigrants and our settlers. It is not necessary, remarks the circular, to ponder on the perils which the empire would run for the future, if perchance, as is no more possible, the introduction of Africans were to continue in a country in which civilized nations have united to put down the slave trade, and to establish daily, more rigorous measures to obtain this end. It is further stated, that in order to attract free labor to that country, government has prohibited the employment of slaves in any of the public establishments. This is indeed, an important reform, and in a section of the world where it was least expected. [Inquirer.]

CUBA.

Troops for Havana. The New Orleans Courier of a late date says: "It was understood in Havana, that 8,000 troops were about sailing from Cadiz for Havana. Indeed a few of them arrived last week. The report of the El Exporter was apprehensive of an attack on Cuba from some European power or other."

AT LARGE.

Dr. Gerard Troost, of Nashville university.

Professor O. M. Mitchell, of Cincinnati college.

Prager gen. W. H. Hedges, of Columbia college, D. C.

Com. Charles Stewart, of the U. S. navy.

Com. T. Ap. Calvery Jones, of the U. S. navy.

Gen. A. Eastis, of the U. S. army.

Col. S. Thayer, of the U. S. engineers.

Upon the publication of this list, the National Intelligence of Wednesday remarks: It is understood that a rule has been adopted within the last few years, confining the appointments of visitors at West Point, to one from each state every alternate year, leaving a few on the list "at large," to be selected for great public services, eminence in science, or no account of their official connection with academic institutions. The strict observance of this rule has been departed from, in the present case, by the secretary of war, in respect to a few of the larger states, where two have been appointed. There are two or three on the list from states not entitled to appointments by the rule, but who had been designated before the secretary was aware of the regulation established by his predecessor.

CONSULS. The president of the United States has recognized Christopher Frederick Plate, as consul of Bremen for the port of Philadelphia; and Walter de Lacy, as vice consul of Spain, for the port of Norfolk.

THE NORTH EAST BOUNDARY QUESTION. The New York Commercial Advertiser says:

"We learn that a convention has been signed on the part of Great Britain and the United States, which provides for the appointment of six commissioners, three for each party to the dispute. These six, if they can agree, are to give a final decision on the boundary. If they cannot agree, they are to appoint three others, and a decision by the majority of the nine is to be conclusive.

Such we understand to be the arrangement agreed upon. Some of the details may be incorrectly stated, but there are every reason to believe that the general fact, of a convention being signed, will prove authentic.

THE McLEOD CASE. McLeod arrived at New York on the 31st inst. in the steamer of the Niagara county, under a writ of habeas corpus, returnable at the May term of the supreme court of New York, sitting in banco in that city. The N. York American says:

*See Thompson's lectures at Manchester, pp. 35 and 99.

This writ has been taken out by the prisoner's counsel, in order, in the first instance, to try the question of jurisdiction, as a question of law.

Joshua A. Spencer, esq., as counsel for the prisoner, accompanied him. The district attorney of the Niagara district, Mr. Wood, and the attorney general of the state, Mr. Hall, are here to argue the case in behalf of the state.

In order to avoid excitement at Lockport, the intention of removing the prisoner under the writ of habeas corpus was judiciously kept private; and he was far on his way to this city before it was known that he had gone. The formal return to the writ will be made to-day, but this argument on the case will not, we understand, be entered upon before the next non-enumerated day, Thursday. McLeod was quite a lion on board the boat last night, and secured, we hear, to enjoy it. It is this love for being fettered, we apprehend, that has got this foolish individual into his present scrape, and come near involving two great nations in serious difficulties.

The New York Commercial Advertiser of the 12th inst. after mentioning the arrival of McLeod in that city, says—

"In the meantime, if our private advices from Washington do not mislead us—and this they have never yet done—a decision of some importance has been come to, in reference both to McLeod's case and the boundary question.

If we are rightly informed it has been agreed between Mr. Fox and the government of the United States that no further opposition shall be made by the former to the trial of McLeod. That trial to go on, under the jurisdiction of New York, without interference either by the British minister or the national government. If acquitted, as is most probable, McLeod will be discharged, of course, and the matter thus be disposed of. If convicted, the national government will then take the necessary steps to afford him that measure of justice and protection which all the circumstances of the case may require."

The New York Herald states that if the court shall deny the application for the discharge of McLeod, his counsel will apply for a change of the venue. This will no doubt be granted, and he will go to trial at such time and place as his counsel shall deem advisable. An early day is wished by the prisoner, and is desirable on every account.

McLeod is essentially in the custody of the sheriff, but no restraint is imposed upon his motions, and if he had any disposition to evade a trial and go back to Canada, or to the devil, it would seem that every facility is to be offered him. He is stout, and rather powerful man, and has been wandering about the city to-day, looking at the lions, with nobody to prevent his escape but the sheriff of Niagara county, a man much inferior in point of physical strength.

PRODUCT OF BREADSTUFFS IN THE UNITED STATES. We have received the returns of the agricultural products of the United States, compiled for the returns of the marshals for taking the census, in June last, with the exception of two states and two territories.—The aggregate is astonishingly large, and will be viewed with interest. It exhibits the growing wealth of our country. It will be seen that Michigan takes a rank among the producing states, and distances most of them, when our population is considered. In the returns we give only the most important of breadstuffs produced, reserving the other important articles for a future number:

There are no returns from North Carolina, Kentucky, Florida and Wisconsin. When we receive them we shall give them. It will also be observed, that in several instances, the population is not given, as the returns at Washington were supposed to be no correct, that they were sent back to the marshals for correction.

Recapitulation.

Bushels of wheat	66,099,947
Other grain	419,776,871
Total	102,452,926
Estimate for Kentucky, North Carolina, &c.	70,000,000

Bushels 658,826,714
Over 28 bushels of breadstuffs for every inhabitant in the United States. Of the various kinds of grain, we find the following:

Wheat	66,099,947 Bushels.
Corn	297,562,241 "
Rye	17,092,102 "
Buckwheat	9,931,299 "
Barley	3,140,937 "
Potatoes	10,499,926 "
Oats	94,461,363 "
For Kentucky, North Carolina, Wisconsin territory, &c. say	70,000,000 of all kinds.
Total	658,826,714

During the long discussion in England on the subject of the corn laws, the necessary quantity of grain required to feed an individual with bread has been closely investigated, and it is estimated, that the average consumption, including young and old, is about five bushels to a person, including the kinds of grain which are used for stock. We deduce the barley for the brewers, and the population of the United States at seventeen millions, we have a surplus of 33 bushels to an inhabitant. Perhaps one half of the corn, most of the wheat and buckwheat, and three quarters of the rye is used for bread; and the remainder of the rye and a large part of the corn manufactured into whiskey, or used in fattening stock. We dedicate the barley for the brewers, and the oats for stock, although in the western countries of England, barley is used for bread, and in Scotland, most of it is generally used. We find the resources of the United States will stand as follows:

Wheat	66,099,947
Buckwheat	9,931,299
Potatoes	10,499,926
Total	148,000,000
Rye	12,000,000
For Kentucky, North Carolina, Wisconsin territory, &c. say	30,000,000
Total	366,000,000

Over 22 bushels to an inhabitant!

In viewing the amount of breadstuffs raised, the farmer can draw his own conclusions, by the foregoing, as to the probability of a rise of price, or conjecture as to a soil for the farmer to be cultivated. At present, we demand but little, we fear the latter. At present, we see nothing to encourage more than a usual exportation.

In making a calculation, it must be remembered that there are about 4,000,000 of people in the West India and South America, who now receive their flour from us, and that for many years. Our exports to those countries, amount to near 800,000 barrels annually, and the cotton manufacturers of the country consume 100,000 barrels yearly, &c. The past year a new trade has been carried on with the Canadians.

We have taken pains to ascertain the amount, as near as we can, as the western trade with the British provinces has commenced with a very large quantity.

1,000 barrels of flour	20,000 bushels.
Bushels of wheat from St. Joseph	45,000 "
70,995 bush. from Cleveland, sent at 354.74 "
Bushels from Cleveland	886,000 "
Fresh Grand river, Ohio	11,000 "
40,000 bush. from Rochester, N. Y.	200,000 "
No returns from Buffalo and other ports on the lake

4,527,425 "

Most of this went to England, as after it once got into the province it was for colonial wheat, and estimated the ports of Great Britain, free of duty.

Thus it will be seen that our exports have diminished yearly from 1790 to this time, with the exception of the years when Europe has been at war. In 1793 we exported more than 1,800,000 bushels of wheat, in 1838 only 2,316,779, although we produced five times as much as we did in 1790.

In 1790, the wheat grown in Great Britain, was only 14,000 bushels and hardly 27,000. In 1830, wheat over 100,000,000 and barley 37,000.

Notwithstanding the immense increase of production of grain, owing to the oppression of the corn laws in this country, there is more exported for wheat, in Great Britain and Ireland, than in any other part of Europe.

The exportation of wheat into England from her provinces, is free of duty, that from the United States is subject to her corn laws, and when scarcity and starvation comes then in the face, and the price of grain reaches a certain point, the certain result is, that she takes of foreign breadstuffs, and America then comes in competition with grain from Hamburg, Danzig, Naples and Odessa. "You lead us to say a word in reply to the certain result of the corn laws, that is upon the products of the mighty west, than is given generally understood. That the farmer may understand the prices of flour to England, when he reads the quotations from English papers, we give the table of duties on the article graduated by the price of sacks and quarters of wheat. He can then make his own calculation in sterling money, (a shilling being 22 cents) whether it will pay the eastern merchant for shipment to Europe, and thus be can determine the prospect of foreign exports, and consequently know the rise and fall of the New York market.

Tide of duties.—A sack of flour weighs 240 pounds, a barrel of American flour 196 pounds, and a barrel of flour is seven-tenths of a sack by weight. When he sees in the price current as follows:—

A sack of flour	Duties on Amer. flour.
At 70c. equals a barrel at 42c.	6c. 7d.
At 68c.	47c. 2d. 10c. 0 d.
At 66c.	46c. 3d. 12c. 5 d.
At 64c.	45c. 4d. 13c. 7 d.
At 62c.	43c. 5d.
At 60c.	42c. 6d.
At 58c.	40c. 6d.
At 56c.	39c. 3d.
At 54c.	37c. 3d.
At 52c.	36c. 6d.
At 50c.	35c. 0d.

The last intelligence from England, flour was selling at 60s. a sack, which makes a duty of $2 70 per barrel on American flour, which amounts to a prohibition, so much so that duties were recently by the act of Congress, to stop purchases at over $4 30 in New York; and from the first to the tenth of last month, but 6,992 barrels were exported, which was taken at $1 50.

Nevertheless, the policy of England has been for years to protect her agricultural industry, no countervailing protection has been adopted by the United States; but on the contrary, duties upon British goods are every year lessening, and many of them are free of duty. The producers of the west are obliged to pay a bounty to England for the privilege of trade. If Great Britain would reciprocate the duties on the cotton, or on the payment of the same duties which we pay on her manufactures, then the farmer would have no just cause for complaint.

The imports of the United States, since 1790 to 1830, have exceeded the exports $793,459,853. In the same time there have been but seven years, that we have exported more than we have imported, which was

Seven hundred and forty-one million, five hundred and twenty-six thousand, four hundred and thirty dollars; which has been paid to foreign nations in gold and silver over our exports, for articles which could have been manufactured in this country. In the last ten years, near three hundred millions of this balance has accrued against us, to say nothing of the two hundred millions of state stocks which have been sold in Europe within the past five years.

In 1834, the total amount of agricultural productions of all descriptions, with the exception of cotton, exported to all parts of the world, amounted to only $204,000,000, and the same year silks to the amount of over 25,000,000 dollars were admitted to our ports, free of duty!

But, we find we are deviating from our subject, which was, in accuracy, as near as we can, the amount of breadstuffs in our country:

Go to Canada	Bushels.
To foreign countries 1840	4,527,425
Used by manufacturers	4,067,710
Shipping from New York since Jan. 1	500,000
At other ports, say	660,000
Allow for West India, and Mexico, which we usually supply	4,000,000
	11,655,135

Wheat raised 66,099,917
Exported 11,093,175

Wheat 591,894,092
Other kind of breadstuffs 287,743,729

Allowing 10 bushels in each inhabitant, which is double the average in Europe, and we have a surplus of 72,000,000 bushels. From which we conclude, that unless there is an increased demand from abroad, present prices of breadstuffs will not advance during the present season, whatever change may follow the ingathering of the ensuing crop. (Extract Daily Ad.)

ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN GEOLOGISTS. This body formed in 1840, held its second session at the fall of the academy of natural sciences in Broad street during the last week, commencing on Monday afternoon, and ending about one o'clock on Saturday. Professor Silliman, chairman for the first year, presided. The members present had at various times been engaged in general or local geological surveys in New England, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, Iowa and Wisconsin, together with occasional examinations in other states. The regret felt at the unavoidable absence of a few gentlemen having charge of state surveys or reconnoissances, was in a degree compensated by the observations of those actually present, and by the deep interest of their several communications. The opening discourse delivered by professor Hitchcock, the chairman of the last year, was replete with philosophical views, and with a vast variety of important facts which the geological surveys of our country have brought to light. This discourse it was to immediately put to press. Papers were read by several gentlemen, among whom were professors Locke of Cincinnati; Beck, of New Brunswick, N. J.; Vanuxem, of Bristol, Pa.; Taylor, of Philadelphia; Jackson, of Boston; and we believe by some others whose names do not now come to our recollection. These communications, together with the proceedings of the association, will at an early day be spread before the public on the pages of the American Journal of Science, edited by the Messrs. Silliman.

Verbal communications of great interest were likewise made by many gentlemen of the association, among whom were Mr. Nicoll, Dr. Houghton, prof. Nathaniel, prof. Bailey, Dr. Morton, Dr. Herlan, A. Brown, esq. Mr. Dodge, prof. Johnson, Mr. Sargent, prof. Hubbard, and probably by other members whose names are not now recollected. The discussions growing out of these several statements, as well as those which arose upon various written communications, were prosecuted with interest by the members, and so important a cause must inspire, and at the same time with a courtesy which is the natural effect of elevated sentiments and liberal pursuits.

On resigning the chair on Friday evening, professor Silliman delivered before the association and a crowded assemblage of intelligent citizens, in the new lecture room of the academy, a discourse which especially instructed and delighted his audience. The great outlines of general geology were sketched with a masterly hand. The actual condition of our planet both internal and external—the index to the ages of rocks—the periods of aqueous action marked by the depository strata—the curious and wonderful organized beings which once moved either on land or in the water, set this picture no longer—the amazing forces which have been at work and some of which are still in action to modify the face of our globe—were a few of the topics which centered into this excellent performance. A most interesting reference was made to the early efforts of American geologists, in which a just tribute was paid to the late president of the academy, Wm. Maclure; and the lecture very appropriately referred to the early efforts to cultivate geology, as it is termed when the now splendid cabinet of Yale college was all packed in a candle-box and brought to Philadelphia to be labelled by the late Mr. Seybert. He also referred to the fact that in the early part of the present century even London contained no means of furnishing geological instruction.

The next annual meeting is, we understand, to be held on the last Monday in April, 1842, in Boston. Prof. S. G. Morton of this city, was chosen chairman for the next year, and Dr. C. J. Jackson, of Boston, was made secretary. The friends of science have cause to rejoice at the auspicious commencement last year, and the still more happy reputation on the late occasion of the labors of this young and vigorous institution. (Nat. Gaz.)

THE ARMY. A detachment of United States marines, 73 in number, under the command of lieutenant Maddox, reached Norfolk on the 15th ult. from Washington. A part of them are intended for the ship Delaware, and the balance as a guard for the navy yard.

Indian trouble. The Wisconsin Inquirer says: "An express arrived at Fort Crawford and Winnebago, a day or two since, from Fort Snelling, with the intelligence that the warriors of the Sioux tribe of Indians, were collecting in great numbers, in the vicinity of the last mentioned military station, and meditated an attack upon the garrison. A company of dragoons from Fort Crawford, and a company of infantry from Winnebago, have been ordered, we understand, to St. Peters, to assist in the defence of the post."

THE NAVY. Exploring expedition.—Curiosities. It is stated that the ship Laussane, which arrived last week from the Sandwich Islands brought home over two hundred packages, barrels, boxes, &c. of curiosities of all kinds from the exploring expedition, which have been forwarded to Washington to be placed in the national collection there. The Laussane passed by the Sandwich Islands, and we find that the Laussane of Nov. 14th, relates to the same subject.

Noel branch of national industry. Of late the natives have driven a brisk trade with the gentlemen of the scientific corps, for the purchase of bugs, shells, corals, and all the creeping and flying things they could lay hands upon. One native carried a lot of large centipedes for sale, about twenty or so, all alive and kicking, which he had strung by slipnooses upon a stick, like a necklace, showing them round with quite a triumphant air, as they hung jerk by jerk, "docked in dead embrace." They put up in mind of the man to have come across a man dead (dunk) in the street, tied him up in a bag and took him to a dissection for sale. "Why," says the professional gentleman, as the body gave some signs of returning animation, "the alive," "I know it," says the seller, "when him and him when you want him." [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

Melancholy casualty. The Portsmouth (Va.) Chronicle gives the following particulars of a most painful event which occurred at the navy yard at that place on Thursday night. "Our whole community were paralyzed with amazement this morning to learn that lieutenant W. B. Lyne, of the U. States navy, was accidentally drowned last night during his visit on board the Pennsylvania. From what we can learn it seems that he had got out upon the mizen chains to look for something and making a mistake, or his feet slipping, he fell overboard; before a boat could reach him, he had sunk to its no more. It is supposed that he must have been killed by the fall, as he was a very excellent swimmer, he would have retained himself in the water until assistance could have reached him."

It was too greatly shocked by the suddenness of this awful event, to be able to speak of the deceased as his excellence deserves. A universal tribute among our citizens, without an enemy in the wide world, his loss will long be mourned by all who know him, and many others. The service has lost a brilliant name, the community a most excellent citizen; his partner a most kind and indulgent husband. To her the event must be one of overpowering agony. We trust that among the many who appreciate his many virtues, some one will favor us with a touching tribute to him who is gone, and gone forever."

STATES OF THE UNION.

AGRICULTURE AND MANUFACTURES IN THE SEVERAL STATES.

It seems from a recent statistical statement, that the rank of the several states in agricultural production, is as follows:

IN WHEAT—1st, Ohio; 2d, Pennsylvania; 3d, New York.

IN INDIAN CORN—1st, Tennessee; 2d, Virginia; 3d, Ohio.

The result in Kentucky are not given, it is possible she might be second or third.

IN POTATOES—1st, New York; 2d, Maine; 3d, Pennsylvania.

IN COTTON—1st, Mississippi; 2d, Alabama; 3d, Georgia.

IN TOBACCO—1st, Tennessee; 2d, Maryland; 3d, Virginia.

IN WOOL—1st, New York; 2d, Ohio; 3d, Vermont.

IN SWINE—1st, Tennessee; 2d, Ohio; 3d, Kentucky, probably.

IN LUMBER—1st, New York; 2d, Maine.

Louisiana, of course, raises the most sugar—But there are immense quantities of maple or sugar sugar made in New York, Ohio, and other states.

Looking at the above rank of the leading states in right of the principal articles of agricultural production, some curious facts may be ascertained. First: Of all the states in the union, that which probably has, and admits of to future, the most various production, (not the greatest aggregate,) is Tennessee. The reason of this will be obvious from an inspection of the map. The state embraces both northern and southern productions, the most fertile land and the most abundant mineral resources.

Secondly: The state capable of sustaining the largest population, in Ohio. This is obvious from her position in reference to wheat, corn, hops, wool, and many other productions, which are essential to the sustenance of human life.

Thirdly: The state which at this time produces the most in aggregate value, is New York. This is owing to the combination of capital, experience and population. Looking to the means of sustaining a very great population in agriculture, and again giving employment to numerous manufacturers at home & abroad, to supply that population, Ohio is far ahead of every other state; and it is this great fact, uniting with the fertile soil and natural resources, gives it such an extraordinary growth. Fertile alluvial of the day; officiating clergymen, and chairman of the committee of arrangements, in an open barouche, with the reversed flag in several carriages. There were very numerous, and it was highly gratifying to meet them together on the common ground of death's hour, without respect to creed or party, to do honor to a deceased fellow being, and a distinguished patriot.

Fourth division—Assistant marshals, colonel Owen Hamilton and C. Hughes Armstrong, led this division, in which was the FUNERAL CAR.

This was drawn by six horses led by negroes, white men dressed after the Turkish fashion with white jackets and long black trousers of the same color, gathered by a running cord at the ankle; white turbans with black ribbons, and white robes, and white gloves. The car—the same that bore the body of the deceased president to the tomb in which it was then reposing—was an object of special interest. It was an oblong square, ten feet about four feet from the ground. It was placed on four wheels, and was covered with black silk velvet, which fell in thick silken folds, bordered and festooned with black crape, fastened with tassels of the same material, and the top beset with flowers. On the car lay a coffin, made to resemble that which held the remains of the deceased, and which was velvet lined, with gold binding, fringe and tassels. On the coffin lay a small black flag of the U. S. States, with the national constitution and a sword, as if to indicate the civil and military character of the deceased, and a wreath emblematic of the honors he had won, and that had been accorded to him by his country. Immediately in front of the car followed the funeral procession, the deceased rode, on the day of his inauguration as president. He was accompanied as a war horse, with pistols in holsters, and a pair of military boots and spurs reversed in the stirrups; he was also covered with black holsters, and led by a groom, dressed in Turkish costume, with white turban, black scarf and white gloves.

The car was accompanied on either side, and followed by captain Samuel C. Owings' company of Independent Light Dragoons, as a guard of honor; they succeeded several carriages containing the pall bearers.

The fifth division—Under the direction of marshals colonel William F. Giles and Charles H. Fyne, eq., was composed exclusively of carriages of which there were nearly one hundred, making of course an important addition to the length of the line, though the occasion permitted little display in this department.

In the open barouches at the head of the line rode the honorable Mr. Ewing, secretary of the treasury; the honorable Mr. Taney, chief justice of the United States; honorable U. S. Heath, United States judge of the district of Maryland; major general Scott, brigadier general Trowless, governor of Maryland, and other distinguished citizens; captains Mayo and Grainger and lieutenant Davis, of the navy, and other distinguished citizens, accompanied by the committee of reception.

In one of the private close carriages, of which we were privileged to see a goodly number, we observed a lady, we saw "solitary and alone" in the whole line of the procession.

Letters were received by Z. Collins Lee, eq., chairman of the committee of invitation, from president Tyler, governor Grason, honorable Daniel Webster, secretary of state of the United States, honorable John Bell, secretary of the navy, and major general Alexander Macomb, commander-in-chief, accounting for their inability to attend, and expressing their regret at their unavoidable absence. The pressure of public business was the cause of absence in the case of all, except governor Grason, who has been unable to take a part in the procession, or to witness the ceremonies.

The sixth division, conducted by marshals colonel Alexander Smith and Wm. H. Norrie, eq., was led by U. S. senators and members of congress. Senators and members of the legislature of Maryland, a small party in deep mourning.

The society of Cincinnati, also limited in numbers, without any characteristic emblem of the association, succeeded, and were followed by an equally small and venerable few pointed out to us by the order of procession whom we did not fail to recognize as the officers and soldiers of the revolution.

After this honorable but dwindled remnant of the iron days of our nation's history, followed a highly respectable, though small party, comprised of the congressional representation of Maryland. They had no particular lodge of designation, but were the customary emblem of the national calamity—crape around the left arm.

Next in order came his honor Samuel Ready, eq., mayor of the city of Baltimore, accompanied by twelve members of the city council, and immediately after them, about forty of the various offices of the city government, wearing the funeral black mourning. Several members of the council were in other parts of the procession in different capacities, and we believe rarely, if not the municipal government, in the funeral procession.

A very unimportant and unimpressive the city officers, composed of judges of the courts in the city, county and state in general, a number of gentlemen of the bar and students at law, all arrayed in deep mourning. They were escorted by the regents of the Maryland university, and the trustees and regents of the Washington university, also dressed exclusively in black, and wearing the sash of the order of the North Star. The gentlemen of the medical faculty, accompanied by the students of medicine in the various public and private institutions of the city, all in deep mourning. The officers and students of the Maryland institute, military, came next, followed by the collector and the officers of customs, also habited in the same sable uniform; the division was closed by a considerable body of the militia of the county, containing a highly respectable party of captains and officers of vessels, a goodly number of that hardy, daring and invaluable corps, the volunteers, and the numerous companies of the pilots of Baltimore, and a large detachment of mariners from the craft in port. There was nothing to diversify this division but a band of music and a large national flag the general appearance of the whole was remarkably impressive from the almost unbroken shade of black which prevailed.

The seventh division, under the direction of marshals Messrs. Robert A. Dobbin and C. D. Stungiff, consisted of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, whose number and characteristic display constituted an extraordinary and interesting feature of the procession. First in the line was the Union lodge, preceded by a banner borne by Mr. James Paull. Inscription, on one side "Union lodge No. 1, F. F. V. Baltimore," and on the reverse, the device, "Hand in Hand." The motto "In Union is Strength." One hundred members were in the line.

Next in order came captain Roundtree's excellent band, in uniform, playing the admirable dirge dedicated to the memory of gen. Harrison, and composed for the occasion by Delian. The band mustered its full strength, consisting of eighteen instruments.

Jefferson lodge No. 9, under the marshaling of Mr. John S. Branches, followed, with fifty members, all dressed in uniform, carrying a portrait of Jefferson, and on the other a figure of Hope, was borne by Mr. S. Conaway.

The Mason lodge No. 8, came next, under Mr. H. W. Smith. The banner of this lodge, on one side bore the name of the lodge, and on the other an elegant device, with the motto "Friendship, Love and Truth," was borne by Mr. Alexander Owen. Thirty members were in having put the sandals from his feet, encircled by the spiritual essence, "The spot whereon those wanderers is holy ground." It was borne by Mr. Peter Ward, a member of the line, under the direction of Mr. John L. Thompson, as marshal.

Franklin lodge No. 2, followed, with a banner borne by John Edwards, eq., having a banner, painted thereon, with the name of the lodge and the date of its formation. Marshal, Mr. John C. Boker, with fifty-nine members.

Washington lodge No. 1, was next, with a similar banner to the preceding, except the likeness, which was of the "Father of his country," borne by Mr. James Sergeant. There were fifty-six members in attendance, under the direction of Mr. John L. Thompson, as marshal.

The excellent marine band, from the marine corps, Washington, under the command of col. Henderson, was designated to play the dirge for the day, and was introduced into the line. They wore a red uniform, and crape upon the arm and on the instrument; the band numbered eighteen men, and performed a funeral march, to the strains of the following march, Mr. Raphael Triay. A good thing, and well played.

The encampment of Patriarchs followed with a velvet banner, bearing their title inscribed in letters of gold, and the motto "In Union is Strength," was borne by Mr. J. J. Stewart, and the members, marshaled by Mr. Louis Burgess.

The grand lodge of Maryland walked next in order, with the motto "In Union is Strength," was borne by Mr. George Wadsworth; there were one hundred members in the line, with their marshal, Mr. J. B. Emory.

Here followed the insignia borne by members, consisting of a velvet banner, bearing the motto "In Union is Strength," olive branch and the ark, supported by twenty-four members of the grand lodge, on one side were carried four men's horses, and on the other three. The title upon a triangular velvet cushion shrouded in crape, and open at the inner side, was borne by three members.

The order was closed by the grand lodge of the United States, which was borne by Mr. J. B. Emory, the institution in this country, attended by D. G. S. Robert Nelson.

The whole line of the Odd Fellows was of course in the full dress of the order, and every lodge carried its complete insignia, but all shrouded in crape. They were, as a body, under the direction of cap. Samuel Nelson, whom they appeared to act as their chief marshal.

The I. O. O. F. were succeeded by a highly respectable society, and deserve respectful notice and attraction for us. It was the Baltimore Typographical association, and consisted of about seventy-three members, all dressed in black, and wearing crape upon the belt and arm. Upon the left breast each wore a crape rosette, the centre of which was occupied by a miniature of the lamented Harrison, and from which was suspended, with a black ribbon, a polished "rule." They were distinguished by one of the most beautiful banners in the line, painted by T. Kuckle, eq. Upon one side, printed in gold, was the motto "In Union is Strength," supporting the bust of Franklin, surrounded by a scroll inscribed with the words "Franklin our guide." On the base of the pedestal, "Benjamin Franklin, born 1706, died 1790." The reverse of the banner was of a deep green, and presented the press, surrounded by an eagle, holding in its beak a scroll bearing the apt quotation, "the tyrant and the people are friends." Below, also, was a scroll, inscribed the motto, "Printing, the art preservative of all arts."

Next to them came another society, whose appearance was not without a high degree of respectability and appropriate, and commanded the silent approval of every eye. It was the Mercantile Library association, numbering one hundred and twenty-five members in the line, arrayed in full suits of mourning, wearing badges and the usual crape. They were headed by the president, J. Morrison Harris, eq., preceded by a banner, inscribed with the motto "In Union is Strength," their institution, Nov. 1839, borne by Mr. James Howard.

The officers and students of Saint Mary's college, commonly known as the seminary in the western part of the city, were here designated by a rich banner bearing on one side their name, and on the reverse the words "formed 1799; named to the rank of university 1800." They were dressed in black, and wore the solemn emblem emblems of the day.

They were followed by the German society of Maryland, commonly known as the seminary in the western part of the city, were here designated by a rich banner, indicating their tale, &c. In their midst was borne upon a bust a large urn, having an excellent imitation of marble. Upon the square base in letters of gold, was inscribed the motto "In Union is Strength," and the body of the urn, in the same style of lettering, "in memory of the good president." It was shrouded with a veil of black crape.

The St. Andrew society came next, designated by a handsome banner, exhibiting their mutual saint bearing a cross. The members of whom there were seventy-four in line, wore plain scarfs, and in the shoulder of each a sprig of broom, the symbol of death. "Auld Scotia" has some honorable representatives amongst us, and we did not fail to observe that the motto of the United States was used to be written by the of the emblem, a worthy judge of our city court, having upon the occasion donned the emblem of this romantic land.

Next to them came the Hibernian society of Maryland, with a plain green banner without device or word. It seemed to be a fair field upon which the history of the Emerald Isle was made to be written by the of the emblem, a worthy judge of our city court, having upon the occasion donned the emblem of this romantic land.

The members were in number thirty-nine, a great many of them being engaged in other parts of the procession, as indeed, was the case with every society. They were dressed in black, and arranged with crape.

After them followed the Order Hibernian Free school, with a small banner indicating the date of its foundation, &c., with one hundred and twenty-one young men.

Then the bright tri-color of "la belle France," captivated the eye, a broad sheet of which, surrounded by a crape shroud in crape, was borne by Mr. Joseph Milburn, and was the French Citizens' association, of which there were fifty-two members. They wore a crape rosette upon the left breast, in the centre of which was observed the French Citizens' emblem, a heart of freedom so dear to the Frenchman's heart. This association was preceded by an excellent band of music, and closed the division by marshals Messrs. Wesley Cowles and C. O. Tiffany, was almost exclusively composed of literary societies, first of which came the

The division, headed by the French Citizens' association, who were assembled for the objects proposed, in Exeter street. They numbered eighty-five members, under their president, Mr. Jos. C. Naumo. A beautiful banner per, painted by Mr. L. T. Vogt, was borne by Messrs. H. Lutz and W. T. Lightner. On one side was the name and period of their institution, August 29th, 1834. On the reverse is to be seen the Battle of Marston, in front of which is a female figure, surrounded by various attributes of literature, science and art, pointing to a consolation in the heavens representing a poet. A very appropriate device.

They were followed by the Patrick Henry lyceum, with banner bearing its name and date of institution, "A. D. 1837," and about fifty members.

Next to them came the Edk Ridge Landing lyceum, with a rich blue banner, inscribed with the name of the association, with the period of its institution, A. D. 1834, and of its incorporation, 1836. "There were about fifty members in the line."

The Madison lyceum, composed of youths, numbering about sixty, were next in order, and bore a small auxiliary banner.

The Western lyceum succeeded them, and the division was closed with the Young Men's Central society with banner.

The Irish division, under the direction of marshals McDermott and John M. McKeown, was introduced by a body of men of no little importance in the present day, although their banner impressed us with the notion that there was a time when their arms were too little regarded to allow them to be borne.

The Baltimore Tailors association, which, preceded by a band of music, was distinguished by a banner having on one side a representation of Adam and Eve in the first state of innocence, and on the other the arms of the association, with the suitable inscription, "I was naked and yet clothed me." The society presented in members and appearance, no inconsiderable merit in the procession.

They were followed by the Chair Makers' society, numerous attended, and decorated by a banner, bearing the arms of the craft, the centre of which was occupied by a chair, with the inscription beneath, "An emblem we display." A band of music succeeded them, and preceded the long line of the Washington Ecological society, which was distinguished by a banner bearing a bust of Washington; the members wore a badge indicating their membership, and inscribed with the motto, "The good of the great and good man whose name they have assumed. The usual emblems of mourning were invariably worn.

The Calvert Beneficial association, which was headed by a banner exhibiting their title and the date of their origin.

The tenth division, conducted by marshals Messrs. J. J. Turner and Levi Fahnestock, was introduced, and composed almost entirely of

The fire department of the city of Baltimore, under the direction of general A. A. Milkenberger, as chief marshal, assisted by the president of the department, Mr. Jesse Hunt, and a more gratifying spectacle throughout the line and procession, than to the spectators. At Annapolis after plunage of those soldiers of peace—these conservators of life and property against the ravages of a common enemy—passed under our gaze, they could but credit with a general feeling of gratitude, which we were assured their appearance would kindle in the minds of every beholder. How readily did we forgive them all their faults, and we silently acknowledged how little we had to complain of, when weighed against the incalculable evils from which this volunteer band was manifestly able, and always willing to shield us.

The firemen of Baltimore can never fail to elicit the esteem of the such, and the admiration of the gentler sex, so long as they are true to themselves and to their own duty.

The Mechanicals of the van, with a banner indicating that it was No. 1, with a figure of Patrick Henry on the reverse. The members of the respective departments of duty, were all correspondingly and fully equipped; and as uniform of dress was not so well known to all our citizens, it would be needless and tedious to the reader to pursue the description in this particular. The "silver and blue" presented the most imposing appearance. The banner of the United States, distinguished the Mechanical Library association connected with the company, a union we hope soon to record of every county in the State.

The next company was the Union, with a banner bearing the words "Union Fire company, instituted 1782." In union there is strength," inscribed thereon; the reverse displayed the arms of the United States. Sixty members were in attendance, fully equipped.

They were succeeded by the Friendship, who mustered twenty-five members, and were introduced with a banner with an appropriate device. The motto, however, was in a foreign tongue, and though familiar with almost all living and dead languages, we never translated any German but a glass of Knecht's beer, nor any thing Welsh but a rabbit, so that it was either German or Welsh; and finding our friend who bore the standard no more so fast than ourselves, we were to confess inability to read the motto. The reverse of the line one particular. A United States flag was in the line.

The Defiance, numbering fifty-four of our good citizens of the Potomac, came next, with a beautiful banner, inscribed, "where liberty dwells, there is my home."

Lastly walked unanimously in the rear, so that our Defiance friends were just a trifle behind. The Liberty turned out a neat party of seventy-six good men and women, under a rich banner, a description of which we accidentally lost.

A band of music divided the Liberty from the Independent, at the head of which were four stalwart men in flesh-colored shirts, fitting tight to the person and displaying the full collar and arms, and the roundabout shawl, the effect of the men here is a bold array. An elegant banner waved over them, representing a figure of Independence trampling upon the emblems of tyranny. One hundred and twelve members were in the ranks. They were followed by ninety-eight members and a banner, with a device which escaped our "vigilance," though we remember that it was surmounted by a shield, and the men here a bold array. With two which have been allotted to our share, we could only survey about two-thirds of what we were desirous to bring under the notice of our readers.

The next division, under the direction of solemn strains brought up the formidable pioneers of the redoubtable New Market, with their axes polished and redlining upon their shoulders; under a banner representing an Indian standing upon a rock, with a bow in his hand and an arrow drawn to the head, remarkably well executed, and designed probably for Metastasis, or more equally renowned hero of the scalping knife. The members numbered ninety-two, and notwithstanding the terror of their name, we could see nothing in their appearance beyond a set of stout, hearty, good natured citizens.

The Columbian, a Felts Point company, followed with a banner inscribed with the date of their institution. They mustered fifty-seven members, and made a bold array.

The First Baltimore Hose made an elegant and comfortable appearance, numbering sixty men, under a rich banner, inscribed with their name and the period of their origin.

The United Fire company, represented by sixty-five substantial young men, under their banner of unity, followed in the ranks, with the same six, for the honor or subordination which their predecessors had elected.

The Washington Hose company presented the strength of ninety-eight active men, in their neat, dark uniform, following a banner indicating the time of their association.

Next to them came the Patapsco, with the banner of the company, numbering fifty-eight men, active, good and true, as we have seen upon many a busy time.

The revived Howard have struggled through their difficulties, and displayed under their banner, exhibiting the period of their incorporation, thirty men.

A new company called the Watchman, who were introduced by a banner, upon the reverse of which their first appearance in procession on Monday, and presented ninety-five men for the service of our city. Their equipments are in the hands of the city, and the apparatus to exercise themselves upon, when they are needed. The members are generally young and appear to have ability—we are confident the will engage in the most arduous service. Although the reverse of this noble department, they may if they choose be seen in the front ranks.

The Wrecker Club, No. 1, comprising some score of young men in red striped dress with a flag, came next. We do not understand the object of the club, and therefore, cannot enlighten the reader on a point which might have excited some curiosity at the no.

The Laurel Factory delegation with their magnificent banner, which was displayed here upon a former occasion though the devices have since undergone a very arbitrary change, was very much admired. They numbered something over a hundred men and closed the division.

The eleventh division, directed by marshals Captain J. W. Watkins and Mr. James A. Lee, brought up those societies which have within the past year acquired a degree of weight and importance that is producing a corresponding respectability in the eyes of the public, and of social life. They were introduced by

The Washington Temperance society, numbering in its roll ranks some two hundred men, and who were introduced by a banner, inscribed with the motto, "The immortal Washington, and otherwise decorated with the insignia of their cause.

The Female City, Market and House of Temperance societies, several hundred strong, with banners and devices, as recently displayed when the pledged men of the city composed a procession themselves, and closed the division.

The twelfth division, headed by assistant marshals John W. Randolph and D. H. Richardson, consisted of the Maryland Soldiers' Co. of five hundred men, and a band of five white sails. Junior holding services in one hand and a sprig of laurel in the other. A golden cross above, with these words, "In this sign we conquer." The members of the company appeared in a uniform, an anchor, square, compass, an anvil and plough. The reverse, a green ground bordered with a wreath emblematic of shame and lurch staff surrounded by a wreath of olive. In the centre father Matthew administering the temperance pledge to an assembly, male and female—motto at the base, "The apostle of temperance." President of the society, rev. P. S. Schuchert.

Maryland Junior Catholic T. S. of Baltimore, banner green sail, with yellow fringe—motto, "Just as the sun shines on the just and the unjust."

Thirteenth division, assistant marshals, Geo. Rea and Francis Burns, consisted of the following temperance societies.

Whatcoat T. A. society. Banner, on one side name and date of formation, 1832; on the reverse a weeping widow, with a tomb on which a newly dead man, laid in mourning. The motto, "We are not to be comforted by intemperance. Inscribed are the words—"O! intemperance, what hast thou done?" and "no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven." Banner, blue silk with gold trimmings. Device, a female figure leaning on a tomb of pushing water, her foot on a serpent. Motto, "we are not to be comforted by intemperance. purchase and use of all intoxicating liquors, as a beverage."

Baltimore Jay Temperance society. A handsome banner, with the words "pledge, total abstinence, formed 1837."

Washington Junior Temperance association. Banner, blue satin, gold letters, tassels and fringe—device, bust of Washington—motto, "We are not to be comforted by intemperance. a wreath of olive and oak; and above the whole a constellation of twenty-six stars. On the reverse were the following words: "Proclamation to the Washington Junior Temperance society, by the members of the 10th ward." On the top of the staff was a miniature representation of a fountain.

Washington Junior Temperance association, auxiliary No. 1. A very beautiful banner, bearing the temperance coat of arms, with a cornucopia and other devices, surmounted by a male and a female figure. The Young Men's Central society, introduced in 1840. A handsome banner, with a fountain in the centre, the water gushing forth—a male figure on one, and a female on the other side of it—with the inscription, "Come ye all to the fountain."

Marion T. A. society. Banner purple, letters gold. On one side, "Total abstinence—formed January 6, 1841; on the reverse, a lady pointing to heaven, the motto, "We are not to be comforted by intemperance." The Young Men's T. A. society had on one side of their banner the date of its incorporation, February 5, 1841, with a hand holding a pitcher inscribed "pure water" and on the reverse were the words, "may we keep our pledge."

Western Franklin, auxiliary No. 1 to the Washington, with a very handsome banner, inscribed with the date of its formation, January 8, 1841, and the motto—"Temperance, the handmaid and guardian angel of virtue, liberty and independence."

Jefferson, auxiliary No. 2 to the Washington, Banner, blue satin, gold letters, and trimming, with suitable devices, and the motto, "our cause is glorious, and will prevail."

Mount Vernon, auxiliary No. 3 to the Washington, Banner, name and date, and on the reverse a single star.

Fortenth division. Assistant marshals, Col. John E. Stonewall, W. G. H. G. Citizens of the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th wards.

Fifteenth division. Assistant marshals, Robert Howard, M. C. Jenkins. Citizens of the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th wards.

Sixteenth division. Assistant marshals, H. Snyder, T. E. Hembelsch. Citizens of the 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th wards.

Seventeenth division. Assistant marshals, Washington Booth, Mrs. Joshua Dwyer. Baltimore Butchers' association, mounted, followed by citizens from the county, mounted. The military escort, in the ranks, the citizens of several wards; the banners turned out in great force, wearing white aprons and having a banner with appropriate devices; and they, together with the citizens from the county, brought up the rear in a fine and imposing style.

The procession wound its way by the circuitous route indicated in the programme, to Mount Vernon Place. The Washington monument had been put into mourning for the melancholy occasion; and on the west side preparations had been made for the delivery of the oration.

The scene at Mount Vernon Place, was grand and imposing. The military escort, in the ranks, the citizens came in view, the grounds around the monument were covered with thousands of spectators. The quiet expectation of the crowd was at length broken by the exciting spectacle of a frightened horse, escaped from his rider dashing along amid the alarmed groups of men, women and children. Fortunately, by course was soon arrested, and although several persons, and breadth escapes, no one was injured. From all points the crowd continued to pour in, until no room seemed to be left for the thousands coming from the interior. The military escort at last came in sight, and formed along Cathedral street; after this, on foot, having left the carriages at Franklin street, came members of the military escort, the citizens of the city, the army, the reverend clergy, and the pall bearers with the funeral car. These passed slowly along Cathedral street to Madison, and along Madison street to the west end of the city. In front of the Washington monument, and by this to the speaker's stand, which was erected upon the iron railings surrounding the monument and facing the city. The speaker, Mr. W. W. Phelps, was placed on a high platform, and the clergy, with the many distinguished individuals who were present to do honor to the memory of the illustrious dead, passed up into the car. Before the car, and behind it, the whole body of the procession gradually filed in and each portion of it took its appropriate and allotted position. For nearly an hour after the military escort reached ed Mount Vernon Place, a dense body of men, forming a portion of the procession, could be seen passing Gay street bridge, which was visible from the monument through an opening between the trees. Gradually the company after company, and association after association arrived upon the ground, and about three o'clock the services on the occasion were commenced by an ode from the hands stationed above the speaker's stand, at the base of the column composing the monument. A prayer from the rev. Dr. Johns followed, then another ode, when Jonathan Hunt, the soldier, the eloquent orator of the occasion, rose to pronounce the eulogy upon the great and good man who had been removed from the highest place in the nation to the world of spirits.

Why are we here, he asked, with all these exhibitions of mourning and grief? WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON is dead! The patriot, the statesman, the soldier, the great and the good man, the man who has left a name to mourn the bereavement. In the general grief and humiliation at this event the speaker truly remarked, all pious distinctions were laid and leveled.

The man for whom, but a month before the pale messenger summoned him away, the fears of a reigning nation swelled over mountain and valley, was not the president of a party, but of the people, and now the whole people are in tears at his loss. If a man like Harrison could gain any thing from birth, and the orator, then we might refer to his father, who was of the old revolutionary stock; a man whose life and country's peril was not found wanting. A brief and rapid glance at the history of our deceased chief magistrate, followed by an elaborate and appropriate opening of the address, from the time when, as a stripling of seventeen, with an English commission under the illustrious Washington, he chose, instead of the quiet and emolument of a military position, to enter the capacity of a private citizen, to meet for the sake of his suffering country, the bloodthirsty and wily savage on our western frontier, up to the triumphant moment when he became president of the United States, free people. In every position which he had occupied through all the long years which intervened, he had shown his private the ardent love of his country, and her principles, and his public the noblest and most disinterested patriot. And in the one of his last position to which he had been appointed, he had, during the brief space of six months, proved how much he was devoted to the principles of justice and humanity. In that troubled period of the history of Columbia, when the country was fast merging towards a military despotism, he taught the hard minded, but somewhat misguided man who ruled our destinies, that to be truly great, was to be eminently good. That, to be a true lover of his country, he must seek to effect the greatest good to the greatest number of his suffering and laboring oppressed people.

The conclusion of the address was a most beautiful eulogium upon the life and character of general Harrison. Nor was the eulogium, which was so appropriately outlined—it came warm and spontaneous from the heart, and every heart present acknowledged the true portraiture, and responded to the genuine emotion that warmed the bosom of the speaker.

To this succeeded the following requiem, composed by the rev. Mr. Hill, for the occasion, and sung by the musical association. This was given with fine effect, and added greatly to the interest and touching solemnity of the occasion. A prayer by the rev. Mr. Sargent closed the ceremonies of the day.

Hark! a nation's wail of grief

On each passing breeze is borne!

For a nation's honored dead!

From its bleeding heart is torn.

For who lately near us stood,

Ripe in honors as in years,

He—the wise, the great, the good—

Claims the tribute of our tears.

Like a transient tide that's told,

Like a dream of yesterday,

Like the pagan's idol, he is dead,

From earth has passed away.

From his highest sphere of fame,

Must his country's joyous breath,

Sully—suddenly be came

To the silent shades of death.

Where the patriot fathers sleep—

In their well-remembered renown—

Where the soul of freedom weeps,

Chiefest! we have laid thee down.

God! that ruler over all,

God! that lover like we die,

Let thy dead upon us lie,

Let us on thyself rely.

Thou! who was our fathers' God—

Thou! who since hast been our own—

Thou! we feel thy cleansing rod.

Still we seek thy gracious throne.

After the conclusion of the religious ceremonies, three rounds were fired by capt. Ringgold's U. S. Flying Artillery, which were posted on an adjacent hill, and as many rounds of musketry were fired by troops who were on Calhoun street.

The procession then moved on Calhoun street, and finally re-formed; different sections marching to their respective places of meeting, where they were dismissed; and thus closed a day which, as the nation has justly said, will be forever memorable in the annals of Baltimore.

We ought to have stated before, but it is not yet too late, that all who appeared abroad, either in the procession or as spectators, were mourning beings, which were to be had in great variety, and infinitely executed. The number of persons at Mount Vernon Place, and on the various eminences in Howard's Park, could not be less than fifty thousand; and those in the procession are estimated at from ten to twelve thousand. One of the most pleasing exhibitions of respect was the appearance of the Revenue Cutter, lying in the river, where the gunboat Market sailed. The yards were fully manned, and as the procession passed, salutes were fired from on board. It was in full view of the entire procession as it proceeded down Market street. [Ssn.]

TESTIMONIALS.

It is stated that, when intelligence of the death of general Harrison reached Amherstburg, (U. C.) the flag which was flying on Fort Malden was lowered to half-mast.

The Kingston (Canada) Chronicle dressed its columns in mourning, on the receipt of the news of the death of gen. Harrison.

The Eastern Argus says the flags of the shipping at St. Stephen, New Brunswick, were displayed at half-mast on receiving the news of the president's death.

The President Van Buren is noticed as one of the distinguished persons who joined in the funeral procession in New York in honor of the memory of gen. Harrison.

Sunday, the 9th instant, is set apart by the people of the State of S. C. as a funeral Sabbath, and discourses are to be delivered in the churches adapted to the occasion of the death of the president.

At a meeting of the citizens of Macon (Georgia) on the occasion of the death of gen. Harrison, the hon. Eugene A. Nisbet was appointed to pronounce an eulogy upon the deceased.

Major gen. W. Scott was one of the pall-bearers in the funeral procession at Rochester, on Saturday, the 10th instant, in honor of the memory of the late president.

From the Charleston Observer, (a religious paper).

It is wonderful to me how this event [the death of general Harrison] has clustered the bitterness of party strife. How it has arrayed around the bier of the departed the resolute opponents of yesterday, and caused them to vie with each other in their sympathies and sorrow, and in their unfeigned expressions of affectionate regard for the memory of a man whose life and death are a spectacle to which the crowned potentates of the earth can be pointed as an evidence that the affections of our people are true to their duty; and that they are ready, on every fitting occasion, to give honor to them who have been to die; that, as a people, notwithstanding all our difference, we are one and indivisible, bound together by ties much stronger than mere physical force—than individual interests, or the necessity of mutual defence—the ties of a common brotherhood, common affection, common principles and common sympathy. The true patriot will love his country the more from this manifestation of the heart by which his spirit is animated, and will be inspired with greater confidence in the stability of her institutions. The true philanthropist will labor more assiduously in promoting the best interests of the people; and the devout Christian will pray the more fervently that the principles which lie at the foundation of our regulated liberty—the principles of the gospel of the Son of God—may be cherished in their purity, and govern alike the ruler and the ruled.

N. YORK AND VIRGINIA CONTROVERSY.

Communication from the hon. John M. Patton, lieutenant governor of Virginia, to the governor of N. York.

Executive department, Richmond, March 22d, 1841.

Sir: The functions of the executive of the commonwealth having temporarily devolved on me, by the resignation of Gov. Gilmer, it has become my duty to act upon the demand recently made by you upon the governor of this commonwealth, for the surrender of Robert F. Curry, a fugitive from justice with the crime of larceny in the state of New York.

The demand is in proper form, and the fact that it is charged with the commission of an act which is a crime by the laws of your state is duly authenticated.

Recognizing as I do the imperative obligation of the constitution and laws which require the governor of every state to surrender a fugitive from justice, upon the demand of the governor of that state in which he is charged with the crime, I shall not hesitate about complying with the demand. You are accordingly hereby informed that I have issued my warrant, as acting governor of this commonwealth, commanding the delivery of the said fugitive, to John D. Dix, the agent appointed by you to receive and convey him to the state of New York. Mr. Dix having left here on his return to New York, I enclose the warrant to you, and will forward a copy or duplicate of it to the proper authorities in Washington, where it is understood Curry is in custody.

The circumstances which have occurred in connection with this demand made it proper that in complying with it I should avail myself of the occasion to express to your excellency my profound respect for this department for the course which the government of New York has pursued in relation to a similar demand made by the executive of this state upon the governor of New York as long ago as the 25th of July 1839, and which yet remains unsatisfied.

It is not my purpose or desire to renew a discussion (which indeed has already been exhausted) upon that subject. I cannot, however, refrain from reminding you of this unsatisfied question, or from expressing to you what is the universal sentiment for the people and government of this commonwealth, that the refusal of New York to surrender the fugitive charged with the commission of a heinous crime against the laws of the state is a grievous and intolerable outrage upon her rights and a plain violation of the duty imposed upon her by the constitution and laws of the United States.

This refusal to surrender fugitives from justice, upon the grounds on which it has been vindicated by your excellency, and followed as it has been by an act of the general assembly of New York, which seems to me to be a plain and deliberate refusal to render it next to impossible to recapture a fugitive slave who shall escape to New York, involves an assault upon an institution of the southern states, deeply interwoven with their whole polity, and to any foreign interference with which they are keenly sensitive. It is not the less aggravating, that the assault is made by directly violating or rendering nugatory two of the plainest and most explicit provisions of the constitution of the United States.

In this state of things it is scarcely to be wondered at that some of our citizens, eminent in virtue and patriotism, should be inclined to regard New York as having placed herself out of the pale of the union, respected and complied with while she retains her present attitude, but that, if she should ever, while, however, a course of retaliation towards New York might be justified, as far as is concerned, by her repeated and persevering disregard of her obligations, it is not deemed becoming the high character which it has been the policy of this state to maintain, to resort even upon her an act involving a violation of constitutional duty.

Sir, has refused to comply with the constitution, Virginia will not comply with it, and she has no intention to avail herself of any act of legislation, endangering its safety and impairing its value. Virginia will again appeal to her justice, and entreating her to retract her steps, in the manifest resort only to lawful and constitutional means of self protection and redress. She has refused and still refuses to surrender criminals who have fled from our justice, and is pursuing a course calculated to make the empire taste in any form for felonies and runaway slaves. Virginia still respects and relies upon the constitution and the laws, and will surrender fugitives from labor when lawfully demanded.

I trust, sir, that you will see in this that we are ready to persevere in our policy, rather than give up to retaliation injuries and that you will find it an example of forbearance, and proof of an anxious desire to preserve harmony and a zealous regard for justice and good faith which will not be without benefit in inducing you and your great state to retract those assaults upon our institutions, of which the state of Virginia so justly complains.

The motives and principles on which your demand is now unconditionally coupled with by the executive of this state, (in conformity with the duty to believe, with the almost unanimous concurrence of the legislature), ought to be regarded, as I hope it will be, as giving an earnest that as this state recognizes, in all their extent, and will perform, faithfully and scrupulously, all her duties and obligations under the constitution of the union, she expects and will insist upon every other state exhibiting an equal fidelity to its constitutional obligations.

It is in no spirit of measure, but from an anxious desire to preserve harmony between the states, and prevent collisions which must necessarily impair the value and stability of the union, if they do not endanger and finally destroy it, that I assure your excellency that the state of Virginia cannot acquiesce in, and will not submit to those aggressions of New York, which have occasioned the existing controversy between these two great commonwealths. I therefore accompany this communication, by informing you of the fact that your demand for the surrender of the fugitive from your state is granted, with an earnest protest against those aggressions, and an anxious and respectful appeal to you, and through you to the state whose organ you are, to review the position you have taken, and by a magnanimous abandonment of erroneous and untenable opinions and measures, restore those harmonious relations between the states which it is alike the interest and the duty of us all to maintain.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully your obedient servant,
JNO. M. PATTON.
To his excellency Wm. H. Seaward, gov. of N. Y.
GOVERNOR SEWARD'S REPLY.

State of New York.
Executive department, Albany, April 6th, 1841.

Sir: Your communication of the 22d of March last, enclosing a warrant for the surrender of Robert F. Curry, in compliance with my requisition, is acknowledged. The proper agent has been directed to receive the fugitive and convey him to this state.

Your compliance with this requisition is male, in your communication, a ground for asking a review of my decision, and for suggesting that your predecessor, demanding the surrender of Peter Johnson and others. Although the candor you have avowed is by no means questioned, it is a matter of some surprise that you have treated the case as altogether different from that which has been shown that the indictment accompanying my requisition was informal and defective in charging the crime of forgery; if a competent judicial tribunal had decided that the indictment was thus defective, and that upon examination there was no probable cause to believe the fugitive guilty of an offence against any law of this state, and if forgery were not a crime or offence against the laws of Virginia, the common law and the laws of all civilized countries, then, although the case would be entirely new, in my judgment, and with great deference, follow rather than the demand made by me ought to have been denied, than that the requisition issued by your predecessor ought to be granted.

Your views concerning the case were recently discussed between your predecessor and myself; your protest against supposed aggressions; and your appeal to me to review position heretofore assumed, and to abandon the same, were all presented to me by you to be erroneous and untenable, and to restore harmonious relations between the states of N. York and Virginia, have received most careful and respectful consideration. Since, however, you have intimated that this communication is to contain the discussion of the question referred to upon its merits, my reply will necessarily be as general as your communication.

The lieutenant governor of Virginia, in 1832, demanded the executive of this state, Peter Johnson, Edward Smith and Isaac Gausey, as fugitives, upon a vague and insufficient charge of stealing a negro slave in that commonwealth. When this demand was made, the constitution had existed during half a century, prior sufficient, it may be supposed to present domestic exigencies of every character foreseen and intended to be provided for by the framers of that instrument. During that period the institution of slavery existed in Virginia and some other states, and the officers of the law were abolished. Yet within that long time only one case is known to have occurred in which the executive of a slaveholding state demanded from a state in which slavery had ceased to exist, the surrender of a fugitive upon a charge as to which the act adopted by the lieutenant governor of Virginia; and no case is known to have happened in which a demand of that character, male under such circumstances, was allowed.

The demand was deemed by the executive insufficient and defective, even to charge a crime against the laws of Virginia, while the question involved, if the requisition were granted by a proper charge, was regarded as one of great importance, requiring deliberate consideration. An informal note was delivered to the agent of Virginia, pointing out the defects in his papers, and giving leave to amend, and a time was appointed for the consideration of the whole subject. In the mean time the supposed fugitives availed themselves of the legal remedy and were discharged on a writ of habeas corpus, on the grounds that the charge was insufficient and that upon examination, it was ascertained that the accused were not accused criminals, and in their presence on board of a ship in which a slave had concealed himself, with a view to what proved an unsuccessful attempt to escape from servitude. The lieutenant governor, to whom the circumstances became known, nevertheless demanded a decision upon the case as originally presented. That course presented to the executive of this state, on one hand, the alternative of assuming jurisdiction, to make a final constitutional question by placing the demand of the demand on the informal objection sustained by the judge, the removal of which would not dispose of the subject; and on the other, that of assuming the broad constitutional ground upon which, on mature reflection, he was satisfied the case must at last be decided. Both the frankness which becomes public functionaries, and a proper respect for the lieutenant governor of Virginia, required the adoption of the latter course.

It was not unknown that an absolute and probably irreconcilable difference of opinion must arise between the lieutenant governor and the executive of this state. It was obvious that the former would assume, in conformity with opinion known to prevail in Virginia, that men of a certain race and condition may be, and are, property and chattels, the subjects of purchase, sale, devise and theft. The executive of this state, on the contrary, would be faithful to the spirit of the constitution and laws, if he did not maintain that all men, of whatever race or condition, are men, and of right ought to be free; and that every remedy for duties of a human being, whether it be the writ de homine replegado, or the writ de habeas corpus, or the writ of habeas corpus, or indictment for kidnapping, regards him as a man, and not as property, and that it is as absurd to state to speak of property in immortal beings, and coarsely of stealing them, as it is to speak of the slavery of a distinct race, and to place the common atmosphere. It was equally manifest that Virginia would insist that her sister states should recognize the right of property of one class of her people in another, as established by her laws. Indeed, the government of that state, as the duty of the executive of this state to hold, that, except so far as the principle in controlled by the article of the constitution which declares that, persons held to labor or service in one state, by the laws thereof, and extending into another, shall, on demand, and prize, be delivered up to the persons to whom such labor or service is due, the relation of master and slave is a peculiar local relation of the state where it exists, and that it is not bound to recognize or respect it in any manner, much less to protect it by extending for that purpose an article in the constitution which had no such design, nor any reference whatever to the relation.

It was, therefore, always careful to avoid any seeming interference with the institution or municipal affairs of other states, would have gladly avoided such a discussion, not from objections on its own part, but because he supposed the question, being involved by the lieutenant governor, could not be agreeable to the people of Virginia. But it was the pleasure, nevertheless, of the lieutenant governor of Virginia to demand an answer to the requisition, notwithstanding the delicate and intricate character of the question which had been raised, and notwithstanding he must have known, moreover, that a compliance with the requisition would be to surrender three men as criminals whom a competent tribunal had pronounced guiltless, and thus exhibit the executive trampling on the judiciary as well as striking down the liberty of citizens of this state.

Such were the circumstances under which the executive of this state denied the requisition of the lieutenant governor, and assumed the position on which that denial has been vindicated. The decision was not, as you have assumed, designed as an aggression upon Virginia, and intended to effect her institution of slavery, or to assume the prerogative of the executive of this state to be sovereign within her territory, in the enactment and execution of her laws. It was denied only that she could extend her legislative power so as to give a right to the executive of this state, or render it his duty to surrender its citizens to be transported to that commonwealth to be tried, condemned and punished for acts not in themselves wrongful, nor regarded as criminal by the laws of this state; and inasmuch as difference might exist between the codes of the two states, it was considered that in ascertaining the intent of the compact between them, reference might be made, in such cases, not to the particular code of the one or the other, but to the common law received by both, the laws of nature, and the laws of all civilized countries. These principles had no exclusive reference to the states in which slavery exists, but were the same by which other demands upon this state are tested, and they have been applied to the case of fugitives from other states, as presented by Pennsylvania and New Hampshire, where that institution has long since become obsolete. The discussion was, moreover, conducted in a manner which it is hoped will be found to have been always courteous and respectful to Virginia.

The governor of Virginia, in submitting the correspondence to the general assembly, thought proper to distinguish the non-compliance of the executive of this state, upon the grounds assumed by him, as a flagrant invasion of the rights of that commonwealth, which, in the event of the failure of other remedies, might render it the solemn duty of Virginia to appeal from the cancelled obligations of the federal compact to original rights, and the law of self-preservation. The executive of this state, in the same correspondence before the legislature, with the respectful expression of his surprise and regret on account of the seeming menace of the governor of Virginia, thought it his duty to state that he would avoid increasing the embarrassment which he was to incur in consequence of the course adopted by the authorities of Virginia, declared that he regarded the subject as one falling peculiarly within the province of the executive department, and in relation to which the duties of that department were prescribed by the constitution and laws of the United States, and not by the constitution and laws of this state, and he carefully abstained from invoking any legislative sanction of his decision. The executive of this state subsequently complied, promptly and cheerfully, with the request of the general assembly of Virginia, and submitted the appeal of that body for consideration to the general assembly of this state, together with the able arguments of the governor of Virginia and of a committee of its house of delegates, all of which documents were laid before the legislature without comment. The executive also, with equal cheerfulness, complied with the further request of the general assembly of Virginia, by reviewing the positions assumed by him, and he trusts performed that duty in a spirit of candor and courtesy. The correspondence being thus again closed, the government of that state, in the manner of a general assembly in the manner he deemed proper.

He at the same time offered large pecuniary rewards to induce individuals who might thus be tempted to enter within the jurisdiction of New York and in violation of its laws, to convey to Virginia, the three individuals, whose security was doubly assured to them, first by the decision of a competent legal tribunal, and then by the executive authority of the lieutenant governor of Virginia, also addressed public circular letters to the effect, such only, of the American states as he assumed had peculiar sympathies with Virginia, inviting them to make common cause against New York. The executive of this state, in the proceedings and correspondence to the legislature of New York without remark. The general assembly of Virginia then thought proper to pass an act attempting to impose injurious restrictions and onerous conditions upon the executive of this state, engaged in commerce with that commonwealth, citizens of otherwise responsible for the action of the government than as being among its constituents; and this was done with a purpose fully avowed to oblige the executive of this state to rescind a decision made under his constitutional responsibilities, and to compel the legislature of New York to repeal a law found on its statute book, in accordance with its constitution and the constitution of the United States, and having no connection with the question in controversy. Simultaneously with this proceeding, the governor of Virginia refused compliance with a requisition, submitted to be in due form, for the surrender of a fugitive charged with the crime of forgery, unless the executive of this state should first rescind the decision previously made by him, allowing, however, to the executive of this state six months as a reasonable period to decide upon the extraordinary demand thus submitted. The executive of this state lost no time in assenting to the authorities of Virginia that the original subject had been reconsidered upon its merits, and also in connection with those injurious and retaliatory proceedings, and submitted the result, that the decision having been made in accordance with conviction of constitutional duty still entertained, he found no sufficient ground for a reversal of the same.

It became the duty of the executive to communicate those proceedings to the legislature of this state. In doing so he could not but observe that no one would think of repeating, and especially under such circumstances, a law of the state designed to protect the security of its own citizens and others exposed to the risk of being taken of liberty without even a charge of crime. There is no good reason to believe that the interests of the citizens of this state are less carefully guarded by its legislature, than the interests of citizens of Virginia are by the general assembly of that commonwealth. There is no ground to suppose that the principles in regard to personal liberty and state sovereignty maintained by the executive of this state, are less firmly established by the legislature than the institution of slavery is by the general assembly of our sister state. When the commercial position, condition and relation of this state are considered, it is not surprising that you, who are the Legislature, if it could transcend its constitutional barriers, might annoy, harass, and even oppress unoffending citizens of Virginia, at least as severely as the general assembly of that commonwealth can oppress such citizens of New York.

Nevertheless the executive declared that he deemed any retaliatory act unworthy the dignity and inconsistent with the relations of this state. He recommended no such measure. He declared that none should be adopted on my part, and assuming that the citizens of this state have ample constitutional remedies against any injuries they may suffer from the wrongful legislation of Virginia, he declared his confident conviction that it might safely be left to the magnanimity of that state and her own experience of the consequences of her measures to induce an abandonment of them and the performance of her constitutional obligations. The executive of this state has sincere pleasure in acknowledging that so far as one of the measures is concerned, this anticipation has been already realized.

From this cursory review, rather of what has been done than of what has been written, it will appear that the authorities of this state are not the actors in any plan tending towards a denegation of the relations between this state and Virginia. New York has done nothing, and has spoken only when and so often as she was appealed to by Virginia, and also by the fact that she has never refused to give effect to New York has made no novel or questionable demands, complained of no wrongs, offered no rewards for violations of laws of Virginia, passed no vindictive acts, made no threats, nor has she endeavored in any way, but to excite her sister states against Virginia, although she doubts not there are many and enlightened states among them which cherish her own principles and respect her decision.

I trust, therefore, that you will be satisfied that the spirit of conciliation, kindness and devotedness to the union, which you have so properly invoked will continue to prevail here, since no other spirit has been indulged from the beginning. You have a guaranty also, that while the fact that, although not loud and frequent in professions, New York is constant in work, showing her attachment to the union. Her history presents no instance in which she has questioned its value, nor has she ever indulged in any expressions of dissatisfaction after state which sometimes engages the contemplation of those whose estimate of the value of the union is not fully settled. You have a guaranty also in the perseverance with which New York pursues her policy of union, and her relations with other states, and the determination she manifests to render equal justice to them all, while she protects her own citizens as she ought upon principles essential to her own sovereignty and that of her sister states.

I trust, also, that you will agree with me that it rests with Virginia to restore harmony between herself and New York, if indeed that harmony has been hitherto, which New York is not yet prepared to admit. New York maintains, with regard to Virginia, the same attitude and relations now as heretofore. She concedes to Virginia all she has ever yielded. She asks of her nothing Virginia does not bestow. She is to be constitutional and just, and she maintains towards the other states the same relations that she maintains towards the other states of the confederacy. If, however, it be not the pleasure of Virginia to retain her ancient attitude and cherish her ancient feelings towards New York, I can only express my regret for the circumstance so unhappy and unfortunate.

You are pleased to remark that this state is pursuing a course calculated to render her tributary or a slave for slaves and runaway slaves. Waving all exceptions to the spirit of the remark, I trust it may be permitted to reply, first, that it is not inconsistent with the most careful regard to the public morals to grant impunity to those declared innocent by the legal tribunals of the state; secondly, that conviction would involve no offence against the laws necessary for the preservation of a well ordered society, and no violation of abstract rights, as ascertained from the system of jurisprudence established in civilized nations and according to the experience of the people of this state has proved, at least to their own satisfaction, that neither public virtue nor public property has received any injury from extending, so far as has yet been done, equal justice to every slave and every free man within our limits.

Accept the assurance of high respect, with which I remain your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The Hon. John M. Patton, leader and acting governor of Virginia, or his successor in office.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

From the National Gazette.

FOURTH LETTER, A TRUE STATEMENT, &c. TO THE HON. JOHN M. CLAYTON.

Auduland, Bucks county, April 15, 1841.

Hon. John M. Clayton, Dover, Delaware:

MY DEAR SIR: I yesterday explained to you how I have received a notice which states that the bank does not amount to one hundred and fifty dollars, succeeded in forcing themselves into a position where they controlled the fate of the whole thirty-five millions of dollars of capital, and how they succeeded in obtaining the real stockholders of the bank to gratify their own animosities and promote their own pecuniary advantage. I ought to add that in speaking of the managers of the Schuylkill Navigation Company I meant only three persons, without including the rest, none of whom I knew, except one, a very estimable gentleman, who would never join in so unworthy a project. Their exercise of this power was in perfect harmony with their mode of acquiring it. They first possessed themselves of all the accounts of individuals in the bank and then, by means of the real stockholders, after hecatizing how many of them could exhibit to the public gaze without too much offence to private feelings they seem to confine themselves to each only as they could most easily render odious. Among these I have named under the impression doubtless that I could be made to appear in the invidious light of a large borrower from the bank, although my account was entirely like that of any private citizen wholly unconnected with it. Still, had this been done with any ordinary fairness, though I might have thought such a proceeding ungenerous and indelicate, I would not have complained—as I have now a right to do—hat since my private concerns were thus paraded before the country, the statement of them from the beginning to the end is a tissue of misrepresentations. This I shall show in a few words:

My account as stated by them is as follows—

January 30, 1839—his note, due February 2, 1842, with interest—being for 700 shares Reading rail road stock, purchased of the bank by his agent, $31,500
January 3, 1841—his note, due January 6, 1842, with interest—originally a debt to the bank, guaranteed by Mr. N. Biddle, and never assumed by him, 100,000
Balance of loans from "bills receivable," 29,500
$161,000

SECURITIES.

700 shares New Castle and Frenchtown transportation and Reading rail road company.
4,000 shares New Castle and Frenchtown transportation and Reading rail road company.
Deed to Mr. N. Biddle for lands in Dauphin county, but not conveyed to the bank—consideration, $100,000.

The general purpose of this statement was to show that I had borrowed these $161,000 from the bank, that I had owed it to the bank, and, as it is put among the list of debts from the officers of the bank, due and not paid, and in property, it was evidently designed to throw over it the same shade. That is the general color of this deception. But when you come to particulars.

1. The first item is a purchase by me of a certain stock of the bank. They say that I was anxious to sell, and which I sold for more than twice its present value. The transaction was wholly favorable to the bank, and desired by the bank, and certainly I am not the favored party. It would doubtless have been put down as a condition that the bank for money borrowed, but by great good luck, as it happened to be a purchase of this unhappy Reading rail road stock, the pleasure of exhibiting that gulf was too great for suppression, and for that reason the committee gave the act which enables me to show that instead of being a borrower I am only a purchaser—and that the purchase money will not be due till January, 1842. There remained, however, one chance of perverting this transaction, too tempting to be omitted. They say that this stock was purchased by me on January 3d, 1839, but in January 1839, I was the president of the bank, and therefore if I bought this stock at that time I should be guilty of the imbecility of purchasing the assets of the bank while it was the head of it. Now it was not until December—long after I had left the bank—when I was merely a private citizen, without the slightest connection with the bank in the transaction—that I bought this stock of a stock broker.

That this is the first misrepresentation. The second item is rather worse—here is a sum of $100,000 which they describe as "originally a debt to the bank guaranteed by Mr. N. Biddle and never assumed by him," so that I am made to appear as one who first obtained $100,000 from the bank through some one else on my guarantee, and after I had got the money would never assume the debt.

Now when the committee made this statement they had before them my own note payable tenority next, with ample collateral security, forming as good and safe a debt as any in the bank and which will be certainly paid at maturity. That is the second misrepresentation.

Let me explain how such a note ever came there at all.

In my zeal to promote objects of improvement, I determined some years ago with one or two public spirited gentlemen that there should be made a rail road from Philadelphia to Baltimore. As the first portion of the funds was borrowed from the bank, and with a view to ensure its completion, I became personally the guarantor to the bank for the safety of about $40,000 of the loan.

When the loan was made—Philadelphia and Baltimore are both in the full enjoyment of it, and the whole of the money principal and interest is repaid or secured to the bank. Of the part guaranteed by me all has been paid except this $100,000, which is not due till January, 1842.

The third item is "balance of loans from bills receivable," $29,500.

This is designed to convey the impression that having borrowed this money, for its security I had a debt to the bank, which I had not or would not pay to the bank.

Now this committee had before them a letter from the cashier declaring that he had no authority whatever to borrow this money for me, they knew that he had no authority to do so, and that he was not even aware of the existence of his loan—never authorized it—and never knew of this debt;—and that the matter was then in a course of negotiation with the bank.

This is still another misrepresentation far more important.

The committee say that "not being able to obtain satisfactory information upon the subject of those expenses from the books or officers of the bank, application was made by letter to Mr. N. Biddle and Mr. J. Cowperthwaite, from whom no reply has been received."

Now contrast this with the truth. I myself made no answer because I perceived that the letter had been given to them. They were examining all my affairs without giving me any notice, and this letter asking information as to one isolated point was to be made the occasion of saying that they had given me notice on the only point in which they had no authority to do so. I had no authority to call on the writer of the letter, Mr. Lippincott, and in his presence drew up a written account of the transaction and gave it to Mr. Lippincott. Mr. Cowperthwaite states these facts in a letter to me published in the National Gazette. I failed to obtain from the proper officers of the bank after repeated application, permission to examine the vouchers alluded to in the letter of the chairman of the committee to me of the 24th ult. I called upon that individual and expressed my anxiety to give to the committee any information I possessed on that or any other subject, stating to him the fact that I had been refused permission to see these vouchers; Mr. Lippincott informed me that the committee had had some previous to the 24th ult. I then stated to him what my recollection was respecting them, he requested it might be put down in writing, and a short memorandum was accordingly made. Yours, &c.

"J. COWPERTHWAITER."

Now is not this a very awful story? Here is a committee who assume to examine the private affairs of every man who for twenty years has had any dealings with the bank. They publish garbled statements of his accounts, and when the accused goes to the chairman of the committee and delivers to him a written statement, the chairman makes the committee deny they ever received any communication from him and turn his very silence into a crime. I will have it to say for the future. It was contemplated to publish the accounts of all the drawers with the bank; but they say, "it has been thought best not to publish the lists in detail of the active and suspended debt. The injury which would result to the credit of individuals by such a publication might ultimately be detrimental to the interests of the stockholders."

They therefore reserve this for some future occasion, when the individual may be made to suffer, and will be able to pay his debt to the bank, and in the mean time they may publish what they please and just as much as they please. You can have no access to the papers in the bank to explain your own transactions there, when you state them in writ-

Do you not begin to perceive that after deducting his expenses these $24,000 he has paid to the bank every dollar he has received from it. Do you not see that he has been working out his debt to the bank by valuable services—services which he performed at much less cost than any foreign merchant would have charged—and that every dollar the bank has allowed him has gone to pay up this old debt. Does not every body see that this gives an entirely new aspect to the whole question—for after all what other debtor of the bank has paid so much or so well during that time?

I doubt whether there is one single man who has paid in any thing like the same proportion of his services—$25,000 for services—remaining $17,000 perfectly well secured and in a course of reduction. If he has been an imprudent borrower he has certainly been a prompt and large payer—and he has nobly striven to repair the consequences of his indiscretion in purchasing stocks which have since depreciated.

If this denunciation of him has been unjust in itself—it seems little less than madness as regards the bank. He has long been the confidential agent of the bank. His character is identified with it, his talents necessary to it, and yet in the midst of its embarrassments, at the very moment when he was most needed, it sends to Europe a public denunciation of him, which whatever mischief it may do to him recoils itself on the bank.

This whole case then of Mr. Jonathan's seems to be simply this. He owed a large sum of money to the bank—the bank employed him in a most important service and gave him a liberal compensation—all of which he returned to the bank in payment of his debt. His conduct to that respect seems to be rather very uncommon than very atrocious. With great respect, yours,

N. BIDDLE.

SIXTH LETTER FROM NICHOLAS BIDDLE, ESQ. TO THE HON. JOHN M. CLAYTON.
Philadelphia, Bucks county, April 25, 1841.

Hon. John M. Clayton, Dover, Delaware.
MY DEAR SIR: I am going to tell you, this morning, a very strange and true history about this committee.

At the close of their report, they say: "It must be also mentioned that several of the disbursements of the bank there is entered at various dates commencing May 5th, 1836, sums amounting in all to $618,610 13, as paid on the receipts of Mr. N. Biddle and J. Cowperthwaite and 'cassier's' vouchers." As the committee were unable to obtain satisfactory information upon the subject of these expenses from the books or officers of the bank—application was made by letter to Mr. N. Biddle and Mr. Cowperthwaite, from whom no reply has been received."

On reading this no one could fail to understand that here were $618,000 dollars, which had been obtained from the bank, and on being questioned about it had declined giving any answer, from which the natural inference was that these funds were never accounted for. This is evidently what the committee intended to be understood—this is what every body would understand.

Now what I am about to say is so incredible that I would not say it unless I could clearly prove it. It is

First, That at the moment of charging me with these $18,000 dollars, the committee knew perfectly well, that nearly three hundred thousand dollars of that sum, had been expended since I left the bank—and Second, That the remainder had been regularly passed by the board of directors on the report of a committee of which the chairman, Joshua Lippincott, was the identical Joshua Lippincott, chairman of this very committee of investigation.

You are surprised at this. You will be shocked when you see the proofs of it.

1. In this sum of $18,000 dollars, are included two sums, one of $181,000 and the other 99,000

Making $280,000

The first of these sums was passed to the profit and loss account on the 6th of January, 1840, on the same vouchers described in the report—and it was so passed on the recommendation of the dividend committee of the following directors:

Messrs. N. Kirk, Cyp, Bohlen, Price, Cabot. This account was passed in the month of January, 1840, on the report of a dividend committee consisting of answer, not only did they certainly know it, but it is impossible that they should not know it. The same page which contains the account of these expenses up to a certain period, contained it down to the latest date. It is one continuous list of expenses, and he who could see the expenditures during any time must unavoidably see those since that time.

Messrs. Eyre, Taylor, Martin, and Cornell. You naturally ask, is it possible that the committee of investigation could have known this fact.

But this knowledge shall be brought directly before you.

Take for instance the sum of $99,000. On the 16th March, 1841, the committee of investigation wrote to the president of the bank asking him for information, among other things, about that specific sum of $99,000.

The president answered in writing that that sum of $99,000 dollars was disbursed under the direction of a committee of the board of directors appointed on the 3d of March, 1840.

This committee then had the minutes of the bank before them—they read the resolution—they saw the names of the committee of directors who had disbursed the money—they were all directors of the bank at the very moment when this committee were making their investigation—they were almost daily in the same room—and yet knowing all this, the committee never say one single word to these directors—they never say one single word of them—but they suppress all these circumstances and throw the whole odium of these identical $99,000 upon me who had left the bank fifteen months before.

Look near at the injustice of this conduct.

They say that they could get no "satisfactory information from the officers of the bank." Why, was not Mr. Dunlap, the president, an officer of the bank, and did he not in writing assure them that this money was disbursed by the committee of directors? Was not that information?

Mr. Cowperthwaite, the cashier, sent to the chairman of this committee of investigation and gave him a written explanation of what relates to him. Was not this information?

"I call'd," says he, "upon Mr. Lippincott and expressed my anxiety to give to the committee any information that I possessed on that subject, and, stating to him the fact that I had been refused permission to see these vouchers—I then stated to him what my recollection was respecting them, he requested it might be put down in writing, and a short account of them was accordingly made."

They saw the minutes of the bank where this committee of directors was appointed who, they were assured by the president of the bank, made these disbursements. Was not that information? Are not the minutes books?

Yet in defiance of all this they declare that they were "not able to obtain satisfactory information upon the subject of these expenses, from the books or officers of the bank."

In the same way with regard to the $180,000 charged in January, 1840. They saw the names, the dates, the sums. If they were in Mr. Cowperthwaite's time, he had gone to the chairman and offered the explanation—if they were since Mr. Cowperthwaite's time, Mr. Dunlap had explained to them that this committee of directors were the persons to apply to.

But this committee would do nothing. They did not ask the committee of directors; they would not listen to Mr. Cowperthwaite. One thing, however, at least, was perfectly certain, that, whoever made these disbursements, I could by no possibility have had any thing to do with them. And yet they were made by me, and make every body believe that these expenses were incurred by me. Observe the artifice by which this conclusion is made to be believed. "Among the expenditures of the bank," says the committee, "there is entered at various dates, commencing May 1836, sums amounting in all, &c. &c. Commencing May 5, 1836, but they do not say where ending. That important fact is studiously hidden, because it would have been seen at once, where my responsibility ended, and that these $280,000 were disbursed after I left the bank.

You see, then, that this committee of investigation, knowing perfectly well that these $280,000 could by no possibility be imputed to me, have deceived the stockholders into the belief that I had received the money.

You see again that this committee declare that they could get no information from the books and officers of the bank, when the books with the facts were before them, and both Mr. Dunlap and Mr. Cowperthwaite had given satisfactory information in writing, and made every body believe that these expenses were incurred by me. In all these disbursements for the service of the bank my agency was no matter of form than of substance. When necessary for any purpose, some committee, some board, or some authorized person made the disbursement, and the vouchers to pass the account were signed by myself without of course receiving, or indeed having any thing to do with the sums in question, but merely as an evidence that such sums might be or had been disbursed. That for instance was the case with the sum of $89,000, the cashier giving his voucher, and the committee giving their authority in writing, though it was more commonly done by verbal instructions; and in case of discounts by the committees. Of course after a lapse of years an officer would find it difficult to recall what was the object of any particular disbursement, or after many changes in the board of directors to show any written authorities or receipts of any committee; but still this confidence in verbal order is as natural on the part of those engaged together daily in a great multiplicity of transactions, that written orders and instructions are not habitual. Knowing full of the details of these disbursements, my confidence was that all of them would pass through some review by a competent committee before they were finally disposed of.

Accordingly, with regard to these identical disbursements, made during my administration, the whole of them were duly examined, reported upon by a committee and confirmed by the board before I left the bank, the chairman of the committee so reporting them, being the same individual who is now chairman of the committee of directors.

On the 2d July, 1838, the dividend committee, consisting of Messrs. Lippincott, (chairman), Wals, Cabot, Lewis and Vanderkemp, made their report. They presented the profit and loss account, in which the leading item was—

July 2. To bonus and permanent expenses, $3,510,694 39
This consisted of two items—
$2,512,622 80
And the permanent expenses, 668,031 99

Making exactly the $3,510,694 39

The committee say that "the amount of profits arising from discounts, exchange, interest and other sources during the last six months is $1,992,202 02. Deducting from this sum all the expenses and charges of the institution for the same period amounted to $149,238 53, the net profits will amount to $1,792,413 47." So much for the current expenses. Now for the permanent expenses. After giving some details of the committee's proceedings, the committee proceeds: "These sums, together with $5,255,972 92, the balance remaining to the credit of profit and loss as reported by the last dividend committee, form an aggregate of $7,727,325 39. Against which there are now charged the sums paid for the charter, and the permanent expenses of the bank, amounting together to $3,510,694 39, leaving a balance of net profits of $1,216,657 80." And having so settled it, the committee proposes—"That a dividend of four per cent. be now declared on the capital stock of this bank.

Signed, JOSHUA LIPPINCOTT,
Chairman of the dividend committee."

Here then is the report of the dividend committee, who before making the dividend are of course to examine the expenditures. Those merely current they deduct at once from the current profits—those not arising from current expenditures—and to be gradually spread like the bonus over the whole surface of the profits, and make every body believe that this is an item of profit and loss. Mr. Lippincott and the dividend committee report both—they have of course examined both, and recommended to the board what to do with both. The committee then report, charging the current expenses against the current profits—and charging to profit and loss the expenses of a more durable character under the head of permanent expenses.

Remark the phraseology—"against which are now charged"—that is, for the first time charged. These disbursements were recorded as "permanent expenses," on a book called the "state of the bank," which was on the table of the directors every day they met. And now the dividend committee for the first time transferred them to the profit and loss account.

It is this very transfer—this change of place—this handling these accounts and vouchers, which proves that the dividend committee with Mr. Lippincott at their head, had examined them and assigned to them a new place. That he and the committee should not have examined all these expenses with their vouchers is inexcusable—and what makes the case much stronger is that at that very time he was actually chairman of the committee of directors of the bank, that he and the committee had the duty to examine these vouchers and expenses.

Now this sum of $688,081.99 thus charged by the board to profit and loss, contains all the expenditures made during my administration included in this sum of $618,000.

I repeat therefore what I began by asserting that the committee knew perfectly well that nearly three hundred thousand dollars of these expenditures which they ascribe to me, were made since I left the bank, and that the remainder was charged to profit and loss by the board of directors on the recommendation of its very chairman of the committee of investigation himself.

And now my dear sir, let me ask, did you ever hear of any thing like this on the face of the earth—any thing so ungenerous—so unfair—so unjust.

With great respect, yours, N. BIDDLE.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

In senate, Friday, January 22, 1841.

The pre-emption bill being under consideration, and the question being on Mr. CRITTENDEN'S motion to recommit the bill to the committee on public lands, with instructions to amend it by allowing to actual bona fide settlers on the public lands the right of pre-emption of any quantity not exceeding 320 acres, and to restrict this right to actual settlers whose estate shall not exceed the value of $1,000, and also to make provision for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several states of the union.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the senate in reply to the remarks of Mr. CRITTENDEN on the day previous.

He was sorry, he said, that the remarks of the honorable senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN), had rendered it necessary for him again to trespass on the attention of the senate, so far, at least, as to answer one or two of the questions propounded to him; although he felt that the condition of his bodily health was such that he should gladly be excused.

And, first, (said Mr. B.) permit me to observe that, although the senator to a very frank manner disclaimed any intention to impute to me the having sneered at our cabinet, or spoken in disparagement of the judgment recently expressed by the people, all such suppositions, if made from any quarter, are totally without foundation. I came to congress this session in the expectation that it would be a business session; that the political agitations which have convulsed the country would be suffered to subside; and that, instead of the senate and councils interrupted and disturbed by party disputes, we should address ourselves to bringing up the arrears of the public business. If this senate has been converted into a political arena, I, at least, have not been the cause. I have scarcely opened my lips since the session began, and never volens in necessary self-defence.

I have another reason for desiring to abstain from taking part in this debate. I know that this question of distribution has been recently before the legislatures of my own state, for whose decisions I shall ever entertain and express the utmost respect. I am not one who, after the sunshine of prosperity is past, is going to shrink from the succeeding storm. My opinions in regard to the doctrine of instructions shall never be departed from in the hour of apparent gloom and adversity. I have forbore from entering into the discussion of the great subject of the management of the public domain. I have the strongest reasons for this. I am not a devotee of pre-emption; nor had I the remotest idea that it would have been the subject of discussion in my legislature. I am glad to find the senator from Kentucky himself in favor of the general principle of pre-emption, and in justice to him, that if we let the project for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands shall become a law, (as I distinctly foresee that it will), a provision in favor of pre-emption will be inserted and made a part of it. I am willing to await the event. I shall wait till general Harrison is in power, and then I will judge the tree by its fruits. But I am compelled in candor to say—and I am sorry to say it—that if the new president shall appoint the senator from Kentucky on any object, he will esteem that as the greatest public good which I esteem the greatest of evils, viz: the establishment of a national bank. I shall not now enter on that subject further than to say that, financially speaking, at this period of execution on the part of the banks to resume specie payments, the establishment of a new national bank must inevitably ruin or cripple all the state institutions which have got capital, or must create a national debt to sustain it. So much of that.

Let me now come back to my proposed task; which is briefly, and very humbly, to show that the charge of extravagance advanced by the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN), against the existing administration is not well founded. The senate will judge between us.

In May, 1840, a report was made by the secretary of the treasury, which concluded by stating that the aggregate amount of the ordinary and regular expenditure of the government during the whole period between 1824 and 1839, both inclusive, has averaged but thirteen millions of dollars. By the ordinary and regular expenditures I mean all of the civil list and of the army and navy—all this is needed to carry on the government in peace. Of that amount I have heard none complain. The national expenditure from 1824 to 1839 had risen from seven to thirteen millions; and the cause of this increase is as palpable as the fact. In 1824 we have admitted new states—we have increased our army and our navy—we have erected new territories—and all the expenses of congress have enormously increased. Gentlemen might as well now say to me that the little army and navy of child of right or two years, which is sufficient to protect him from the winds and suns and rains of heaven, must be sufficient for the same child when risen up into a full-grown man, as to argue that the small army and navy of the present generation of government twenty years ago shall not increase with the growth of the nation to the present hour. Now, as to expenditures of the class I have mentioned, nothing has been, or, as I apprehend, can be, but the complete and entire absence of ordinary and necessary expenditures under Mr. Van Buren's administration, but to extraordinary expenditures only. And I am happy—I congratulate myself on—I congratulate my country—that, though we called us first ago as May, 1840, ago, we have come on the other side to place their finger on the definite items of expenditure, instead of doing so, they call on us to justify our expenditure item by item. Why, say, who would the senator from Kentucky have been so complacent as to do an account containing ten thousand items, and take each one and demonstrate that it was a proper expenditure?—That, as he well knows, would be reversing all the common sense and common law. I tell him the aggregate with all the details of particulars. If he says that the expenditure has been extravagant, it is his duty to lay his hand upon the item, to point out what particular has been extravagant. I have shown that the ordinary expenditures have not been complained of, and the extraordinary expenditures, the secretary has enumerated them item by item; and with which of them has the honorable senator found fault? But the senator is right. He is right in saying that the senator is right in finding himself to great charges that collected together has done to descending to particulars. Nations have to pass through difficulties of various kinds; circumstances change with changing years. At one time we enjoy a season of great prosperity, while at another they are plunged in a disastrous and disaster. Heavy expenditures are often compelled by necessity. The sums disbursed at one period may be much larger than at another, without the least reflection on those who are entrusted with public affairs. Is it not the strangest thing in the world that an administration that happens to be at the helm during one of these periods should be denounced merely because the amount of money then expended was great? Economy does not consist in hoarding up money and doing no good with it, in refusing to lay the means of defence and of prosperity; but in applying the public money to wise and salutary objects at the cheapest rate possible. It is almost impossible to take up some one of the items of which this charge of waste and prodigality has arisen. One fruitful source of such charges has been the expenditure on the public buildings. Why, sir, who is it against those appropriations? Did any member of the senate resist its vote in opposition to them? Yet they alone have amounted to near four millions. Then there are not less than three millions appropriated for prisons. Did any gentleman object to the expenditure of that money? Was not the money given by a grateful and patriotic people to the broken relics of a past age, who left to our charge their widows who had shared their perils at home while their husbands were in the battlefield? But, be it good or be it evil to pay these persons, had the administration any thing to do with it? Did not congress pass the pension law? Did not the senator from Kentucky vote for them? I do not wish to convict gentlemen on their party votes. I know, from the nature of the man, that he would be one of the last to refuse. Was it then just that there are some expended in purchasing Indian title, and the removal of the Indians to the west. Had the administration any thing to do with that? Could they avoid spending the money after the senate had ratified the treaties? Look at all these extraordinary expenditures, and you will find that in relation to all of them no discretion was left to the president; he was obliged to execute the law of the land, and to carry the treaties of the nation into effect. I hold, therefore, that it is unjust, and an act of injustice, to put down these items in order to swell the total, and then charge him with expending $130,000,000 in four years. One or two of the growing charges are of an extraordinary character, that I cannot help referring to them. There is the item of indemnities, amounting to between six and seven millions. What are they? Gen. Jackson, during his fortunate administration, succeeded in getting all our claims with foreign governments. There were the five millions from France, and about a million from Denmark; and, at the same time that his government thus cleared off our old scores with foreign nations, it kept the country at peace with all the world. The money thus required into the public treasury, and constituting a sacred trust, acquired by the most active exertions, and obtained for the benefit of the people of the whole country, is brought into the account, and used to carry the treasury to the verge of bankruptcy. Mr. Van Buren; and after carrying up a charge against him, they managed to get up a large sum, then they tell us they go for footings and not for particulars; that they look not at items, but at aggregates. Is this just? Is it fair to say that the aggregate of expenditures, and declare about that, and then, yet, when the whole account is laid before you, to refuse to put your finger on a single charge and say, "this was wrong"? In this a generous and becoming course towards the President. I should have rejoiced had this administration been exposed till general Harrison had come into office. The new administration will have all the books and papers, and then they can investigate these things to their heart's content. Forgive me, I now give notice that if I shall then be here, I shall call on gentlemen to make good his charge they now bring, and to show from the public documents our view of economy. In the 126,000,000 dollars with which we are reproached, there are added to about $200,000,000 of a national debt. See the instance with which we are treated. The administration is first charged with the expenditures for the public service; to meet these it is compelled to make itself a debtor to the public for the debt itself. Thus, that which extinguishes the debt, is the administration is charged as an additional outlay.—[Here Mr. B. read from a treasury document the amount of debt extinguished on treasury notes.] It has been observed that the administration has incurred enough for having been compelled to create this debt; but to charge us with the debt, and then charge us with paying it too, is truly astonishing. The senator from Kentucky employs a man to build him a house, and he charges him with the cost of the house; and he is charged with twenty thousand! Now, fortunately for this government, no administration can be very extravagant, but in one particular. Not a dollar can it expend but in one appropriation made by law, and in this manner the public money is always protected by proper guard.—Hereafter, while a poor hungry wretch who sells five dollars by hour bread for his children was sent to the penitentiary for larceny, a man entrusted with the public money, who squandered it and then fled, was considered as a mere trustee, and escaped the hand of public justice. The sub-treasury bill first put the public money in the hands of the president, and sent the defaulter to the penitentiary, and not on a mission to Paris or London. A president of the United States has but one way to be extravagant in regard to the public money. It is through his party measures. If it is the majority, may make extravagant expenditures. The proper way to test the matter is to investigate these expenditures, item by item, to see if they could have been avoided; to see if any party opposed them, or whether the accused did not vote with the majority to appropriate the money. We have obliged gentlemen to take course, and now, after the election is over and the administration is put down, we get the specifications of extravagance.—Suppose them to be well founded, happy, happy, indeed, is the country where, after so large a sum has been expended, the known talent and ingenuity of such a man as my friend from Kentucky can get up a charge of extravagance. No country is so open to the charge of extravagance as this. It is the glory of our country, to the honor of its laws and constitution, and to the high praise of its public morality, that, after a report of public expenditures extending through nearly four years

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamer Britannia arrived at Boston on the 5th inst., in thirty-eight hours from Halifax bringing Liverpool dates to the 20th ult.

The Caledonia which left Boston on the 1st, and Halifax on the 4th ult., reached Liverpool on the 13th and 14th inst. and arrived at Boston on the 17th.

No intelligence had been received respecting the steamer Errol, and the most intense anxiety was felt for her safety. Insurance could not be effected under 50 per cent.—75 had been paid. Their last lingering hope appeared to rest upon the possibility that she might have gone into Bermuda; we have accounts from thence that prove that hope to be fallacious.

The President had not been heard of at Fayal, on the 28th of March; at Terceira, on the 27th of March; or at St. Michael's on the 26th of April.

"His majesty upon leaving Borkingham palace for Windsor castle, left commands that immediately upon news of the safety of the President reaching London, a special messenger should be dispatched with the intelligence."

O'Connell is again busy in Ireland pushing the repeal agitation.

Parliament not being in session, nothing has occurred in the domestic policy of England worthy of notice.

The county of Kilkenny in Ireland, is represented to be in an alarming state of anarchy and disturbance. We do not generally notice similar accounts with which the London papers so frequently abound but to this instance we find it in a government paper.

Sir George Arthur, late lieutenant governor of Upper Canada, had arrived in London, and had long conference at the foreign office.

Some detachments of troops were under orders for the British possessions on this continent, but they evidently were rejects for others ordered home.

The lord mayor of London gave a splendid entertainment at the Mansion house on Easter Monday.

At a public meeting held at Liverpool on the 12th ult., to consider a petition to parliament for the repeal of the corn laws, the proceedings were greatly interrupted by charlatans.

The range of Windsor Great Park has been conferred upon prince Albert.

The duke of Saxe has entirely recovered from his late illness.

Commodore Napier arrived at Liverpool in the steamer Oriental on the 13th ult.

The London correspondent of the N. Y. Courier writes on the 19th, "The general intelligence received by the Caledonia has been considered satisfactory, but not sufficiently decided on several subjects of great importance, including the affair of Mr. McLeod. That this recently so exciting a business will pass away without either danger to the peace of Great Britain and the United States, appears to be so generally the opinion of the country, that very much less has been recently said about Mr. McLeod—though the intelligence of his final liberation is much to be desired."

The state of the money market continues to be sound, and the foreign exchanges remain satisfactory—but the intervention of the Easter holidays, has materially diminished the speculative business of the last two days. The English funds have improved about 3 per cent. since the arrival of the Caledonia, and the general state of the money market is decidedly towards an extension of the currency, and a decrease of the rate of interest by the Bank of England, with a consequent advance in the value of mercantile and monetary property of every description in the course of the present year.

In American securities the business has not been extensive, but the late improved inquiry has been sustained, and there is this morning business in $10,000 of Pennsylvania stocks at 75, and numerous transactions in the shares of the bank of the United States, though out at a better quotation than 25 and 25 10 per share. The other stocks are all saleable at the rates of the enclosed list, though no actual business has taken place in the course of the present day.

The arrangement for the postponement of the payment of the debentures of the bank of the United States, due on the 15th inst., has been completed without any difference from the account given to my last communication, that the holders do not receive any present payment—the 10 per cent. of the capital which was first proposed to be paid, being relinquished, and the first of extension reduced from two to single year. The prospects of the share holders, bond holders, and all concerned in the fortunes of this institution, now centre in the future value of the stock securities held or hypothecated to so enormous an amount, but all informed parties are confident of a rapid improvement in the credit of the individual states after the meeting of the extraordinary session of congress, when it is expected that the grand financial projects of the new government will be developed to the opening speech of Gen. Harrison, and that either a consolidation of the state debts, or a distribution of the land revenues may be fully hoped to be consistent with that regard for the rights, credit and general welfare of the individual states—not only no opposition to which—as antagonistic to the general system—but the almost consistent deference to which pervaded the inaugural speech of the new president of the United States.

On the morning of the departure of the Great Western steam ship, arrived the overland mail from India, with intelligence of the final settlement of the disputes between the English and Chinese.—The particulars of the settlement had not been arranged—but the Chinese have yielded the island of Hong Kong to the English and to pay $6,000,000 for the expenses of the war. An express which was despatched from London on the morning of the arrival of the overland mail from India, arrived at Bristol two late by about two hours, and therefore the Caledonia takes out the important intelligence of the removal of the blockade of the Chinese coast and the termination of the general hostilities.

The island of Hong Kong which has been ceded by the Chinese to the British, is represented to be very favorably chosen for a British settlement. It is of little extent, being but about fifteen miles in length, but it forms, with the neighboring islands, one of the finest ports in the world. Some affect to fear that this possession, in the hands of the British, will be worth little more than Macao is to the Portuguese. There is, however, a wide difference in the character and power of the two people.

The reports from the manufacturing districts are not so improving as might have been anticipated from the favorable termination of the difficulties with the United States. The cotton market appears to be heavy at Liverpool, and there is a decline of 1/4d. per lb. in London on East India cotton, during the last four days.

Parliament re-assembles to-morrow, after the Easter recess. The business, however, is not expected to be so important until the 30th inst. the day of the opening of the budget of the year. This important exposure of the financial situation and prospects of Great Britain, you will therefore receive by the following steam ship.

The corn markets remain stationary, and none of the duties were altered on Thursday last, the rates being still 22s. 8d. per quarter on foreign wheat, and 13s. 8d. per barrel of flour of 100 lbs. The weather has been cold for the last few days, and the vegetation has been greatly checked, but this is not important to the prospects of the growing crops, which remain of a more promising kind than for a number of years past.

The Morning Chronicle of the 14th says in reference to the post notes of the Bank of the United States which would fall due on the 15th:
"We learn that an arrangement has been effected with the principal holders of the post notes which will fall due on Thursday, to the effect that the principal sums shall be remitted over for another twelve months upon a further deposit of $25,000,000 of Pennsylvania stock as an additional security."

FRANCE.

The Paris papers contain no very momentous news. M. Grotz had announced in the chamber of deputies, that negotiations pending between Great Britain and France promised a satisfactory conclusion of the difference between two countries; but he would not give further explanation, which was demanded.

The chamber of deputies had voted by a large majority, all the extraordinary credits for 1841, required for the department of war, marine and public works, amounting to a sum of upwards of 200,000,000 francs.

SPAIN.

Madrid. The regency was still the all-engorging topic of discussion and speculation in the capital, but the question had as yet made no advance towards a solution.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon. Senhor Manoel Goncalves do Miranda, Portuguese minister of marine, died at Lisbon on 5th instant. His successor had not been named; but Baron Bomfim was ordered to take charge of the portfolios on the 1st of April.

We are informed by the papers that the bank, the Condessa company, and the capitalists of Lisbon, have jointly refused to enter into any transaction with the government. The advisers received represent money matters in a very embarrassed state.

SWITZERLAND.

Private letters from Berne of the 6th inst. state, that notwithstanding the recent decision of the federal diet, the Argovian government was proceeding as actively as ever with the spoliation of the convents of the Canton. The Catholic population, on the other hand, emboldened by the admission of their rights by the legislature, were preparing, with the aid of their pastors, to defend themselves against the decrees. The conservative party at Locarno were prepared to support the Catholics of Argov by force. The representatives of Austria, Russia and England had taken a strong part in urging the diet to oppose the proceedings of the Argov government.

GERMANY.

Berlin. The council of state is engaged on the new penal code, which is to be completed by the end of the year. At present, the new enactments for the prevention of duelling are under discussion. The penalties are much less severe than hitherto, duelling being treated as murder, and threatened with the same penalties, but the punishment was never inflicted. The law too made an improper difference between noblemen and citizens.

The latest intelligence from Persia, dated Teheran, Feb. 14th, conveys the important information—that the differences existing between Persia and Great Britain had been satisfactorily arranged, the schah of Persia having declared himself ready to cede the fortress of Gurian, taken by his troops in the last war." It was consequently expected that the British embassy would return to Teheran forthwith.

TURKEY.

News from Constantinople, brought to Marseilles on the 11th inst. by the French mail steamer Monsieur comes down to the 20th inst. Several extraordinary councils had been lately held at the porte, or in the residence of some of the ministers, in order to deliberate on the reply which was to be returned to Mehemet Ali. Persons generally are informed affirm that the affair was on the point of being definitely adjusted in a satisfactory manner, and that the divan had adopted a decision which, to avoid all further difficulties, had been referred to the approbation of the Loodoo conference.

From the London Morning Chronicle, of April 19th. Change in the Turkish ministry. The long unexampled ministerial revolution has taken place in Constantinople; at least so says the Austrian Observer of the 10th, the official Vienna journal. Its account is as follows:

"Advisers from Constantinople of the 20th ult. received by express, state that Reschid pasha has been dismissed from his post as minister of foreign affairs, and replaced by Rifat bey formerly ambassador from the porte to the court of Vienna, who has been also made pasha. The minister of commerce, Felhi Achmet, pasha, has been replaced by the capitan pasha, said pasha, who is brother-in-law to the sultan and Talir pasha has been appointed capitan pasha in his stead."

The "recommandation" of the conference of London to the porte, "namely that the sultan should have been wiser; but it has had the untoward result of upsetting in Constantinople that minister and that party most attached to the liberal ideas of the west.

On the 16th March, the Turkish fleet, with only 600 of the 31,000 men who manned it on its reaching Egypt, re-entered the Bosphorus. The sultan had repaired in his steamer to the Kioks of the scraggi-bouras, in order to witness the event. The "Mahmoudieh," a ship of the line, the sultan went on doubling the point of the peninsula, fired a salute of 21 guns, which his highness ordered to be immediately returned. All the other vessels of the fleet followed the example of the "Mahmoudieh."

The fleet consisted of twenty-six sail, eight ships of the line, ten frigates, two corvettes, and six brigs, and other light vessels. The entire population of Constantinople and its environs lined the banks of the channel, and crowded the heights which overlooked the city, in order to enjoy the spectacle. In the course of the afternoon the sultan went on board the "Mahmoudieh," accompanied by all the pashas, and complimented admiral Walker, in the most flattering terms, on his conduct throughout the recent occurrences.

Major Bruce, a Scotch, and brother-in-law of Baron Brunow, the Russian ambassador in London, has entered the service of the porte, and is at Beyrout, in command of a Turkish regiment.

EGYPT.

On the 17th ultimo, Mehemet Ali had returned from Cairo, leaving Ibrahim pasha there, invested with all administrative powers over the interior, as well as over the affairs of the military and marine of Egypt. They had liberated Sheriff pasha, ex-governor of Damascus, from the arrest in which Abbas pasha held him, and had appointed him chief inspector of finance in the room of Hussein bey, lately disgraced. Councils had been held in Cairo, and serious inquiries made into the recent mismanagement in Syria. It was declared that 60,000 men were necessary for the effective government of Egypt, and said bey had been sent up the Nile to concert measures for a new conscription, as the pasha has only half that force on foot at present. The increase is rendered necessary by the hostility of the natives of Abyssinia, led by a chief who, many years since, destroyed the pasha's son, Tulsoun, and the threatening attitude of the western Bedouins, who, it is said, were in a conspiracy with the late Said El Ghelbi against the pasha. The eastern Bedouins had also recommended their attacks on the government convoys in the Suez desert. The pasha had paid off the long arrears of his army, and was now discharging those due to his marine and to his children. He was building barracks for the sailors in Alexandria. The national guards of both cities were still constantly exercised. A marriage was on the tapis between the son of Ibrahim pasha and a daughter of Soliman pasha.

Lieutenant colonel Napier had sailed with the Maronite Emirs and Dervishes for Syria on the 9th of March, in one of the pasha's corvettes, and had encountered a severe gale.

Storms and rains had set in at Alexandria from the 10th to the 14th of March, and the cases of plague had risen to fifteen per day.

Mehemet declares his fixed resolve not to do more towards acknowledging the supremacy of the sultan, than paying a few hundred thousand dollars a year as tribute. He disregards the hatti-scheriff, appoints colonel Gause a bey of £250 a year, and sets him to fortify the sea shore; droves of manacled conscripts are arriving. The pasha's governor of Canak, Ahmed, has been defeated by Mokis Nour, of the Upper Nile. The Gersise Arabs have entered Egypt near the native lakes, and spoiled the tribes of Gebaz. The pasha has stopped the supply of coin to Egypt annually sends to the holy cities.

CHINA.

Final settlement of the differences with China! Excellent in England on the subject. From the London Morning Chronicle. We received last night an extraordinary express from Paris of Wednesday evening, bringing our Marseilles correspondence summary of the news brought by the India mail.

Our dates are from Chusan to the 20th December, from Macao to the 27th of January, from Singapore to the 25th of January, from Calcutta, to the 18th of February, Hong Mandra to the 20th of February, from Seinde to the 23d of February, from Bombay to the 1st of March, and from Alexandria to the 25th of March.

In consequence of the inhumanity and tardiness of the Imperial commissioner, an attack was made on the morning of the 9th of January on the outposts of the Bogue forts. In two hours the fort was in possession of the English, with a loss of only three killed and 23 wounded; that of the same time the fort of Tschow was attacked by another squadron. A heavy fire was opened on the fort, and promptly returned, but the Chinese guns were speedily disabled, and a party of seamen landed to seize the fort. The Chinese made a valiant resistance, but were soon overpowered and the fort captured. The first lieutenant of the Samarang was wounded in the assault.

The steam vessels then attacked the fleet of junks lying in Anson's bay, but owing to the shallowness of the water, only the Nereus could approach them, towing 12 small boats from St. Mary's ships. Her first rocket set fire to the powder magazine of one junk; 18 others were blown up by their own crews, and the rest escaped into the inner waters. Next morning her majesty's ship Blenheim began to attack the battery, and at 11 o'clock, when she was preparing to attack the fort at Ansoning, when the Chinese commander-in-chief made a communication to capt. Elliot, who thereupon desisted from further hostilities. On the 20th of January, a circular was addressed by the British plenipotentiary to her majesty's subjects in China, announcing that preliminary arrangements between the Imperial commissioner and himself had been made to the following effect:

"1. The cession of the island and harbor of Hong Kong to the British crown. All just claims and duties to the empire upon the commerce carried on there to be paid as if the trade were conducted at Whampoa.

"2. An indemnity to the British government of 6,000,000 dollars, 1,000,000 dollars payable at once, and the remainder in equal annual instalments, ending in 1846.

"3. Direct official intercourse between the countries upon an equal footing.

"4. The trade of the port of Canton to be opened within ten days after the Chinese New Year, and to be carried on at Whampoa till further arrangements are practicable at the new settlement. Details remain matter of negotiation.

"5. The trade of the port of Canton to be guarded by the 18th Royal Irish, and the harbor protected by the two eighteen gun vessels. The plenipotentiary has published officially his intention to urge the opium indemnification claims upon the British government, with a concurrence also of the governor general of India."

The following particulars, in addition to what is given above, are gleaned from the correspondence of the Morning Chronicle:

Bombay, March 1.

Her majesty's ship Columbine has proceeded to Chusan to recall the whole of the troops, as possession of the island is now to be returned to the Chinese.

The Imperial commissioner has despatched an order to Ningpo, directing the release of all the prisoners detained there.

The plenipotentiary seizes the earliest occasion to declare that her majesty's government has sought for no privilege in China exclusively for the advantage of British ships and merchants, and he is only performing his duty in offering the protection of the British flag to the subjects, citizens and ships of foreign powers that may resort to her majesty's possession.

Pending her majesty's further pleasure there will be no port or other charges to the British government (at Hong Kong).

The plenipotentiary now permits himself to make a few general observations.

The oblation of past and redressed injuries will follow naturally from the right feeling of the people. It is to be feared, it should be remembered, to the extent of modification resulting only from political intervention can be efficacious in the steady improvement of our condition, unless it be systematically seconded by conciliatory treatment of the people, and becoming deference for the institutions and government of the empire, upon the threshold of which we are about to be established.

The plenipotentiary can only presume to advert very briefly to the zeal and wisdom of the commander of the expedition to China; and to that rare union of order, patience and forbearance, which has distinguished the officers and forces of all arms at all points of occupation and operation.

He is well assured the British community will sympathize cordially with him in these sentiments of lasting respect for his excellency and the whole force, which he is assumed to express in such inadequate language.

He cannot conclude without declaring, that, next to these causes the peaceful adjustment of difficulties must be ascribed to the truly good faith of the very eminent person with whom negotiations are still pending. [Keshen.]

Her majesty's plenipotentiary considers it incumbent upon himself to lose no time in assuring the community that he trusts that he will use his best effort with her majesty's government to secure an early and entire advance of their claims for indemnity. [The opium clause.]

And, mindful of the interest of parties in India, he cannot fail respectfully to state the right honorable the governor general of India to second these purposes as far as may seem just to his lordships.

(Signed), CHARLES ELLIOT,

Her majesty's plenipotentiary.

Withdrawal of the force from the Bogue. On the night of the 23d of January his excellency commodore Sir Gordon Bremer arrived in the roads accompanied by several ships of war and steamers. The English colors were removed from, and Chinese hoisted in their stead, on Chuenping. Thursday last the ships of war have we learn left the Bogue, and part of them will proceed to Hong Kong immediately to take possession of that island to the name of her majesty.

At Macao, don. 21. Chusan it is understood, will be evacuated, and no port will be open to the northward. The future course of the opium trade does not seem to have formed a subject of discussion; but we understand opium may be imported into the new settlement although still contraband in China.

The general trade, this season, is to be carried on at Whampoa; and until we learn the proposed measures of the British government with regard to Hong Kong, we cannot pretend to say where it is likely to be diverted to the new settlement. Altogether we look upon the arrangement as a very unsatisfactory description of compromise, and we fear the only real and tangible result will be the payment of 6,000,000 dollars with the small sum, annually collected by the additional impost on the foreign trade. We do not learn that any reduction of the existing heavy duties is in contemplation, or any modification of the objectionable Hong system; but we trust, when the details of the arrangement are promulgated, we shall find these matters will be properly arranged, and some hope be afforded of a more secure system of trade for the future.

The crop of tea is generally stated to be about 25 to 400 cogs of Congou, a very small quantity of Souchong, and a few cogs of Oolong. The quality is generally very good. Of green tea the actual arrivals are as yet small, but the quality is said to be about the same as last year. The market was opened by the purchase of the Congou of the Stromboli, belonging to the Charles Kerr, John O'Gaunt, and Lloyd's, from 24 to 35 T. for Gongong, and we suppose the rates will not decline materially.

We do not hear of any Fokien Batches having been imported, and of the Stromboli used in the manufacture of Canton Batches we believe there is very little, while the market is entirely bare of old tea; there will, therefore, be low priced tea, available for a considerable time. Under these circumstances, and with a scarcity of tonnage as available for England, we look for a moderate report in season, and probably a total export not exceeding that of either of the two preceding years. We submit a memorandum of the small export of tea up to the present time, and a comparative statement of the supply sent home in previous seasons, which may prove interesting.

Only the supply is small, only about 2,500 bales, we understand, being actually down, and the market is likely to open at high prices.

Excitement in England relative to the treaty with China. As will be supposed, the terms of arrangement agreed upon by captain Elliot and the imperial commissioner have been the subject already of a great deal of discussion. The prevailing feeling is, decidedly that of dissatisfaction.

Liverpool, April 16. A meeting of the East India and China association was held on Thursday last for the purpose of taking into consideration the late proceedings in China. The result of the deliberation of the association was the adoption of a letter to viscount Palmerston, in which the members express their dissatisfaction at the arrangements entered into by captain Elliot with the Chinese authorities. The letter was signed, on Saturday, by all the houses engaged in the trade with China, and forwarded in the evening to London.

A subject of the copy of the great memorial presented to the right hon. viscount Palmerston, her majesty's secretary of state for foreign affairs.

My lord: We, the undersigned merchants of Liverpool, engaged in the trade to India and China, venture to address you on the subject of the intelligence which has reached us by the last overland mail announcing that a preliminary treaty had been entered into between her majesty's plenipotentiary and the Chinese commissioner, and which so under deep feelings of disappointment and alarm.

In the treaty to which we refer, as officially communicated to the British residents in China, on the 20th of Jan. last, we cannot recognize the fulfilment of any one of the great and important objects avowedly sought to be obtained by her majesty's government in the mission of the formidable armament which proceeded to the coast of China during the last year; nor can we trace in its provisions any thing calculated to afford a prospect of redress for past loss and suffering or to allay distrust and apprehension in entering upon new dealings with the Chinese.

We refrain from alluding to intelligence, however worthy of credit, which has reached us from private sources in China, and abstain from speculating upon the nature of the details that are stated to remain to be negotiated; but we find, in the contents of the circular itself, issued by her majesty's plenipotentiary, ample reason for reproaching your lordship with urgent entreaties that her majesty's government will not ratify a treaty, the avowed and prominent conditions of which are calculated to degrade the British character in the eyes of other nations, and which contains neither that reparation for the past nor that security for the future which the country was led to expect she had a right to demand and was in a situation to enforce.

We have the honor to remain, my lord, your most obedient servant, &c.

Liverpool, April 16, 1841.

London, April 19. It is understood that lord Palmerston has appointed Wednesday next, at five o'clock, to receive a deputation from the merchants of London on the subject of captain Elliot's negotiations with the Chinese.

The above important news had created a great deal of excitement. The arrangement of captain Elliot were wholly unexpected, and did not appear to give unbounded satisfaction. The Liverpool Journal of April 17th has the following remarks on the subject: "The news of the negotiation of a convention or treaty with the government of China by capt. Elliot of which we gave the outlines in our last has by no means been received with unqualified approbation. This was to be expected. Unreasonable expectations in which many people indulged, were not likely to be satisfied with reasonable stipulations. Besides the whole body of the holders of tea cannot but say that they were leaving at a settlement which so very much reduced the value of the commodity, of which they held large stocks; and the whole of the residents in Canton, and many of their correspondents here, are so deeply interested in the opinion that it was to be expected they would be extremely dissatisfied with any thing short of a recognition of its legality.

But leaving these considerations out of the question, it must be admitted that there is ample room for doubt that any treaty is one altogether so satisfactory in description, as that lord John Russell's promise to obtain 'indemnity for the past and security for the future' is realized by the officers of the government. Much depends upon the value of the island of Hong Kong, which is known to be an excellent harbor, and in every respect suitable for a military and commercial depot. But it is contended that its situation and distance from Canton, nearly, we believe, one hundred miles, makes it of little use for purposes of traffic; that Canton is the great mart, and that the other nations will go there, we must go there too; and that, in solid advantage, very little is gained. Perhaps the most valuable concession on the part of the Chinese government is that of treating with the British government on the footing of a perfect equality, and on the interpretation of this every thing depends."

FINANCES AT THE CLOSE OF THE LAST ADMINISTRATION. Treasury department, March 2, 1841. In pursuance of a suggestion by the president, the secretary of the treasury submits, with his resignation, a general statement of the fiscal operations of his department, since the last annual report, in order to show its condition till the close of his connection with it.

So far as yet ascertained, the ordinary expenditures for the year 1840, have since that report, proved to be less than those in 1839 by $1,000,000, three estimated between two and three millions of dollars.

The revenue has turned out, also to be nearly the same, as then calculated, making the actual result—though affected by fluctuations in imports almost unexampled—little or no variation from the estimates in 1839, beyond what has been the average annually, for the last quarter of a century.

The available balance in money in the treasury, at the termination of 1841, including, as it were before computed, what stood to the treasurer drawn by collectors, receivers and the mint, subject to draft, has proved to be about as much as was anticipated in December last.

Returns from nine counties wanting, seven of which contained in 1830, 55,881.

Returns from five counties not included. Four of the five counties contain, according to the marshal's returns, 95,701.

Returns from Carter county wanting. The amount of population in seven counties of Georgia in 1830, and that of four counties of Alabama, mentioned in this note, are included in the sum total.

The number of officers and functionaries of the federal government, (postmasters, clerks, &c. at Washington, and sundry agents not included), is as follows:
Officers of the army, 1,366
" of the navy, 1,299
Civil functionaries, 2,590
Do. fixedly employed in the several states, 2,232

Total,
Do. employed stationed at Washington, 619
Native of foreign countries, 233

There are 1,421 officers of the federal government in the United States, 85 employed at Washington. The federal population of the United States will probably exceed 16,000,000; so that if the ratio of representation in the next congress is fixed at 60,000 there will be over 400 members in the next house! We hope it will be put to 80,000 at least.

The only material difference, and which has been since explained to the proper committee, was caused by some new charges imposed by congress, through new appropriations, which would otherwise have fallen on 1841, and some failures by the indebted banks to pay so much in 1840 as was expected.

The power remaining on the 1st of January 1 fiscal treasury notes, constituted another of the fiscal means of the present year, and it has been ascertained to exist in an amount somewhat greater than had been estimated.

Since the year 1837, the year commenced with resources on hand quite equal to the anticipations previously formed. The differences before named were, fortunately, of a character not to change the fiscal condition of 1841—in proportion to their respective amounts the recession in that year will probably be larger, and the expenses smaller.

Notwithstanding that, it was deemed very important, as detailed fully in the annual report, to obtain at an early day the aid of some subsidiary means, and a plan was adopted against fluctuations and contingencies generally, as well as to equalize the receipts and expenditures during 1841, the latter being likely to fall very heavily on the first quarter of it.

Accordingly, as had been done on some similar occasions since the public debt was discharged, and the current revenue diminished, these means were requested by the department the first moment practicable after the session began, being the annual report issued, and a view to delay was already in this and other years, urging a compliance with such requests, were made only to develop new facts and reasons which had in the mean time occupied, favorable to the previous recommendations.

Although the aid was at first intended to be furnished as early as desired, yet the department has succeeded in commanding its funds so effectually as with the existing resources on the first of January, and the current receipts afterwards, to meet all the authorized claims that were due and presented during the severe pressure experienced in that month.

Since the desired aid was furnished by the passage of the new act concerning treasury notes, in February; no necessity has arisen to issue any of them, and a view to delay was already already payable. But in consequence of the public convenience being much promoted by advances of money for March, before they would fall due, on the 4th of March, those advances have been made, and an amount of $1,000,000 has been issued, subsequently been issued equal to about $500,000. This is not so great as $150,000, as the sum which has already been forwarded on account of those advances. No greater amount for any purpose, and probably not so great as the difference, is likely to be called for before the 4th instant. Hence it appears that other available means in the treasury have, as yet, proved more than enough, in the aggregate, for the discharge of all engagements of every kind sanctioned by congress, whether old or new, in arrears, or otherwise, which were due, and have been presented for payment.

It may be proper to state further, that the receipts since the year commenced, have fully sustained the computation made at the close of the first quarter made by the department, in January last. The accruing revenue from duties payable three and six months hence, has been much larger in January than would be required monthly to make good the deficiency in the receipts in 1841, equal the amount estimated in the annual report.

The revenue received in February, not yet fully ascertained, has probably been nearly the same as in the preceding month, but the accruing duties are believed to be considerably less. It is computed, however, that these duties, taken in money together, have been quite as large as would be their proportion in order to make the receipts for the whole year, from this source, equal to the annual estimate. As the year's expenditures since the year commenced, materially exceed the amount expected. It is gratifying to be able to add, that, after all the payments above described, the balance of available money now in the treasury is more than a million of dollars, including what stands subject to draft, and to the credit of the treasury in the mint, and with collectors and receivers. Deducting trust funds of every kind, which have seldom been so small in amount, and none of which that should be invested remain uninvested, the balance will still exceed three-fourths of a million.

During the last three months also, as well as in all the former exigencies, since your administration commenced, that balance has never been less than from half a million to a million of dollars, and even much the treasury may, at times, have been exposed to embarrassment at particular points, in the various crisis to which its affairs have been exposed, in the performance of such large, distant, uncertain and sometimes unexpected operations. But any good fortune in preserving him and scrupulously the pecuniary credit of the general government, under such perils, should not be suffered to impair the force of the recommendations that have from time to time been submitted to congress for a provision of additional means, to guard well against sudden deficiencies in receipts and large fluctuations and inequalities between them and the expenditures to different parts of the year.

The first recommendation for some such precautionary measure was presented as long ago as 1835, immediately after the discharge of the national debt, and the termination of the necessity for keeping a large balance on hand to aid in defraying it.

The situation of congress has been annually varied to the subject with earnestness and in several different forms. In respect to our present financial condition, judging from that part of the year already expired, and from the existing means to hand, there appears to be danger of embarrassment, unless it is hereafter caused by the circumstances pointed out in the last annual report.

Should congress before the expiration of the present session, or before the year closes, burthen the treasury with a new grant of appropriations (those were called for in December last, the expected means of defraying them, as then explained may prove proportionately inadequate. So a continued suspension of specie payments, by most of the banks west and southwest of New York, would lessen the receipts of the treasury, as was then, also, stated. The sudden suspension again of several of those banks, in February, after resuming for a short time, has already exercised some malign influence on the revolving business of the country, and this circumstance was immediately submitted to the consideration of the appropriate committee.

But though it may continue to operate unfavorably on mercantile credit, there is nevertheless no good reason to deem that if the appropriations are not increased beyond what was called for in the annual estimates, the means now on hand, with the current receipts and the existing power to issue five millions of treasury notes after the third of March, will prove amply sufficient to meet all our engagements. If they do not, almost the department to extinguish the whole of the temporary indebtedness caused by the issues of these notes, it will be owing to the recent and unexpected suspension again of many of the banks, so sensibly injuring the prospect for increased receipts, which is attributed to a very fluctuating extent early in December.

But congress having not yet passed appropriations exceeding in the aggregate, the whole estimates, no serious danger seems to exist, unless some future action of that body during the middle of the year, should augment the expenditures.

Nothing of course, is easier than the adoption of measures which must increase the expenses of 1841, so as to exceed its authorized fiscal means, and thus not only to cause embarrassment, but impair the pecuniary credit of the general government, and leave no alternative except greatly increased taxation of some kind, or a permanent national debt.

But it is a matter of congratulation that these financial evils have hitherto been avoided, though severe commercial convulsions, protracted Indian hostilities, and a periodical reduction of the revenue from customs, have at times pressed heavily on our operations. Without doubt they can be longer endured by a country which has so many engagements, though perseverance in economical retrenchment, and the careful abstinence of causes for new or increased expense. Indeed, it must be a source of sincere satisfaction to the president personally as well as to the community at large, to see his administration close without foreign domestic insurrection, or any other calamity, requiring heavy burdens of any kind to be imposed on the people by the general government—without the creation of any permanent public debt whatever, or even of a temporary one, that should be discharged within the year, if proving as prosperous as many have anticipated, without any increase of taxes, but, on the contrary, many old ones reduced—without any claims due and authorized by congress and the accounting officers which have not, as a general rule been paid with specie or its equivalent, and with promptitude, however much the department has been incommenced by revulsion in commerce and bank suspensions, and, in fine, without a treasury either empty or bankrupt.

LEVI WOODBURY.

Secretary of the treasury.

WAR DEPARTMENT. Report of Mr. Polkett on tendering his resignation. War department March 2, 1841.

Sir: In tendering to you my resignation of the office of secretary of war, I think it my duty to set forth the reasons which induced me to resign, which I have conducted for the last four years.

More than forty thousand Indians have been removed peacefully, and are happily settled beyond the frontier of the western states. Tranquillity has been preserved, and raised throughout the whole of that border, and there exists no cause which are likely to lead to its disturbance. The Indians are generally contented, and are gradually advancing in the peaceful arts of life.

The position of universal peace is the condition of the Indians in Florida. There, too, I am happy to have it in my power to say that hostilities are being rapidly brought to a close by the successful interference of the Seminole chiefs, who have been brought there from the west. Contented with their lot, they reside beyond the Mississippi, they are anxious to persuade their brethren to abandon a hopeless contest, and join their kinsmen in the west. My last advice seems to regard these peaceful efforts as likely to prove altogether successful, and the war may be considered virtually at an end.

The necessary employment of the militia of Florida during the late recess of congress, will give rise to arrearages amounting to about $600,000, but, according to the provisions of the statute for settling claims of this character, not more than one-half of this sum will probably be found valid, which will have to be discharged from the appropriations that have been asked for the purpose. Besides this, the balance of the claims of the Choctaw, Creek and Seminole, and half, and the balances of former appropriations for Indian affairs, which still remain in the treasury, and amount to about a million more. How much of this may be required to discharge arrearages is not known; though it is not supposed that the whole will be necessary for that purpose. It was never contemplated by the department to invest the amounts for the interest of which the faith of the United States is pledged by treaty. It is deemed correct to keep the premium of the interest for settling claims annually the amount of interest due thereon, to the several tribes. They are not, therefore, considered as a part of the arrearages.

The amount due for pensions in the present month and September next, have also been sent to the several pension agents, so that nothing is due on that account.

Immediately on the passage of the act authorizing the issue of treasury notes, I directed that all the outstanding claims against the department which were ready for payment, and for which appropriations had been made, should immediately be liquidated. All those for work done on the fortifications and at the arsenals and armories, have accordingly been provided for, except only about sixty thousand dollars, the payment of which has been delayed only because the accounts have not been presented.

For other various objects entrusted to the department, the unpaid claims are estimated to amount to not more than $200,000, which have not been paid for a similar reason.

According to the reports of the different disbursing bureaus of the departments, the unliquidated in their respective branches of the service, at claims for fine, are probably not more than $100,000, and greater than they were four years ago; so that the amount of payments made since I took charge of the department, fully equals all its liabilities created within that period.

The army is in a high state of discipline, and is composed of 10,069 men, part in Florida and the remainder stationed along our extensive frontiers. Notwithstanding the many causes which have existed during the last four years, tending to increase the expenditures of the army, growing out of its increase in number, the reduction of the force, and the employment in the removals of Indians, and along our northern frontier by the enforcement of a system of rigid economy and accountability, the relative expenditures have been considerably diminished. In a report recently made by this department to the house of representatives, it is shown by an average made of the whole expenses of the army during each of the four years, that the expense of each individual has been gradually reduced, with the exception of the commissary, who is obliged to keep the place that was necessarily incident to the raising, organizing and equipping the additional force. The expense for each person in the army in 1837, was $400 15, and in 1840, $373 96; showing a reduction of $26 19, or more than six per cent.

The ordnance department has been rendered very efficient, and regulations adopted for its government, and for the better ordering of all matter connected with the foundries engaged in manufacturing cannon for government. Since the return from Europe of the board of ordnance officers, models for guns of the several calibres, authorized to be used in our service, have been submitted to that department of war, and have received my approval, and orders have been given to furnish the artillery regiments with their proper arms.

The engineers office has been conducted in a manner to insure the entire satisfaction. The force have been, and continue to be as rapidly completed and repaired as the amounts appropriated for that purpose will permit. The institution of a corps of sappers and miners will tend to keep them in good condition, and to insure the most accurate descriptions.

The corps of topographical engineers is organized and employed so as to produce the most useful and beneficial results to the country. The manner in which its duties have been, and continue to be, performed, has been highly satisfactory to the department.

The improvements introduced into the medical staff, render it equal to that of any service in the world.

The quartermaster general's department has discharged its duties in a manner to secure the most economical disbursement of the public funds committed to its charge.

Through the agents of the commissary general of subsistence, the army is abundantly supplied, as diminished in the department, warlike stores. The duties of the commissary general of purchases are likewise performed in a satisfactory manner, and the army is regularly furnished with substantial clothing of our domestic manufacture.

The army is regularly paid at stated intervals, in legal currency, and the extensive duties of this branch of the service have been performed during the last four years without any loss to government.

The long contested claims arising out of Indian reservations within the territory, are very unwelcome brought to a close. More than three thousand have been decided by this department since 1838, and those arising under the contract made by government with Wagonmou are being decided by the special commissioner appointed for that purpose, and await only the final action of the department.

Having in many cases found that either the title to the lands on which forts and fortifications are situated were incomplete, or the proper evidences of the title were in the department, warrants were promptly taken to remedy this deficiency. This desirable and important object has been accomplished, and the titles are all now believed to be perfect, except that of Fox Patch Island in the river Delaware the right to which the department has not yet succeeded in settling, notwithstanding every effort has been made for that purpose.

The expenses of the department have been gradually reduced, notwithstanding the cost of conducting hostilities in Florida. In 1837 and 1838 the gross amount of expenditures was between eighteen and twenty millions, owing chiefly to the profligate appropriations of those and the preceding years; in 1839 they were reduced to less than fifteen millions, and in 1840 to less than ten millions, a reduction of more than eight millions in the annual expenditure, without injury to the service. Very respectfully, your most ob't serv't.

J. R. POINTSETT.

Tremble at Fort Snelling. The Galena Gazette says: "There have been rumors in town for several days past, of difficulty between the Sioux and the United States troops at Fort Snelling. The following comes from a gentleman from Prairie du Chien, and is most likely nearly correct. He says, an Indian attempting to get into the garrison at Fort was shot by a soldier. The Indians, upon this, declared war, and threatened the severest punishment. Upon the demand being refused, they surrounded the fort, and exhibited such indications of hostility as to induce the commandant to send an express to Fort Crawford (Prairie du Chien) for reinforcements. The commander of the fort, however, we apprehend no serious difficulty from this source. There are several boats above, and we expect to hear later news in a day or two."

We understand that boats from the Upper Mississippi, since the late of the above, being sent as a which should induce the belief that any further difficulties had occurred.

Finances of the state. Report of the committee on finance, on various reports referred, of the state officers, in senate, March 23, 1841.

Mr. Verplanck, from the committee on finance, to whom were referred the annual report of the comptroller, that of the commissioners of the canal fund, and other reports and documents, report:

That the committee have had the several reports and papers referred to them under consideration and have concurred in various estimates and recommendations therein contained. Bills in conformity therewith, have been prepared, some of which have already been introduced, and are now pending, and another is herewith submitted. The present bill being intended to aid in presenting hereafter the financial condition of the state to the legislature and the people, in a more clear and simple form than heretofore, the committee regard this as a proper occasion to present their general views of our financial state and policy, and to give in a condensed form the results of the estimates upon which the measures and appropriations recommended by this committee were founded. In the examination it is important first to state the real amount of the debts, and the public property of the state.

Of the debt of $7,737,81 contracted before 1825, for the original construction of the Erie and Champlain canals, there remains, after extinguishing $5,683,963, a debt which, (with the exception of $36,000), cannot be redeemed before 1846, unless with the consent of the holders. This amounts to $2,054,808.

The means for the redemption of the debt are already provided. These consist of, 1st. The loan to the U. S. deposit fund bearing an interest of six per cent, and invested in the several counties in bond and mortgage $917,355

The moneys received from time to time from these bonds are directed to be applied to the redemption of the debt, until after the extinguishment of a smaller similar debt to the general fund.

2d. Loan to the city of Albany at five per cent, which is in a progress of gradual redemption annually, so as to be extinguished in 1845 162,000

3d. Deposits in banks drawing an interest of five, and five and half per cent, payable at 60 and 90 days' notice 944,510
Making, without interest, subject to immediate draft 46,069

Adding an aggregate of productive funds applicable only to the payment of the above debt, of $2,079,944
There is also another debt purely nominal, which has continued led to misstatement.

1st. The general fund appears a debtor for loans from the canal fund without interest, according to the act of 1836, to the amount of $1,627,603
This is the aggregate amount of the general loans applied out of the excess of the canal revenue to the general expenses of former years, when the other revenues fell short; under the act authorizing such deficiency to be supplied by a loan not exceeding 400,000 dollars in any year from the surplus canal revenue. This being a mere matter of account between two funds, both belonging to the state, is no real debt.

2d. Loan from the canal fund, made in 1837, for the use of the U. S. deposit fund to complete the full amount of investment of mortgages in the several counties, and which has since been in gradual progress of reduction. It is now 917,355

This loan being invested in bond and mortgage, is perfectly secure, and is not a debt of the state, but simply so much of the fund for the redemption of the old canal debt, invested in bond and mortgage in the name of the commissioners of the U. S. deposit fund. This amounts to $2,551,988

Making, with the old canal debt of 2,079,964

The aggregate of $4,634,952

appearing as debt in our accounts, which is either wholly nominal, and matter only of account, or is fully provided for by well invested funds, producing an interest exceeding that annually paid.

Throwing these debts out of the calculation, the general real debt of the state will be found as follows:

General fund debt.
Astor stock at 5 per cent. $561,500
Due to the bank savings fund 695,066
$1,256,566

Canal debt.
For the Erie canal and improvements $6,500,000
For the latter canal finished, (as Oswego, Cayuga and Seneca, Crooked Lake, Chenango and Chenung canals), and unfinished, (the Black River and Genesee Valley canals) 7,161,784

Total canal debt $13,661,784
Of this amount, about ten millions have been expended on works which are not yet finished, and consequently produce no revenue.

There are besides some present contingent liabilities of the state, being loans of state credit to incorporated companies for objects of internal improvement. For the payment of principal and interest of these, the several companies are bound in the first instance, and the state is secured by the pledge of their whole property invested in the several works to a much larger amount than the respective loans.

The loan of credit to the Delaware and Hudson canal $600,000
Ditto to several rail road companies, (see comptroller's report of Jan. 26, 1841) 2,185,700
Since issued 300,000

Thus there appears to be, besides the amount of contingent and guaranteed debt last stated, a total amount of other state debt of $14,905,737
These debts, and whatever additional amounts may hereafter be added, were contracted doubtless upon the general credit of the productive aggregate wealth of the state, of which the official valuation of 1840 gave, of the real estate the value of $17,728,170
And of the personal property 121,449,330

Making a total amount of $638,173,000
As this valuation does not include any of the public property, or that belonging to towns, cities, &c. nor the property invested in colleges, academies, schools, churches, &c. and as the valuation of the real estate, made for the purpose of local taxation, is well known to be placed almost every where below its real and market value, and in very many counties, very far below that value, there is certainly a property of not less than one thousand millions of dollars in this state which may be subjected to a state taxation, (if from which it is now wholly exempt), in case of any partial deficiency of ordinary revenue.

This consideration, however, is important mainly as to the stability of our credit abroad and at home, there being, as will be shown, no probable necessity for resorting to such taxation.

The property which the state holds in its own right, and not merely as a right of eminent domain over the property of its citizens, is that to which we most look immediately for annual revenue, and for the means of paying present and future debts.

In estimating the public property of the state, that which is subject to general use is alone to be taken into account. The public buildings of the state, with its prisons, arsenals, asylums, &c. are therefore not taken into this estimate, any more than the well invested funds specially devoted to aid local taxation and the collegiate and academic corporate funds, for the purposes of public instruction.

These funds, however, in this general view of our financial condition, it is proper to state for the purpose of information.

These consist of the original common school fund $2,083,808

The lands belonging to the same, estimated at 196,341

The U. S. deposit fund, applied under the act of 1838 to the purposes of education 4,614,520

The literature fund, for similar purposes, has, besides its unproductive lands, a fund of 268,778

Throwing out of the calculation these funds, sacred to special purposes, justly cherished by our whole people, the remaining productive state property will be found to consist:

1st. In the canals, the tolls of which produce, after paying the expense of superintendence, a clear and increasing income of $1,350,000, equal, in their present state of partial completion, to a capital of $25,000,000
The rents derived from the salt springs, about $150,000 annually, equal to a capital of 3,000,000

This income, like the canal revenue, is progressive, though not regularly so, as more distant markets are opened for the salt, or a greater demand arises from our increase of population.

The next important point of inquiry is the comparison of the amount of annual expenditure, and of interest upon funded debt paid by the state, with its income.

This comparison will be simplified by throwing aside from the estimate on both sides, the payments to the purposes of education from the specific funds above stated, as well as the income from them; and also the expenses for the penitentiary establishments, so far as the same are met by their specific income; and those of the marine hospital, and other establishments, defrayed from the seamen's and passenger's fund.

These, and similar receipts and expenditures, would, if stated, merely well and complicate the account without producing any difference in the result.

The legislative, judicial, executive and militia expenses paid by the state, amount annually to $300,000

The Indian annuities and expenses, geological survey and miscellaneous expenditures, may be estimated at 60,000

Public buildings, new state-hall, asylum, &c. 100,000

Annuitants to institutions for the deaf and dumb, blind, &c. 66,500

Interest on state debt, other than that for internal improvement 61,600

This estimate includes the sum of $125,000 for the erection of the new state-hall and the main building of the state asylum, and for a geological survey, all of which will be completed in 1841.— This amount may be hereafter applied to similar objects or unexpected demands of some other nature.

The aggregate payments for the last year were swelled beyond this amount, by the expenditure of $145,941 for erection of buildings; of $42,000 for surveys for internal improvement, and also by the purchase of Indian lands to be re-sold; none of these forming the ordinary annual expenditure.

The ordinary revenue arising from our salt rents, may be computed at present at $150,000
From auction duties 175,000
From fees of officers paid into the treasury, and some smaller revenues 65,000

The above estimate of revenue from the salt springs is made without any calculation of the progressive character of this fund as a wider market is opened for our salt; whilst the estimate of the auction duties is placed below the actual receipts of many former years, which have sometimes exceeded $250,000, and were last year reported at $25,000 dollars.

It is therefore believed that the state revenue, from these sources, will commonly hereafter a good deal exceed the amount stated, but it has been thought preferable to avoid the chance of any over estimate, and to place the amount at the receipts of the present year, leaving any future increase to meet any unexpected increase of expenditure from unforeseen causes.

Thus the ordinary deficiency of the state revenue on this low estimate, exclusive of that derived from our public works, to meet the probable annual expenditures, will be $197,000, or a sum not exceeding 200,000 dollars, which may, with economy as to building and miscellaneous expenses, be reduced to about $100,000.

It may also possibly, in some years of more free expenditure, be increased to $300,000.

An amount of $200,000 from the canal revenues will meet the average deficiency of the other state funds.

The present gross amount of our canal revenues may be safely estimated from the returns of the last year's season of navigation, two months of which fall within the present fiscal year.

The amount from tolls was $1,775,747

Income from water rents, &c. about 9,000

The revenue of the lateral canals was about $75,000, or $68,040, exclusive of the Genesee valley, part of which was open for a short time at the end of the season. The revenue from that canal during the year may be estimated at $20,000, and the whole income of the totals at 90,000

Making, in round numbers $1,875,000

The expenses of repairs, superintendence, &c. including the usual allowance for those extra repairs which are rather new constructions and improvements, but which have been frequently classed under this head, are about $550,000

Interest on present enlargements about 330,000

Upon debt for the construction of the lateral canals, 357,000

Leaving an excess of income of $638,000

From which there is also to be deducted the payments necessary to meet the ordinary state expenditures 200,000 to meet the interest on any additional debt or other contingent charge, or else be applied directly to the cost of construction.

Leaving the sum of $438,000

The total cost of work still under contract, (the greater part being for canal under contract during the year 1825), amounts to $6,316,454. Should the sum of $4,000,000 be appropriated this year to be applied to these contracts, the future progress of public works and their annual expenses will be rather under the control of the legislature, without any risk of disappointing the arrangements of contractors or exposing the state to heavy responsibilities for consequent damages. This expenditure on our public works, after the application of the present year's appropriation, and about three millions in addition may be enlarged or reduced, as the revenue may justify or the wants of trade require, whilst the future additions to our canal debt and the rate of progress of our public works may be estimated and regulated as we please.

What that future revenue and rate of progress may be, is of course a matter of estimate and probability only. But such estimates need not rest upon mere conjecture. They may be drawn from the observed laws of population and trade, since the canal transportation cannot but continue to hold some regular proportion to the increase of population and wealth in our own state, and in the vast regions beyond, which must furnish the outlet to the Atlantic through our artificial channels of internal communication. Such estimates, though, like all human calculations upon probabilities, liable to error and disappointment as to their particular application at any given time, and in all events but approximations to the actual results, are in the main, and on the long run, safe guides for action when prudently used.

The canal board, in their special report to the legislature of April 11, 1840, have also shown the comparisons of the tolls for the last year, with the tolls which increased with remarkable regularity, at the rate of seven and a half per cent. annually, for the period of ten years; that is, not seven and a half per cent. in regular progression successively upon each last year, but 75 per cent. in the ten years increasing regularly during the whole term. This term was selected as being one sufficiently long to embrace the ordinary fluctuations of trade, and yet not so long as to reach beyond the probable operation of any one cause.

The probability of this estimate is not only supported by the former experience of the canals, and especially that of the last season of navigation, since the report and agreeing with its estimate, but is confirmed by various considerations from the general laws according to which population has hitherto augmented; and the interference and consumption of domestic and foreign products have been regulated.

It may, therefore, be assumed as a safe and probable basis of calculation of our future revenue, and consequent means of prosecuting the public works, either now in progress or in contemplation. Yet notwithstanding its probable truth, prudence may dictate that in the use of all similar calculations, some probability must not be regarded as certainty, but that the means of compensation for any unexpected error should always be provided. Assuming, then, this estimate as the basis of calculation, it must be borne in mind, that should the actual results of revenue fall short of the estimates, that deficiency must be balanced by a corresponding increase in the amount annually applied to our production in the amount annually applied to their construction. The aggregate canal revenue during the ensuing six years, on this estimate, will be $12,593,165, giving an average income of 2,098,860 dollars annually, and leaving at the end of the term an annual income of about $2,600,000.

Out of this average income of $2,265,800 must be deducted for the ordinary expenses of the canals, $300,000

Extra expenses and contingencies 150,000

Interest on present canal debt 687,000

Payment in aid of general expenses 200,000

Leaving an average excess which would amount during the 6 years to $4,572,800

Assuming moreover during these 6 years, that the debt added after the four millions of the present year, of twelve millions spread over the succeeding five years, the aggregate amount of the interest thereon, calculating from the first year of making the loan in each successive year, would be about 2,870,000

This actual amount would exceed or fall short of this sum, as the loans were larger or smaller in 1842-43, and more thrown upon later years.

This would leave an excess of $1,402,800 to be applied to the construction, which, by way of a loan, would amount to about seventeen millions and a half, and complete the several works now in progress. Or in another point of view, this would allow an error of $253,800, in the estimate of the annual average canal income, the estimate of the interest on other sources of income. Such a result would fall a good deal short of the calculation of seven per cent. average increase for periods of seven years, as it would be far below the amount of the interest reported above referred to, which is the aggregate receipts. In this case the completion of these works must be delayed for at least another year.

All these proportions of annual expenditures and loans must be judged of by future legislatures, who will be able to examine the questions without being under the compulsion of providing to meet heavy immediate contracts. Adverse circumstances, or the assumption of new works may make it necessary, if we would avoid any recourse to direct taxation, if we would support internal improvements, to spread our expenditures over a still longer term of years.

If again the requirements of trade manifested by increased transportation, and consequently increased revenue should demand an earlier completion; or if the natural increase of that canal revenue, or the addition of new revenues from the new probable distribution of the income at the public lands, should justify new and extensive undertakings, the annual expenditures above estimated, would be crowded into four or five years.

In either case the whole amount of debt contracted would be involved in permanent and productive works of equal value to themselves, with the works of equal value to them, and adding far greater value to the commerce and industry of the state. The real redemption of the debt would commence whenever the necessity of new loans ceased, and an ration of the only really permanent sinking fund, the annual increase over expenditures.

The views and estimates above furnished, lead the committee to the conclusion that there is no probable necessity of being compelled to increase direct taxation upon that large and increasing amount of private property now assessed only for purposes, and town or county charges.

Such taxation was recommended by some of the state officers in former years, as by comptroller Wight, in 1830, in 1831, in 1832 and in 1833; and in 1834 to 1839 inclusive. No one of the successive legislatures of those ten years, concurred in that recommendation, and the representatives of the people, of the resources and prospects of the state, was correct. Whatever future necessity may arise, such taxation hitherto would have been only a useless burden upon industry, enterprise and capital.

Should, however, such a necessity arise hereafter, we may still entertain the most perfect conscience that the sums to be raised would not, as in some other states and countries, be equal, or any where nearly so, to the whole amount of our expenditures and annual interest, but would be merely the excess of such expenditures and interest, above the large canal and state revenue; so that such a deficiency need never be very large, or the taxation required to supply it very burdensome.

A prudent measurement of those funds, and a careful adjustment of our future appropriation to our revenue, would make any such deficiency highly improbable in any event. But if these funds should be engaged for the distribution of the income of the public lands, in any manner, such a deficiency could not occur in all human probability even in a larger extension of our public undertakings, and a more rapid rate of completion of the works now in progress.

Time is, moreover, still another ultimate resource, which, should the calculations of increased revenue, thus founded upon uniform experience and high probability, be nevertheless disappointed by the result, or delayed for some years, may still prove a sufficient compensation for any such error. This is to be found in the enlarged Erie canal itself.

The great end to be effected by the enlargement, is the diminution of the cost of transportation, by which, as well as the augmented facility of transportation, the redundant agricultural abundance of the west, may be economically and rapidly exchanged for the products of the industry or commerce of the Atlantic coast. When this is effected by the enlargement, should the increase of trade and revenue, answer our present reasonable expectations, the great economy obtained in the cost of mere transportation, would allow if necessary, some increase in the tariff of tolls.

It is the duty of the public who should by no considerations, private or public, which it becomes an obstacle to any such means, unless it become very important to the credit and revenue of the state. But in any such emergency it might be necessary to resort to a moderate degree of tolls, still safely resorted to, in a moderate degree, as it still leaves a very great reduction in the aggregate charges of transportation, as compared with those on the present canal. By means of the enlarged and improved canal, the average expense of transportation will be reduced about one-half.

This calculation is founded on the law of traction, as well as, as ascertained by numerous and accurate experiments, and reduced to mathematical formulas and rules of calculation by De Bael, and other high authorities in mechanics, and is founded upon theoric estimates, (if an estimate founded upon such data be entitled to that name) is confirmed by the calculations and experience of practical men engaged in the business of internal transportation, as to size of boats, number of sails and horses employed, &c.

The average cost of transportation of goods, by canal, now averages about one-fourth more than the amount of tolls. Thus the tolls on flour from Buffalo to Albany, are 35 35-100 cents the barrel, whilst the cost of transportation is stated to be about 44 cents.

This ratio varies in different degrees as to other articles in proportion to their cost of transportation from weight or bulk; but as flour forms one of the greatest and most valuable articles of internal trade, it presents as good an average example as can be taken.

Now the improvement of the canal navigation, it is calculated, will reduce that cost of transportation to 22 cents. It is then evident that for an equal business the canal would not be injured by an addition of twenty per cent. on the present tolls, when the seven cents thus added to the present aggregate charges on each barrel of flour, would be then compensated by twenty-five cents reduction in the cost of mere transportation, leaving a clear gain on the whole expense of transportation to tide water, of fifteen cents the barrel by reason of the enlargement. Such an increased rate of tolls upon the great increase upon the present business, and estimated at from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. on the existing rates, would secure an income of half a million a year, a sum amply sufficient to meet any probable demand by the state's income, whilst the business it would impose upon the trade would be light in comparison with the benefits it must receive from the enlargement.

The committee have deemed it proper to point out this measure, not as a measure recommended by them, nor in their judgment likely to be required. They rather look to such a state of business, some years hence as would justify a further reduction of tolls. But it is impossible to guard against every adverse contingency, and such a resource within the power of the state, though it may never be used, is calculated to give great stability to our credit and confidence in our public enterprises.

In the mean while it appears to the committee that the arrangement of the accounts advised by them last year, and this year recommended in the annual report of the comptroller, would be of great service in giving clearness and simplicity to our annual statements, and enabling future legislatures to understand more distinctly as well as more easily the true condition of our finances in every year.

This is in effect, to apply to the books of the treasury, the principles upon which the several statements of our present revenue and expenditure presented in this report have been made. It is,

1st. To make all the deficiencies of the lateral canal to meet the interest on their debt and cost of superintendence chargeable directly upon the surplus revenues of the Erie and Champlain canals, and the payment of the same out of the interest for which they are specifically pledged.

2d. To put an end to the form of borrowing from the canal revenues to aid the general fund, and instead thereof, to authorize the application of a sum not exceeding $200,000 annually, out of the canal income to the general purposes of the treasury; and on the same ground,

3d. To balance and close the account between the two funds for nominal amounts, and to strike out of our books and notes the non-existent debt thus made to appear as owing by the state to the fund of which the state is the sole proprietor.

In assembly, April 24, 1841.

Report of the committee of ways and means, on so much of the governor's message relating to the debt, revenues and expenditures of the state, &c.

Mr. Holley, from the committee on ways and means, to which was referred so much of the governor's message as relates to the debt, revenues and expenditures of the state, and the report of the comptroller, and the engrossed bill from the senate entitled "an act to provide funds for carrying on the public works now in progress," reports:

That at an earlier period of the session the committee had supposed that all the information necessary to enable the house to act upon the subjects so referred, was contained in the reports of the canal commissioners, the commissioners of the canal fund, and of the comptroller, and other reports and documents before the legislature, but from some events which have since occurred, calculated to produce anxiety in regard to the financial condition of the state, the committee have concluded to submit some considerations to the house on those subjects, in the hope of promoting more fully the interests of our fellow citizens in relation to our great works of internal improvement.

The expenses of the enlargement of the Erie canal, according to the corrected estimate, will be $21,264,831. Of that amount the state has expended the sum of $8,726,250. The estimated cost of the Genesee Valley canal is $4,688,030, of which the sum of $2,452,500 has been already paid. The estimated expense of the construction of the Black River canal is $1,337,577, and there has been paid on account of that canal $1,317,597. The amount of public credit pledged to the New York and Erie rail road company was $3,000,000, of which stock to the amount of $1,569,000 has already been issued. The aggregate sum required from the treasury, to carry into effect all these enterprises, as ascertained from acts heretofore passed and from the corrected estimate of the canal commissioners, was $33,286,355. Of that amount the sum of $19,998,447 has been paid, and the balance leaving to be raised for those works the further sum of $13,286,908.

All these undertakings were commenced under a previous administration. Of the sums expended in their prosecution, $10,646,917 were paid under laws passed during the same administration. The whole debt of the state is $14,905,370. Of this sum $3,250,000 were authorized by the last legislature, and all the residue, with the exception of $50,000 borrowed from the Erie and Champlain canals, by legislatures within the period before referred to. With the exception of about $160,000 the whole sum of $12,496,247, expended on the enlargement of the Erie canal, and in the construction of the Erie and Champlain and Black River canals, has been expended in the performance of contracts made by the predecessors of the present commissioners. There are now existing contracts requiring for their fulfillment, the payment by the state, amounting to June 1, 1841, of the sum of $6,102,485. Of this amount only the sum of $430,850 is payable upon contracts made by the present canal commissioners. The sum of $5,771,121 will be required to comply with existing contracts, which will expire before June 1, 1842; the sum of $2,306,379, to fulfil former contracts expiring previous to April 16, 1843, and the sum of $7,983 on further contracts, which will expire before June 1, 1843. No new work except the improvement of the Oneida river, at an estimated expense of $75,000, and the purchase of the Oneida lake canal and feeder for $50,000, has been undertaken during the present administration. When all the existing contracts shall have been performed, only about the fifth part of the construction of the public works undertaken under the previous administration will have been completed.

These references in a former period, are not made with a view to raise any question concerning the expediency of all or any of the public works, but with a view to illustrate more clearly the policy which has been heretofore pursued, and that which seems to be indicated for the future. Since the declaration that mistakes and miscalculations were made by the predecessors of the present commissioners in their estimates of the cost of the public works, and since our experience of the revolutions of commerce and the prostration of credit throughout the union, all agree that it would have been well to have made a more careful and judicious provision in the prosecution of public works had been adopted by our predecessors. Yet there are very few persons who affect to have at that time foreseen the present condition of the country.

It is not to be denied that there are the undertakings in which the state was engaged, and the rate of progress established, when its interests were committed to the hands of those by whom they are now conducted. It was soon discovered that new and insuperable difficulties were to be encountered, in the disastrous condition of commercial affairs, and that the estimates made of the sums to be provided, fell short almost one-half of the actual cost of the works which had been commenced. The state has been obliged to suspend the completion, and after a careful examination into the fiscal condition of the state, it was announced, that with retrenchment and retardation the public works might yet be completed; and that although the awakened expectations of our fellow citizens in various parts of the state in regard to these and projected improvements must necessarily be delayed, they need not be ultimately disappointed.

Fully convinced of the ultimate ability of the state to prosecute its present system of improvements to a successful result in due time, and in answer to the just expectations of all portions of the state, it is important, nevertheless, to notice such circumstances and events of recent occurrence as ought to be known and taken into consideration in determining the action of the present legislature.

The policy of borrowing money to carry on our public works, relying on their surplus revenues, when completed, to reimburse the principal and interest, is certainly not our system of improvements, and we are indebted to that policy for all the benefits we are now reaping from the adoption of that system. Until very recently, most of the funds required have been obtained at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. In the daily quotations of the stock markets at home and abroad, it is certain that money cannot now be obtained without an advance upon that rate; nor is it probable that the rate of interest will be reduced until the action of congress upon fiscal subjects at the special session, which has been called shall be known.

Since the 25th of January last, the market value of five per cent. stocks of this state, redeemable at the pleasure of the legislature, has fallen from $100 to a range from eighty-one to ninety-one per cent. The latest quotation was at eighty-three. If money should be borrowed, the rate of interest upon a stock having the same period to run, would, according to this estimate, be in order to loan money at a rate of not less than five per cent. and five-eighths to six per cent. and three quarters. An addition of three quarters of one per cent. per annum to the interest upon a million of dollars, would amount in twenty years to the sum of $1,250,000. The sum of the seventeen millions of dollars to two millions five hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The importance of procuring long loans at low rates of interest, is therefore evident since the ability of the state to carry on its system of improvements, in proportion as the amounts paid for interest are increased. Although the rate of interest is not subject to our control, it may be affected by our action. It is certainly not to be reduced by offering higher rates from time to time. Indeed the offer of a large amount of stocks at high rates would operate very injuriously. The borrower who is found soliciting large sums in a season of commercial panic, and offering ruinous interest, is sure, speedily to destroy his credit, however great it may have been, and to increase the rate of the next auction. The principles which govern commerce are invariable, and neither individuals nor states have any exemption from them. These views show the importance of a restricted use of the state credit in such emergencies. It may not be unprofitable to consider the nature of that credit, its present condition and prospects.

There is seldom a surplus of domestic capital in our new and enterprising country. Nearly all the money ever borrowed upon our state stocks, was obtained directly or indirectly from Europe, capitalists loan money to states and nations, because such loans are regarded as the safest and most convenient form for large investments. The hazards and delays of frequent investments are avoided, punctuality in the payment of interest is expected, while by reason of the convenience of the transfer of stocks, and the confidence generally reposed in the public faith pledged for their redemption, it is always easy to realize the utmost interest.

New York, in undertaking her system of internal improvements, entered the markets of Europe in competition with sovereign states of both continents. Her security is equal to that which any other state can give, and she possesses more wealth and resources and a greater surplus revenue in proportion to the debt she owes, than any nation in Europe, or any state on this continent. Although New York pays five per cent. interest, the Great Britain, and she is a great deal better off, the assessed value of property in New York is seven hundred millions of dollars, and her debt fifteen millions, while Great Britain, with a debt of nearly four thousand millions of dollars, has aggregated a fourth of probably not more than ten times that sum.

The hazards of war and civil commotion enter into the calculations of the lender, and affect the rate of interest. No country has more stable government than Great Britain, and she has never had peace than New York. None, in proportion to its extent, has greater resources, or more active energy in developing them. Nuna has a sinking fund so sure and unfailing as the constantly augmenting revenues of our canals. Other governments borrow money to pay previous loans, to defray ordinary expenses of government or to carry on wars destructive of the ability to reimburse the loans contracted. This state borrows only to increase and improve her sources of revenue. European states borrow without expecting to repay the principal, except by renewed loans. This state limits her debts by a rule which contemplates the reimbursement of the principal at the end of twenty years. The state is not a debtor to any individual, but individuals, has always a gradual and sometimes an unequal growth. The newness of our existence, the supposed instability of our institutions, the ignorance of capitalists concerning us, and the prejudice against our government, have caused the rate of interest on our stocks to be higher than that upon the debts of European governments. Nevertheless, an experience of twenty-five years has shown, that five per cent. is as high a rate as it has yet been necessary to pay, in a tranquil and ordinary condition of commercial affairs.

An allusion to the cause of the depression of our stocks will serve to convince us that that depression must be temporary. The interest upon all our stock has always been punctually paid. Every dollar of the principal of our debts that has fallen due has been promptly reimbursed, and we are now redeeming all our stocks that have not yet reached maturity. Without any resort to any direct taxation for the purpose of raising the principal of our debts of dollars. It cannot be possible, therefore, that the depreciation of our stocks results from any unaccounted in our fiscal condition, as the committee endeavored to show in the former part of this report, the state is, in no degree, being owing to the policy now pursued.

The supply of capital seeking investment in American securities is, like every other supply in trade limited. The stocks of our sister states have been purchased in the market at a high rate of interest than New York has thought wise to offer. These states, having perpetuity and sovereignty as well as ours, their stocks have been supposed as safe, for investments as ours, while the higher interest seemed to insure a greater profit. Misconduct in stock bearing an interest of ten per cent. An investment in her stocks yield, without compounding interest, a return equal to one hundred per cent. on the whole sum loaned, in ten years. An investment in our stocks yield, in the same time, the same principles of calculation, only fifty per cent.

The stocks of all the states have been forced into market in unusual quantities, and at great sacrifice, during a long season of commercial embarrassment. Apprehensions of the depreciation of the stocks of the states, that the interest on the debt cannot be paid without a resort to taxation, and some have already partially resorted to this mode. The perfectly popular structure of our state governments, has been referred to as insulating grounds for supposing that taxes will not be better, and hence, that the American states may not have the virtue of value to be just, and preserve their public faith. In consequence of these and other causes, the stocks of several of the states have been sinking for the last two years. We have recently witnessed some of the effects of this depreciation, in the losses suffered by the stocks heretofore received as securities under the act authorizing free banking. The evil has not been mitigated by the loan and temper manifested towards state credit by the former executive departments of the union, and by the attitude of the United States; while the federal government has increased the embarrassment of the times, by becoming itself a borrower to large amounts in the domestic market. The apprehensions of a collision with Great Britain, growing out of the unsettled state of our relations with her, have not been barren to the credit of the state. Under these circumstances, the stocks of all the states have depreciated. Illinois 6 per cent are sold at 48; Indiana 3 per cent at 53; Arkansas 6 per cent at 70; Ohio 6 per cent at 48; and Pennsylvania 5 per cent at 50. It, as it is not to be doubted, Illinois 6 per cent will ultimately be redeemed, an investment in them is as safe as in our own. One hundred thousand dollars thus invested would bring a return of one hundred and thirty, with interest and redemption at 6 per cent. It is not surprising, therefore, that stocks so greatly depreciated, found a more ready sale than our own.

Very imperfect knowledge is had in European circles of the comparative condition of the several states, and consequently no careful discrimination is made among them. Our credit, and that of the other rich and long established states, has heretofore aided the credit of those who were less well supplied with funds, and, consequently, is slightly affected by their embarrassments. Under these circumstances, moderation and economy are urged upon us equally by public sentiment, by a just regard to the public interest, and by a desire to render our system more improved, and, consequently, more prehensive. While we should steadily persevere in the prosecution of the system, we are undoubtedly called upon to limit the issue of our stocks as much as possible, during the present year. Our sister states will, it is our confident belief, by good and judicious aid, aided by a wise and paternal policy on the part of the federal government, soon retrieve their credit. Their energies are only temporarily suspended, and by no means paralyzed. The indication of a change of policy, however, is not to be overlooked. But if this expectation, which every lover of our common country must indulge, should fail, a discrimination must then take place between our stocks and those of our sister states; and the effects as far as our credit is concerned, will be the same. Probably another year will disclose with certainty, one or the other of these results, and it will then be apparent, either that the rate of interest on our state stocks will return to a former standard, or that, as some suppose, there is a permanent advance in the rate upon all public securities, warranting an increase in the rate upon our own.

The committee apprehend little dissent from these views, so far as the undertaking of new works and the construction of new portions of the canal is concerned. But the questions remains, what course shall be adopted in regard to the sum $6,102,485 required to fulfil existing contracts.—There are those who would advise a suspension of the public works. It is obvious, however, that we will be sure all the probable consequences ought to be considered. The public faith is pledged to our citizens, they have invested capital and pledged their credit to a very large amount in materials, machinery and implements, and have no person or persons to whom they have their agreements with subcontractors, and these again have others, and thus a very large number of persons are relying upon the faith of the state.

The abrupt suspension of the public works would bring new and unapprehended evils upon a community deeply suffering from pecuniary embarrassments. Provision must be made to indemnify the damages to those who have contracted faithfully with the state. The sum required for this purpose would far exceed the additional five-eighths or three-fourths of one per cent. when the state would expend in obtaining the requisite funds at the present rate. But the damages thus paid, even if they were promptly discharged, would fail to reach thousands of individuals and families, who, without unknown to the state, would be plunged into distress by a failure of their accustomed occupation and means of support. Besides all this, the unfinished portions of the public works would be expended by the contractors, would become discredited, and the ultimate injury to the revenues of the state from this cause cannot be estimated. This spectacle of dilapidated works, of discontent and of suffering would be as unreluctant as it is unnecessary. A depreciation of labor, productions and property, must ensue from so sudden and unlooked for a contraction of business, while injuries of even a more serious character would result, affecting the value of all property in the vicinity of the public works. The policy of the state would no longer be known or understood. No such sudden change of policy ever occurs without serious injury to the public welfare and the permanent interests of the state, and years would be required to repair the injury thus produced. When these evils should be felt, it may be reasonably doubted whether it would be a sufficient atonement to the people, that our predecessors contracted for too large a plan or too rapid a prosecution of our enterprises, and it certainly would not be a satisfactory state, that the rate of interest upon money had advanced five-eighths or three-quarters of one per cent. beyond what was expected when the works were undertaken.

In view of the whole subject, it seems expedient and even necessary that provision should be made to complete existing contracts. But a careful regard for our permanent credit, requires that the amount appropriated during the present year, should be greater than absolutely necessary to preserve the canal, and avert injury to the state, or to those engaged in the performance of contracts. The committee believe, after much consideration of the subject, that the amount appropriated by the legislature in 1840, of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, of which sum, $2,150,000 should be apportioned to the Erie enlargement, $550,000 to the Genesee Valley canal, and $200,000 to the Black River canal. Though this reduction may occasion considerable inconvenience to contractors, it will prove too small for the absolute emergencies of the works in progress, yet if there should be any error on such a subject, in such times as these, it is better that it should be on the side of caution and economy.

The next legislature will have the advantage of knowing the settled and permanent condition of financial affairs in the country. Existing contracts will then be nearly completed. The state will then be enabled to reassess its existing obligations, and that the legislature will have the whole system more under its control, and its measures may be adapted to the actual condition of things, without being framed by the question of violation of contracts. It is not necessary to require a further discussion of unfinished portions of the works. If prudence shall then still require a retarding in our progress, or a modification of the system, the legislature will be at liberty to adopt a corresponding policy. But if, on the contrary, it shall then appear, as all must soon see, that the fiscal condition of the state is sound, that its surplus revenues exhibit a steady augmentation, so as to warrant increased expenditures, the legislature will find no embarrassments in adopting measures for further progress.

Considerations both of prudence and justice, seem to require that the same principles be extended to the New York and Erie rail road company, and that the same restrictions be imposed as to the amount of stock to be issued to that company during the present year; that the rate of interest upon the stock to be loaned to it be the same as upon that issued for the canal, and that the same restrictions be imposed upon its operations in such a proportion as shall be necessary to conform to the restricted policy pursued in regard to the canal.

The particulars in relation to the debt of the state, its extension and expenditure, and the disposition of the public works, have been fully stated in the reports referred to the committee, and especially, in a very full and satisfactory report made by the financial committee of the senate, that we do not hope to shed any new light upon those subjects.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The revenue bill passed, and the legislature adjourned. The revenue bill, or retail bill, passed the senate of Pennsylvania on Monday, by the constitutional majority of two-thirds, notwithstanding the governor's veto, and was sent to the house for concurrence. It was there discussed with much earnestness on Tuesday morning, and the vote being taken, there appeared for the bill 48, against it 43. So the bill was lost, there not being a majority of two-thirds in its favor.

At the commencement of the afternoon session, a motion to reconsider the above vote, was made and carried by a vote of 48 to 28, and became a law of the state, without the signature of the governor. It includes the same sections relative to the United States Bank.

A modified revenue bill had passed the house, on Monday, embracing nearly the same provisions as the bill above mentioned, except so much as relates to the United States Bank. After passing the senate, it was returned to the house on Tuesday with amendments, which the house immediately concurred in. At this took place prior to the reconsideration and passage of the bill above mentioned.

At 11 o'clock, P. M. on Tuesday, the legislature adjourned sine die.

The Journal of Commerce publishes the following as the substance of the revenue bill.

The governor shall negotiate a loan not to exceed three millions at five per cent. No certificates for less than $100.

The banks of the commonwealth (the United States Bank excepted) shall be authorized to subscribe to the loan, which they may pay into the state treasury in their own notes of the denominations of one, two and three dollars, redeemable in state stock whenever presented to the amount of one hundred dollars at the counter of the banks which issued them. The notes thus redeemed to be marked "cancelled." The bank charter to be declared "forfeit," if the redemption is refused for ten days. A fine of from $500 to $2,000 to be inflicted upon every director, president, cashier or clerk who shall refuse to redeem the greater amount of these small notes than the bank (which he is attached) shall possess of the state stock, and shall be personally responsible in his private property for the amount of such issue. The banks, after issuing said notes, shall be bound to retain on hand with stock, receive one per cent. from the commonwealth for the loan.

The banks, however, shall pay the interest of five per cent. per annum to the holders of the state stock which they issue in redemption of their own small notes, and they shall deduct the interest thus paid from the dividend tax due the state. If the interest exceed the tax, then the state shall refund.

Banks are to subscribe for loan and issue notes in payment thereof in the following proportions: for their capital paid in of $300,000, five per cent; of $700,000, twenty per cent; of $2,500,000, seventeen per cent; above the last named sum, six per cent.

Small notes thus issued shall be receivable for debts due the commonwealth, and may be re-issued by the state treasurer or by the bank, and shall be receivable by the bank for debts and on deposit, and payable in full currency; provided this permission shall not be applied to special contracts for the payment of deposits.

Banks which do not pay taxes on their dividends (excepting the Bank of the United States) may deposit with the auditor general portions of the funded debts of the state as security for the redemption of notes which they may issue. Such banks then may issue notes of denominations less than $5, in the sum proportioned to its stock as previously stated, and under the same penalties with regard to over issues; and the state officer will, when these notes are presented in amount of $100 issue scrip, be returned to the banks whose notes are redeemed. Interest on scrip to be suspended while in the hands of the auditor general.

Bank notes issued under this act to have a uniformity of phraseology.

The banks not subject to the payment of more than six per cent. interest when sued for the payment of notes, allowed to declare dividends of five per cent. per annum (in specie) for the year 1840, relative to the forfeiture of charters is suspended—excepting all such banks as shall refuse or neglect to accept the conditions of this bill. Those accepting shall have the benefit of issuing the amount intended to be issued (in specie) for their stocks.—Banks to notify the governor of their stock account within forty days after the passage of the bill.

The following are the provisions relative to the United States Bank.

If the stockholders of the bank meet on Tuesday, or at any other general meeting, shall decide by a majority of votes (according to the scale of votes allowed at the election of directors) to make an assignment, it shall be the duty of the directors, in the corporate name of the bank, to make and execute such an assignment, and to deliver up all the property of the bank to free or more trustees, to be elected by a like vote; and while in these trustees shall be vested all the goods, chattels, rights, &c. of the bank, there shall not be necessary any inventory or appraisements, nor shall security be required.

The assignment shall contain instructions to the trustees as to their duty and compensation.

Trustees to hold their office until January next, when the same or other persons shall be elected by a like vote by the stockholders, and so on from year to year until the trust shall be completed.

The corporate power of the bank, after the assignment, shall cease and determine, excepting for purposes of suing and being sued, and continuing suits now pending, making assurances, transfers and other acts necessary for the trust; and for calling the trustees to account, and compelling them to execute said trust, and for choosing directors to receive and distribute among the stockholders any surplus after the payments of the debts.

The courts of the commonwealth to have jurisdiction of the trust, and the legislature may, without consent of the stockholders, change the provisions of this act as it may deem expedient.

The banking privilege to cease so far as it regards loaning money, issuing notes and bills, and to be confined to the settlement of its affairs and the disposal of its effects.

No proxies valid unless issued within sixty days of the election or meeting.

Vote passed from the governor, of the "act" to provide revenue to meet the demands on the treasury, and for other purposes."

On Saturday, the 1st inst. governor Porter sent to the legislature the following message, giving his reasons for withholding his assent to the relief bill. To the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania:

GENTLEMEN: In returning to the legislature the bill entitled "an act to provide revenue to meet the demands on the treasury, and for other purposes," without my approval, I feel that I am discharging one of the most responsible and painful duties that has devolved upon me, since I have been entrusted with the executive functions of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, by the people. I have examined the various provisions of the bill, with an earnest and anxious desire to give it my sanction; but I could bring my mind to the conviction, that it was not wholly incompatible with the public interests; but after the most careful consideration, I am constrained, by an overwhelming sense of duty, to refuse it my assent. No person can read this bill, however hastily, without perceiving that it is one of a peculiar character. It provides in the first instance, for the redemption of a loan of three millions of hundred thousand dollars, and the sum distributed in the amount of notes of a large portion of which is under the denomination of five dollars, to be based upon the loan by certain banks required to take it, described in the bill. The manner in which this loan is to be taken and repaid, at the expiration of one year, or sooner, at the pleasure of the legislature, and also in which the notes are to be issued and finally cancelled, is somewhat intricate and complicated, but is still, perhaps, sufficiently clear to be carried into practicable operation, without any great difficulty.

The bill also provides for a limited augmentation of the amount of tax upon certain classes of citizens, likewise for the depositing of certain portions of the funded debt of this state, as security for the redemption of notes of denomination not less than five dollars to be issued upon the credit of said debt, by the banks of this commonwealth, except the Bank of the United States. And in the seventeenth section, it provides that the penalties, imposed upon the banks, of paying a greater rate of interest than six per cent, and the provisions of the acts of assembly, and various acts of incorporation, which point out a mode for the forfeiture of any charter of any bank, or by reason of the non payment of its liabilities on demand, shall be the same as upon the banks of other States, in this action, and until the legislature make provision for the re-payment of the loan authorized by the first section of this act; and repeals the resolution passed the third day of April, 1840, entitled "a resolution providing for the redemption of the loan authorized by the banks, and for other purposes." The succeeding sections authorize the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, to make a general assignment of all its real and personal estate, goods, chattels, &c. to trustees, for the purpose of securing and paying the debts and obligations of that institution, and execute such trustee or assignees from the operation of such parts of the general laws of this commonwealth as require that they should file an inventory, or appraisement, of the property assigned or conveyed in trust; and also from giving security for the faithful discharge of their duties, and leaves the whole of these important guarantees for the faithful execution of their trust, to the discretion and regulation of the trustees. And in the twenty-third section, is found a singular and extraordinary provision, that after subjecting the trustees appointed by the stockholders to the exclusive control of the said stockholders, the courts of this commonwealth shall have jurisdiction of the trust, and that if it were created under any general law of the state. This follows the provision, that it shall be lawful for the legislature, and the power is hereby expressly reserved, at any time or times, with the consent of the said stockholders, at a general meeting for that purpose convened according to the charter, to change and alter the provisions of this act in such a manner as to the legislature may seem expedient. If there be any security whatsoever to the public in these last named inoperative provisions, I confess it is not obvious to my mind. Such is the general substance of this bill, so far as it relates to the banking institutions of this commonwealth. In addition to which it appropriates the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be paid in thousands of dollars, to various necessary and important objects connected with the government. On the passage of this bill depends the successful prosecution of the common school system, the payment of donations to academies and female seminaries, pensions and gratuities to old soldiers, the repairs of the rail roads and canals for the current year, payments of debts due for repairs made prior to first of November last, appropriations to orphan asylums and houses of refuge, a system for blind and deaf and dumb, to pay damages and the militia expenses, to pay all the expenses of government, to pay look keepers, wagon masters and other persons employed on the public works, to pay certain guarantees to the public for the redemption of the loan authorized for work done on the Erie divisions, North Branch extension, Wisconsin canal, and numerous other specified public improvements, to pay the canal commissioners, appraisers and engineers, and, in addition to all these, the bill provides for the execution of which appropriations of money are required. This bill, I believe, is the very first in the whole history of our government in which the necessary expenses of government, indeed the whole of our expenses of government, are provided for; it cannot meet on a day, have been connected with extraneous subjects of questionable character, and concerning which, it was not only possible but probable that conflicting opinions respecting their policy and expediency among the various departments, of some uniting assent was necessary for the passage of the law. It has been, hitherto, among the statesmen of Pennsylvania, the received opinion that the indispensable expenditure of government should be furnished at all events, whatever else might fall. But this bill, originating from that long established usage, has directly involved these expenses with the regulation and control of the banking system of the commonwealth, upon which, perhaps, more than upon any other subject, irreconcilable differences of opinion have existed. Without the sanction of the legislature to compel the executive to surrender honest and conscientious convictions of duty, to reference to at least two of the provisions contained in this bill, for the purpose of obtaining appropriations of money, and for the successful prosecution of the government, I must be permitted to say that, such might very readily be a system of coercion adopted by the legislature, by which they would be enabled to destroy entirely the independence of the executive, or to arrest at any moment the action of government. I take my stand at the threshold of these encroachments, and respectfully protest against the policy of connecting measures of undoubted public utility, with those of questionable utility, with a view of tendering what is just and proper a cover and a pretext for measures that are not deemed to be of that character.

I am aware that in a free government, like ours, consisting of independent co-ordinate departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, other of those departments could, or should, compel the others to yield peculiar opinions of their own in all things, without mutual concession and compromise. I trust I shall never be found so unreasonable as to require the legislature to surrender its own convictions of duty, on subjects of great public policy, without testifying to my own entire willingness to meet them at least half way. It is true, when attempts have been made to reach certain objects, by the use of unconstitutional means, as, for example, by means which I deem unjust and improper, I have not hesitated, nor shall I hesitate, to take my position on that solid ground of official independence, wherein I am placed by the constitution. In such cases I have testified my executive authority to prevent the passage of laws, in which I clearly saw no great public interest was involved, without concession or compromise. Self-respect forbids my pursuing any other course. But when a measure, like the present bill, is proposed for my assent, and I feel sure it will be finally carried, and that it is not without a sincere and earnest effort on my part to prevent it, by every reasonable offer of mutual concession,

I will now state concisely the objections to this bill, which appear to me to be insurmountable.

In the first place, I consider the seventeenth section as giving to the banks an absolute exemption from the redemption of specie payable for at least the period of five years, mentioned in the first section of the bill. It is provided, among other things, in the seventeenth section, that all laws imposing penalties of interest greater than six per cent, as also the forfeiture of their charters, for certain delinquencies shall be suspended until formal legislative action, and until provision is made for the payment of the loan authorized by the first section of the bill. Now, had this subject of suspension been left entirely to the further action of the legislature, without compelling it with the provision for the re-payment of the loan of three millions one hundred thousand dollars, it would have been far less objectionable. But even then, what would be my condition? This suspension would continue till it was terminated by legislative action, and although the people might, by a large majority, will that it should cease, yet if the banks could find favor with either branch of the legislature, or with the executive, it would be impossible to carry that will into execution.

If it were, is it just, to surrender such power as this, to the banks, when in all contests heretofore had between these institutions and the people, they have proved victorious? But, by the bill before me, they are to be exempted from the necessity of any further legislation, but until the legislature provide for the re-payment of this large loan. How will it ever be repaid, if this bill should pass? The banks control and regulate the pecuniary transactions of the country, in such a manner as to create an amount of capital as they so evolved. They are directly interested in preventing the re-payment of this loan at the end of five years, or of ten years, because they enjoy exemption from the forfeiture of their charters as long as this loan remains unredeemed. It is not at all likely at the end of five years, or even ten years, the commonwealth will be able to pay of a loan of three millions of dollars, without making another loan for that purpose. From whom can this loan be procured? Surely not from Europe, for the principal of the loan would be paid already. Not from our own banks, for if they were to make a loan to the state, it would be to deprive themselves of the valuable privileges they enjoy, under the exemptions already mentioned. It is not from the people, for they are already interested in the bank, as to be restrained by that consideration; or they can probably find, as they have heretofore done, more profitable investments for their money. It is idle, therefore, to say, that this loan can be repaid at the end of five years, or even a greater length of time, with such strong interests in the way to prevent it.

An act of the legislature authorizing a loan to be taken for the re-payment of this loan of three millions one hundred thousand dollars, would be fruitless; the money could not be obtained upon it, and until it was obtained, the banks would be beyond the reach of the legislature, and would enjoy their right of suspension, in defiance of its action. It scarcely requires a prophet to predict, what would be the issue of a law like this. At the end of the five years mentioned in the first section of the bill there would be a renewal of the same loan, and the same system of operations for another period of five years. The banks would be enabled to thus have suspension which might be well considered as perpetual. We cannot foretell its consequences, we cannot foresee its end. The moment it is engrained upon our system, we may despair of all other remedy, and may be forced upon us until the system itself, by its own excesses and corruption, is annihilated. The specie still remaining in the vaults of the banks, and in the hands of the people, will vanish, and a dreary, hopeless era of currency, paper money, open upon this commonwealth.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the spectacle this scene, without feelings of the deepest repugnance. Nor can I believe it is right to fasten such a condition as this upon a measure independently necessary to the healthful existence of the functions of government.

The authority given to the stockholders of the Bank of the United States to make an assignment, and also the exemption of the trustees or assignees from giving, as is usual in such cases, security for the faithful execution of their trust, and also from giving out an inventory, and having an appraisement taken of the property assigned, seems to me, to be a dangerous and an unnecessary surrender of the proper control over persons entrusted with such an important duty. It is provided, that the stockholders of the bank, or any of them, shall have no power of regulating the conduct of the trustees or assignees, as vested in the stockholders of the bank, but from sundry recent disappointments in that in-

GREAT BRITAIN.

The burning of the Caroline. The London Times gives the following statement:

Henry Dixon, a young man of color, and a native of Upper Canada, came before Sir John Cowen, bart, to ask his advice.

The applicant stated on a previous day that he came to England from New York in December last, on board the British Queen, to endeavor to get a situation in this country, but had been ever since unsuccessful, and in consequence of ill health he had been compelled to pawn his clothes, and had spent all the money he had brought away with him, which was nearly sixty pounds; he therefore wished to know how he was to proceed to get his clothes, to work his passage back to his own country. He further stated that at the time of the late Canadian rebellion he was steward on board of one of the passenger boats that plied between Buffalo and the city of Rochester, near the falls of Niagara, and finding the English were in want of troops he volunteered his services under colonel Kirby, and was elatedly employed in giving information of the movements of McKenzie and the enemies, through which he got introduced to the notice of captain Paget. He had been formerly waiter at the Eagle Tavern, Buffalo, and had assisted in pulling out the Caroline at Black Rock; and it was chiefly through his information that the vessel was burnt.

On that occasion Mr. Alderman Luceas advised him to get a certificate from the owners of the British Queen of his good conduct, and to call again. He in consequence brought a written certificate from the owners of the vessel, stating that he had come over as a passenger, and had paid £11 for his passage.

Sir John Cowen now asked him if he knew any one who could give him a good character, as he thought it would be dangerous to go back to New York, as he had been in the secret service of the British government, to which he replied that he knew capt. Paget, at Chelsea hospital, and had just been in that gentleman, who said that if he had known he was coming over to this country he would have engaged him as a servant.

Sir John Cowen: What made you leave the service in Canada? Applicant: When the regular troops came, I was not wanted. My situation was worth fifty dollars a month before I enlisted.

Sir John Cowen: Have you any friends out there? Applicant: My father is dead, and my mother likewise. My father was a gunsmith, and was well known about Buffalo for 14 years.

Sir John Cowen: Did you ever hear any thing about col. McLeod being the person that fired the Caroline? Applicant: I did not know any thing about the persons who fired her; I was one of the persons who cut her out of the ice at Black Rock harbor.

Sir John Cowen: Were any human beings on board when she was fired? Applicant: There were eight persons on board. One was Hemmings, the other captain Appleby, a third was a man named Pory Johnson, but they all made their escape, except a lad, who was killed.

Sir John Cowen: The American government says that several American citizens were killed. Applicant: They said so, but they could not get the same of any one killed. When the Caroline was boarded, it was on an exceedingly dark night, and as the boarders got up on one side the crew went over the other, except Johnson who was too drunk to leave the Caroline, and he begged for his life, which was granted.

Sir John Cowen: When were you to go away? Applicant: I intended to go on Saturday, in the Philadelphia.

The alderman then asked Mr. Newman, the clerk, whether it would not be better to give the young man a letter of introduction to some one at the colonial office, for if he had served the government as he stated, the distressed condition to which he was reduced would, no doubt, be considered, of which plan Mr. Newman approved; but it was deferred to the justice room, and stated that poor fellow, (who was very intelligent and polite) then received a little relief, and was about to leave the office, to await the result of further investigation on the part of the alderman, when colonel Appleby came into the justice room, and stated that, having seen the reports in the papers, he wished to see Dixon. The colonel then put several questions to the young man about the officers and the circumstances of the time, to which he seemed to give satisfactory answers. Col. Appleby then had a private interview with Sir John Cowen, when the latter re-entered the office, and stated to Dixon that the gallant colonel intended to see Sir F. Hay on the subject of his application.

England and Texas. The London papers contain the treaty of commerce signed in that capital on the 13th November last between England and Texas. It is framed on the basis of strict reciprocity, but does not apply to the colonies. The conditions upon which Texas may trade with the colonies are to be regulated hereafter. Vessels wholly owned by citizens of Texas, and where the master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, are citizens of the republic, are declared to be Texian vessels within the meaning of the treaty, although not built in that country. The treaty is to continue in force eight years, and further, until the expiration of 12 months after one of the high contracting parties shall have notified to the other an intention to terminate its duration.

FRANCE. Steam communication in the south of France is becoming of vast extent. The regular passage down the Saône from Chalons to Lyons is now much resorted to by travellers. At Lyons there is the "blue" Rhone, with its picturesque mountains covered with vines, its ruined castles of a "baron bold," and its antique towers, to tempt tourists from dusty diligence expeditions.—Take Arles on the route, and contemplate its mighty ruins, the arena, or amphitheatre, second only to those of Nîmes and Rome. From Arles you may plunge by the mouth of the Rhone into the Mediterranean, and seven hours' "steaming" under a southern sky deposits you in Marseilles. Take five hours more of coasting, and you go from Marseilles to Toulon, evincing the execrable roads between these two ports. A marine service is rapidly forming; steamer sailors they may be, but if the "steam" be up, there is material for more crews.

Expenditures and resources. It appears from official statements submitted to the chamber of deputies, and the facts elicited in debate thereon, that the splendid military preparations of France, the expenses of her African conquest, and other costly schemes prosecuted during the last three years, have hounded her with a heavy debt. The liabilities of the government for the years 1840, '41 and '42, will, it is stated, exceed the revenue for those years in the sum of nearly one thousand millions of francs.

The following statement laid before the chamber by M. Gouin, ex-minister of finance, the correctness of which was not impugned by the ministerial party, will show the manner in which this debt has been incurred:

146,000,000	deficit on the ordinary budgets of 1840, '41 and '42
228,300,000	extraordinary civil public works.
140,000,000	fortifications of Paris.
75,000,000	fortifications in other places.
75,000,000	harbors & magazines.
12,000,000	artillery.
44,000,000	port of Cherbourg.
7,731,000	military works.
29,000,000	construction of steamships.
6,831,500	for the Levant.
15,800,000	extraordinary naval armaments.
20,000,000	extraordinary naval armaments.
33,800,000	extraordinary military armaments.
86,000,000	interest of the new loan.
1,120,940,886	grand total.
137,400,000	to be deducted as paid from existing funds.
983,540,886	to be met by extraordinary ways and means.

The answer of M. Thiers to this somewhat appalling array of figures is characteristic. "True," he says, "we have spent a milliard more than we had to spend, but we have spent it well; the passions of the country have been gratified; immense numbers of Arabs have been slaughtered; our capital will soon be surrounded by ramparts and ditches; and we have half a million of fine active young men taken from their natural employment to live at the public expense in the barracks we have just built for them."

The results so exultingly pointed to as benefits by M. Thiers, we hold, most of them, to be positive evils; and his speech confirms the opinion we have long entertained, that M. Thiers is a genuine demagogue, without a particle of genuine patriotism, and that, like certain other demagogues who have recently felt the force of public opinion in this country, he looks upon the people, whose interests he affects to have so deeply at heart, as a mass of puppets—puppets to be played upon through their passions and their prejudices. He will be found out at last, as his brother demagogues on this side of the Atlantic have been, and, like them, will become a mark for the finger of scorn.

Mr. Gouin in the course of the speech in which he submitted the financial statistics given above, observed, that his chief anxiety was directed, not to the means of stopping the gap, at the present moment, for that must evidently be done by a vast loan, and as the money is spent the less that is said about it the better; but he felt that it was of the most importance to ascertain whether reasonable expectations can be entertained of balancing the ordinary revenue and the ordinary expenditures of the country in future years, without reference to any of these occasional storms in the commercial and political world, which may drive the stoutest vessel out of its course. The result is, in M. Gouin's opinion, that France is threatened with a regular annual deficit of 60 millions, which may amount to 100 millions if the system of armed peace is to be maintained.

This is, however, scarcely a fair supposition; since M. Guizot does not take into account the probable increase of the revenue. The revenue raised by direct taxes in France has increased during the last five years 20 millions of francs per annum, and there is every reason to expect a further augmentation, though not in proportion to the enormous ratio of increase in the expenditures during the last two years.

The government must retrench its expenses, and the permanent interests, the "passions," of the people, must be consulted in the appropriation of the public money; the "half million of fine active young men, taken from their natural employment to live at the public expense," must be restored to agriculture, commerce and manufactures; and the furor for military aggrandizement which has been so artfully stimulated by M. Thiers and his colleagues, must be superseded by a wiser, a calmer, and a more domestic spirit, before the income of the belle France can be made to balance her expenditures.

Common sense, and the material interests of the industrious and working classes, are happily fast undermining in Europe the passion for war—that most expensive of all luxuries for nations that have once come to understand the value of the blessings of peace, and the blessings which peace bring. Sovereigns, and feudal barons, who reap all the honors, and defray few of the expenses, of war, may rejoice like magnificent hunters in the excitements and perils of the blood sports of the chase; but when the masses, whose property is wasted, whose blood is poured out, and who indeed are the hunted, have now become too enlightened, and happily too powerful to be often or longer fooled into war to gratify leaders, or win laurels for military chieftains.

Even France, the most military nation in Europe, begins to count the cost of indulging in its ancient passion, and the following notice from a late London Spectator, (17th April), of the present state of feeling in that country, is gratifying, both as indicating that the peace of Europe, though much threatened, is not soon likely to be disturbed, and as proving, what these remarks were designed to establish, that war must go out of fashion, and common sense and enlightened self-interest obtain the ascendancy.

The expense of the mere preparation for war, coupled with judicious moderation on the part of the present government, appear to have produced a very considerable change in the feeling of the French lately. The fit of military ardor is subsiding. M. Thiers says that France is always under the influence of some passion, which dies only to give place to another. After the revolution of 1830, it was a passion for glory, and with a people excited for public works; and now that the neglected military passion of the empire is revived, all the paraphernalia for its gratification have to be repurchased or repaired, at immense cost. This damps the ardor of the passion military; and even M. Thiers, who was once willing to play the part of parader to the passion which he so critically describes, begins to count the expense. He left the ministry with vast schemes on foot, with reticulated and difficult foreign relations, and with a people excited to a pitch of furor by the passion which he had fomented.

His successors found the torrent for which he had opened the sluices too powerful to be suddenly stemmed, and they yielded for a while to the same proceeding in the same direction to which he had pointed. Having once committed themselves, perhaps almost unavoidably, to that seeming adoption of his policy, they were obliged for the sake of consistent appearance to continue it for a time, until they could gradually turn the stream. At that turn, M. Thiers takes an artful advantage of their position, and asks, if you do not mean to carry out my policy, why do you carry on my expenditure? He knows well enough, that he could be dangerous for them to do otherwise. In the first instance, and that it is not yet time for them to have effected a change; but no answer is ready for him, and he has the advantage of cleverly reducing them to a non-plus.

Meanwhile, the conditional demand for reduced establishments conveyed in this query, and still more the indifference with which M. Thiers speaks of the warlike policy, as a thing out of date—together with the French chancellor of the exchequer's assertion, finally contradicted, that France cannot support so enormous outlay like England—all arouse a remarkable alteration in the state of opinion in France. The daily sight of the rising wall which is to be in the Farnais, and of the regiments of the workmen to be fed with taxes, will perhaps extinguish the remains of the passion military. It seems not impossible that the next winter will see the terrible passion may be a passion for pulling down bastioned walls.

Paris, April 5, 1841. Although the news brought by the Britannia, to the 16th of March, does not put us in possession of a single new fact to alter the position in regard to America, the English press, and the English brokers, and the English government, even, have hastened to take advantage of the want of positive warlike intelligence, to believe that there will be no further trouble between America and England. The altered tone of the English press, since the government has found out that there is really some fear of a war, and since it has been demonstrated that however defenceless we are, they are as little able to attack, is one of the signs of the times, which it does well to note. It is to be hoped that our new government will work assiduously for the future, to revive our navy, and to do justice to our army. Let them take warning by the present position of the British navy, powerful and numerous as it is in ships, the actual condition of it is to be laughed at and not feared. There are good ships in the Mediterranean, but they cannot be spared; their fleet in India is too far off—small as it is, to be of service. They have been fighting with ignorant people, unacquainted with the European mode of fighting, and without either of the warlike or commercial marine, and they have carried all before them. But they dare not go to war single handed against any civilized power, however weak it may be; and the late flaps up, to use a common term, between their own agents and the French, will not far France during the negotiation of last summer, because they were backed by all the other European powers. But when it came to be a question between America and England—when if war broke out, the latter must fight single handed against our nation as enlightened as herself, with the almost certainty that one, if not two, other powers, would eventually be brought into it, she began to look at the matter as serious and the consequence is, that now England talks of the folly, the wickedness, the impolicy of war, and, happily, hope is the word of the government papers, that America will not be so foolish as to declare war! Now, the chicanery of this whole talk is, in England, that our Brother Jonathan's ententes comitantes, and the first of war, that the first of the Atlantic it came from England, from the members of parliament in their places in the house, from the government papers, and from the mouth of every Englishman you met, either in London or abroad, was that there was no threatening at the moment we heard of Mr. Fox's letter to Mr. Forsyth. Mr. Pickens' report, although it overshoot the mark in some respects, opened their eyes, and they saw that there was some, and not a little reason in the language of his country, if not in all of them. They were alarmed to find that any man existed who did not fear England's supremacy, and that that boasted supremacy not so very supreme after all, they were glad of an opportunity to do what they longed to do when his failure was about to beg him, and exclaimed, "stop Dad's argument"—they then began to think it was best to stop and argue. From that time to this they have been glad to find any inkling of peaceable intelligence in the American news, and to make the most of it. The fact that the English consuls arrived on the reception of the news by the Britannia, which, as I said before is no news at all, giving us no new facts, only shows how easily the floods are prepared by interested persons, and how much more the passions are betrayed by the news of the day than we are in America. Some of the American whig papers, showing more partisan zeal against Mr. Pickens and his party than patriotism, have commented on his report in such a manner, and at such a length, as to afford the ultra whigs of this people of England ample opportunity to sneer at the people of the United States. A long article in the New York Express, written with a party recklessness altogether inappropriate to the occasion, has been extended and copied in the organs of the new administration, and of the authorized mouth-piece of the great majority which elected Gen. Harrison. Our papers, generally, I am sorry to say, too often furnish occasion to make us appear in a bad light, made use of as they are by the English press. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Pickens' report, and however inexpedient the publication of it may have been, it contained sacred truths which cannot be controverted—and it has had a good effect.

But to go back to our navy and army. We must prepare for war, for war we shall have sooner or later, and however we may wish to avoid it, however we may try to shut our eyes to the necessity for it, that necessity will force it upon us, and it is time to take advantage of every day to be prepared for it. The English government see it, and they will not be in this present state of affairs. The fortifications of our coast, the increase of our navy, and manufacturing of the material for war, such as iron cannon and other arms, should not be delayed any longer. It is useless to talk, we must act, and they will probably be so in the present state of affairs, as an impetuous duty, and upon the people as the means of present safety and future prosperity.

We have no news of importance since my last, if we except the fact that a four-wheeled carriage, a perfect loss of a thing, has been built for the princess royal of Great Britain, to be drawn by two Shetland ponies, so gentle that even a child may drive them; and that the queen of Naples has got a daughter. [Cur. Host. Cor.]

SPAIN. The position of affairs in Spain at the present moment is particularly interesting. A newly elected cortes has just assembled, the political character of which is yet to be ascertained, on whom devolves not only the duties of ordinary legislation, but the responsibility of establishing a regency, on whom must devolve the powers of the sovereign during the minority of the queen. All eyes are of course turned to the successful general of the day, Espartero, who is distinguished by the title of duke de la Victoria. The leading question which has been agitated of late is whether the duke of Victoria, who is at present the head of the provisional regency—that is, the president of a board of three members—shall be constituted sole regent, or shall be elected one of three co-regents.

SANDWICH ISLANDS. The New Haven Register has received from an officer of the exploring expedition several numbers of the Journal, a paper published at Oahu, in the Sandwich Islands. A paper of the date of July, 1840, contains an interesting account of the loss of a small vessel, which was on a trip to an island about a hundred miles distant. Most of those on board were natives, and when they arrived at Oahu, they were swimming twenty or thirty miles. The following is an extract of a letter to the editor, giving an account of the calamity. Mauae, is the name of a native missionary, who was, with his wife, on board of the boat. [N. Y. Fed.]

Mauae will be afflicted to learn that the vessel Mauae is among those who were lost. His wife was saved, and they both swam twenty-five miles together before he died. What is wonderful beyond description is, that his wife carried him when he could no longer swim himself, and carried him till after he was dead. When she found he could go no further, she hid him hold to the hair of her head, and so she dragged him; but soon his head had slipped, and she tried in vain to raise him. She told him she must quit; but he commenced but could only utter a groan or two. She then put his arms around her neck, held them with one hand and swam with the other—When within a quarter of a mile of the shore, after swimming twenty-eight or thirty hours, she found he was dead and left him."

SOUTH AMERICA. From California. The following are extracts from a letter to the Boston Advertiser, dated "San Diego, March 2. In mine of January 15, I mentioned a report brought by the big Catalina, concerning the coasting trade, since which, official notice has been received that from and after the first day of January, last past, the coasting trade is prohibited to all foreign vessels that may arrive subsequently to that date; they may enter their vessels at Monterey, but must be unloaded and reloaded, and must not deposit their goods, and then proceed in ballast to each port one to make their sales, and afterward transport the amount sold in the same vessels under the Mexican flag.

"Such I believe are some of the principal features of the new regulations. Two vessels from the Sandwich Islands arrived at Monterey, but were not allowed to enter in consequence of having salt and sugar on board. The brig Thomas Perkins is now here, and came without the knowledge of the government to take some hides which are here belonging to Messrs. Pierce & Brewer. She is, however, ordered off and sails to-morrow morning.

"The country is in a deplorable state, in consequence of drought. There has been no rain yet below San Francisco, excepting two or three showers a few days since, and to add to the distress, the country from Sonoma to San Diego has been burnt over. The fire is still raging in many places, and has destroyed numbers of cattle and horses. There is neither grass nor water for them except in small quantities, and if there is not rain soon, great numbers must perish with hunger, in fact some have died already.

MEXICO.

The dates from Vera Cruz are to the 21st ultimo. A few cases of yellow fever had been reported by the authorities at Vera Cruz. The mail box was also going to a considerable degree.

The censor states that the internal duty of 15 per cent. recently laid, has entirely failed—not producing 5 per cent. on the old duty, for the reason that the Yucatan vessels, loaded with goods recognized by the tariff, coast along and smuggle at every point, defeating the whole revenue project. The smuggling has not been confined solely to Yucatan vessels, for the American schooner Sarah Ann, captain Boushous, has been captured in the illegal traffic off the bar of Sanaboy, and sent to Vera Cruz for trial.

TEXAS.

The national debt of Texas, consisting of bonds, treasury notes, &c., is $7,000,000. The amount of one year's taxes is estimated at $1,000,000; and the expenses of the government for the same period $500,000, per annum.

The Texas congress have passed a law, which has been approved by the president, forbidding the sale of any slaves, or indentured free negroes under any process of law, except it be under a decree of court for the final settlement of a deceased person's estate. No creditor can, by any process, force a sale of the negroes.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

William C. Lord, collector, Wilmington, N. C. vice Lewis H. Marshall.

Abraham Inskeep, appraiser, New Orleans, vice Sheldon S. Clark.

Com. William M. Crane, to be a member of the board of navy commissioners, (April 29th).

FUGITIVES.

Charles Martin, at Chillicothe, Ohio.

Celeb Foote, at Salem, Massachusetts.

DIPLOMACY. The Washington correspondent of the New York commercial writes—"It is said that the hon. John M. Clayton goes to England as minister plenipotentiary, and a specimen of American statesmanship cannot go there. He is a man of splendid attainments, and will do honor to our country at that court. I have no doubt that you will find the report confirmed by the official satisfaction of the fact very shortly."

Charge d'affaires to Texas. The president has appointed the hon. Joseph E. Yee, of Kentucky, charge to the republic of Texas. This is an important appointment, and it has been bestowed upon a firm and indefatigable patriot—one who will in all stations and conditions maintain the honor of his country.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S REMAINS.

In relation to the resting place of the remains of the lamented president Harrison, the Shelby (Ky.) News has the following paragraph:

We learn from Col. Todd, that on his way to his residence in this county last week, he, in the performance of a sacred duty, called upon the venerable widow of our lamented deceased president—Whilest there, he was invited by that lady to a consultation with herself and her only remaining son, as to the ultimate depository of the remains of her distinguished and beloved husband—the great and good president. It was determined, at this consultation, to remove the remains immediately to North Bend, to be deposited upon a beautiful and elevated natural mound, where the monument may be seen for several miles up and down the Ohio river.

* * * There, the traveller at distant ages, will be refreshed by a visit to the tomb of the warrior, who was never defeated; of the patriot, who died poor; and the statesman, who, from the proud height of president, "fell, like a star struck from its sphere, covered with glory and renown."

PRESIDENT TYLER AND THE INALIABLES.

From the Baltimore Sun.

His excellency, John Tyler, president of the United States:

Sir: In your recommendation to the people of the United States, on the 13th inst. to observe the fourteenth day of May next, as a day of fasting and prayer; but whereas, in the introduction you say, when a Christian people feel themselves to be overtaken by a great public calamity, it becomes them to humble themselves under the dispensation of Divine Providence to recognize his righteous government over the children of men.

I most respectfully request you to inform us, if the words a Christian people it becomes them, should be construed as excluding those who do not belong to the Christian church, or profess peculiar Christian ideas.

A. WEGLIN, president,
Of the Baltimore Hebrew congregation, Bond st.
Baltimore, April 30, 1841.

To J. Weglin, ex-president of the Hebrew congregation, Bond street, Baltimore, Md.

Washington, May 1, 1841.

Sir: In reply to your letter of the 30th ult. I have the honor to state, that in using the expression "Christian people" in the first part of my recommendation, I certainly never designed to be exclusive; so far from it, that I esteem it equally incumbent on all to bend in adoration before the common Father of mankind, to ask his protection and blessing and to improve his guardianship and care.

No people have ever had more cause to acknowledge the truth of this than the people of Israel.

The last paragraph of the recommendation ought to be sufficient to put yourself and all others at ease upon this subject, since by it every sect and every religious denomination, according to its own forms of worship, is requested to unite in the religious observance for the 14th inst. of the year. The chief magistrate of the United States, I am restrained by the express prohibitions of the constitution from all interference with the consciences of men, and Heaven forbid that I should in any manner usurp the judgment and choice which belong solely to the Most High God. Let us then all unite in imploring, on the day designated, benedictions on our common country. I salute you as a fellow citizen.

JOHN TYLER.

MR. VAN BUREN. From the Albany Argus we learn that Mr. Van Buren came up the river on Saturday last, in the steam boat Albany, reaching Sayres Landing at the afternoon of that day. It was received by a large concourse of his townsmen and citizens of the county, between one and two thousand with a cordial welcome and escorted to the village of Kinderhook, where he remains, preparatory to taking possession of his residence, the inauguration of the late W. P. Van Ness, near that village.

MR. WEBSTER. who reached New York on Friday morning 14th inst. from Boston on his way to Washington, to day, (17th), accompanied by Mr. Southard and other friends, paid a visit, by invitation of capt. Bolton, to the United States frigate Brandywine, lying off the battery.

The customary salute was fired on his leaving the ship and he was gratified, we do not doubt, by the appearance of this noble vessel, which, in his view, is in crack order.

MCLÉOD CASE. New York supreme court, May 17, 1841. Chief justice Neilson and judges Corwain and Bronson presiding.

A large crowd was again collected within and about the court room this (Monday) morning, being the day appointed for bearing the arguments in this case. At half past 9 Mr. McLeod, accompanied by the sheriff of Niagara, entered the court and took his seat in the recess of one of the windows. At 10 o'clock precisely, their honors took their seats, and inquired if counsel were ready in the criminal case set down for that morning.

Mr. Spencer replied that he was ready on the part of the prisoner.

The attorney general not having arrived, however, some preliminary business was disposed of, and Mr. Hale soon after appeared with Mr. Wood on the part of the people. Mr. Spencer and Mr. Bradley, counsel for McLeod, who took his seat at the table by their side.

A discussion then took place, as to which side had the right to open the argument. The attorney general contending that having interposed in demurrer, the right to commence was on his side.

It was not a vital question, as the people who should have the last word, and directed the counsel for the prisoner to proceed.

Mr. Bradley then read the return of the sheriff to the jury, stating that McLeod was in his custody when he received the court's order, and that on March term, 1841, under an arraignment on an indictment for murder, also by virtue of a writ of capias respondendum on the part of the people for trespass, and an order for commitment for entering upon, damaging and destroying the steamboat "Salvator," having done damage at $50,000, and ordering him to be held to bail in the sum of $7,000.

A note from Mr. Fox to Mr. Webster, dated March 12, 1841, was next read—it was as follows:—"Her majesty's government have had under consideration the subject of the arrest and imprisonment of Alexander McLeod, on a pretended charge of arson and murder, and I am directed to make known to the government of the United States that the British government entirely approved of the course pursued by me. I am instructed to demand formally, and in the name of the British government, the immediate release of Alexander McLeod, for the reason that the transaction was one of a public character, planned and executed by persons duly authorized by the colonial government, to take such measures as may be necessary for protecting the property and lives of her majesty's subjects, and, being therefore an act of public duty, they cannot be held responsible to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country."

The counsel also read extracts from the published correspondence between the authorities at Buffalo and the president, and that between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth; the object, as the counsel said, being to show that the case was a national affair, and that the president had considered it so, when he stated by Mr. Forsyth that it was a proceeding which would oblige them to make a demand for reparation from the British government.

Mr. Wood then stated the reasons for opposing the motion—

First, because the return of the sheriff showed that the prisoner was detained on an indictment for murder, in which he had pleaded not guilty, and the court could not investigate such indictment plea.

Secondly, because the matter set forth in the allegations did not show that his imprisonment was illegal; but referred merely to the question of his guilt or innocence, which was not now before the court.

Thirdly, because the steamer on the steamboat Caroline, a boat owned by a private citizen, unconnected with the insurgents, and navigating the waters in a lawful business for the benefit of the country, under a license from the United States, was made while owned in the state of New York, and made without the jurisdiction of Canada.

Fourthly, because the government of Upper Canada or Col. McNab had no authority to send persons to commit the act in the state of New York, and consequently each individual was responsible for his acts.

Fifthly, because Angus Duffee who was murdered, was a peaceable citizen of the U. States, unconnected with the insurgents, guilty of no offence against the laws of this state or the laws of Upper Canada, and that it was not necessarily connected with the attack of the Caroline, or necessary for the protection of her majesty's subjects.

Some discussions then arose as to the question before the court, and as it appeared to take a different course to that he expected, he asked to be indulged with further time, to prepare for the argument, and the court postponed the further hearing until to-morrow morning 10 o'clock.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The letter of Mr. Hume, member of the British parliament, in relation to the duties on the importation of wheat, which we publish below, will be of interest to our readers as referring to a subject that greatly concerns the United States and the grain growing sections of the union especially. It is quite obvious that a powerful effort will be made at the next session of the British parliament to change the corn law system in England, so as to admit foreign wheat into the United Kingdom upon easy terms.

One strong inducement to this change is drawn from the apprehension that Great Britain does not alter her exclusive and liberal system of prohibitive duties, other nations will be bound in self-protection to retaliate by similar restrictions upon British productions. Deprive the English manufacturer of the foreign market and his occupation gone. Yet how can England expect that other nations will continue to receive her manufactures while she persists in excluding their commodities from her ports?

The relations of trade between two countries should always rest upon the bases of mutual interest. The present would probably be a favorable opportunity for contracting a special treaty with England by which American breadstuffs might be received at the same rate as the corn of Great Britain, in view of the fact that the American market is one of great importance to the British manufacture. It would be to the interest of England to draw her supplies of flour from this country rather than from the regions of the Baltic, because in the latter case she would have to pay for them in specie; here payments could be made in commodities of her own production. A year or two ago there was, as we all recollect, a heavy drain of bullion and coin from Great Britain to pay for Baltic wheat which the failure of the English crops for that season compelled her to import. The consequences of that drain of the precious metals were felt in this country very severely—and the more so because it happened that our own crops were deficient that year, not so much from the badness of the season as on account of the speculating and hoarding away multitudes of our citizens from the cultivation of the soil.

It would seem to be the duty of our government to take the ground of countervailing duties at once; in order that we might be able to have power to make proper discriminations in favor of England proportionate to the favors which she might be willing to extend to us. The operation of such duties would be likely also to go a good way towards conciling her suspicions of the impolicy of their present restrictive system.

The opening of the British market to American breadstuffs would be an event worthy of general congratulation. At present, with the exception of Brazil and the West Indies there scarcely any foreign market of importance open to our flour. Nothing but a fair outlet to the productions of the interior is wanted to make Baltimore a city of the first magnitude. The immense supplies from the middle and western states coming to this port, would render our market exorbitantly high. A trade in wheat and flour might be opened with England that would bring wealth and prosperity to all classes of our industrious citizens. [Balt. American, May 2, 1841.]

GENTLEMEN: I send you the enclosed which I received by last mail. As it refers to matters of general interest in regard to our commercial relations, I see no reason why it should not be generally known that our citizens are being made in Great Britain to modify the duties and restrictions upon American products. And as congress is about to meet, the subject of the tariff may be taken into consideration, when an opportunity will be afforded of so legislating as to make a proper discrimination in favor of those countries which reciprocate the acts of the American government in a reciprocal spirit. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. JENIFER.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton.

SIR: I have the honor here to enclose a copy of resolutions agreed to at a meeting of members of the British parliament, and sanctioned by upwards of one hundred and twenty of that body.

The subject of free trade and the extension of our commercial relations with the rest of the world by simplifying our tariff, and thus leading other nations, by such an example, to co-operate with us for the attainment of so important and so desirable an object, has lately engaged much of the public attention in this country; and the general feeling manifested in favor of such changes will, we confidently hope, soon induce the government and legislature to take the proper steps for carrying out extensive measures of commercial reform. In the report of a select committee of the house of commons, with the evidence given before it on the subject of import duties, in the last session of parliament, has been chiefly instrumental in producing a state of public opinion favorable to a liberal commercial policy, by clearly proving that the restrictions and prohibitions of the present commercial code of the British empire, are, in the highest degree, prejudicial to the best interests of the nation. Allow me, therefore, as the late chairman of the committee, to convey to you, in the name of that report and evidence, and to request the favor of your most earnest consideration for it.

The liberal course recommended by the committee will be found applicable to the wants of all countries; and, in a matter so deeply interesting to the peace of the world, and to the prosperity of nations, I venture to hope for your zealous support in the conviction that the enlightened friends of free trade may be appealed to with peculiar propriety at the present moment, at a time when the liberal movement in the different parts of the commercial and civilized world cannot fail to be attended with most important and beneficial results.

I send you, also, a copy of the last report of the Manchester chamber of commerce, and containing the opinions of the merchants and manufacturers of that great commercial community are strongly and favorably expressed.

Public meetings of the merchants and inhabitants of Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Bolton, Ashton, and many other cities and towns, have already been held, where resolutions have been agreed to, strongly approving of the course recommended by the select committee and by the meeting of the members of parliament.

It will give me much satisfaction if you will favor me with any suggestions likely to forward the great object we have in view; and, on my part, I shall be most happy to supply any information which you may deem it desirable to obtain, and which it may be in my power to afford.

I have the honor to remain your obedient and humble servant, JOSEPH HUMF.

To the hon. Daniel Jenifer.

THE APPROACHING SESSION OF CONGRESS. Within three weeks from the present date, the new congress will have assembled at the capital, according to the proclamation of the late lamented president, issued a few days after he entered upon the administration of the government.

The near approach of the session naturally sets us to thinking of the purposes for which it has been called together, and the measures which are likely to occupy its attention.

At peace with all the world, possessing in profusion all the elements of national and individual prosperity, this people had yet been for several years suffering under circumstances so adverse to both, that a sense of the pain at length roused them to a perception of the necessity of exerting their own power to relieve themselves from it. In a crisis in which the dispute in the foreign policy was so visibly the consequence of bad administration of the government, the remedy was too obvious to be missed or mistaken. The power of the people was applied accordingly; and they dismissed from authority the chief agent who had by mismanagement forfeited all claim to further confidence, and installed another in his place.

This change of one president for another was not in itself the reform in the administration of public affairs desired and expected by the people, but was the means by which the reform was to be brought about. It was a removal of the original cause of disease, the first care of every skillful physician. That great purpose has been accomplished by the people. What is next to be done, the defects of the administration of those measures which are necessary to restore to the deranged functions of the government, and thereby to the industry and enterprise of the country, their natural and wanted vigor, is a duty which devolves upon the representatives of the people in congress.

It was therefore that president HARRISON found it necessary, within the second week of his official term, to issue his proclamation, requiring the senators and representatives to meet in the capitol, in the city of Washington, on Monday the 31st of May, "in order to receive such information respecting the state of the union as may be given to them, and to devise and adopt such measures as the good of the country may seem to them. In the exercise of their wisdom and discretion, to require." The reason assigned for this convocation of congress is, "that sundry important and weighty matters, principally growing out of the condition of the revenue and finances of the country, appear to call for the consideration of congress at an earlier date than its next annual session."

Such are the terms of the proclamation issued on the 17th day of March by the late president. His lamented death has indeed developed upon another the duty of meeting the congress thus convoked; but the question of this early assembling of representatives of the people remain as expressed in the proclamation. And an undoubted confidence is entertained that president TYLER will exert all his just authority to carry out the reform indicated by the popular voice, and ratified by his own declaration in his late address to the people of the United States.

The extraordinary occasion, therefore, (in the language of the constitution), upon which congress has been called together, in the condition in which, upon coming into office, the present administration found the revenue and finances of the country. There is the seat of the disorder. It is to these functions of the government that the efforts at reform by congress, at the coming session, are to be mainly directed.

The disorder in the revenue and finances consists, in the first place, in a derangement of the currency, commerce and exchanges of the country, produced directly by the impolitic measures of the two last administrations; and, secondly, in a deficiency of revenue consequent upon that derangement.

It is not necessary now to go into a review of the impolitic measures of the late administrations by which this mischief has been wrought—to relate the history of the demolition of the old national bank, begun by the illegal removal of the public deposits, and the effect of the unwise removals of the public deposits confided to them to inflate unhealthily the ability of the state banks; of their lavish discounts to speculators in public lands, public stocks, &c.; of the flood of revenue overrunning the public chest from sales of public lands, the stimulation of the consequent necessity of disposing of a surplus of revenue by distribution of it among the states; of the specie circular intended to check the sales of public lands, but having the effect to explode the state banks which the government itself had been unwisely to ensure their discounts; of the thrice-rejected but finally forced-down panacea, the sub-treasury, the last in the train of disastrous experiments; the fruit of ignorance of civil affairs and an "iron nerve" united in one president, and of overwrought confidence, and a fatuous reliance on predestination in his successor. Every reader is already familiar with the history of those administrations; the last of which, presumptuously declining to follow the examples of its great predecessor from WASHINGTON down to JACKSON, treated politics as a game upon which it staked the whole property of the country, trusting to the last to its lucky star to save it from disgrace and ruin.

Without looking back, or disputing about the merits of past administrations, it will be the business of congress to look at things as they are, and act accordingly.

The evils under which the country and the government now labor are practical, and require practical remedies. Though widely extended, producing every occasion of life, and affecting every class and order of people, the most sensible of these evils (that is, a vitiated currency) is believed to be within the power of the general government. Next to this, the evil most immediately demanding the attention of congress is a deficiency in the means of the treasury to carry on the government; a deficiency prospective as well as present. A third evil is the instability of the policy of the government in regard to its finances; the dependence upon expedients and makeshifts to supply revenue, instead of regulating the supply by long-handed legislation, so that the people may know what to expect to pay, and the government may know what to expect to receive; and which, if properly managed, be enabled to make their calculations accordingly.

This specification includes nearly all the objects connected with the revenue and finances which will claim the attention of congress at the extra session.

The last of these objects, though probably not the one for which an extra session of congress would have been deemed advisable, is perhaps the most important of the whole. Uncertainty and instability in the financial policy of any government are sources of helpless embarrassment to merchants, manufacturers, planters, farmers, artisans and capitalists, and hence to every interest of the people, as well as to the government itself. They should be avoided and guarded against by all the means within the power of the national legislature.

Among the causes which disturb the public policy is the fluctuation of the revenue springing from the public lands. We have seen the annual amount rise in one year from less than five millions to nearly fifteen millions of dollars, and in the next year to almost twenty-five millions of dollars; and we have seen the revenue from the same source, within two years after reaching this maximum amount, come down again to three millions of dollars.* Under such fluctuations, it is evident that there is a rift to a torrent, and dwindling again from a torrent to a rill, which at one season is hardly to be found in its rocky bed, and at another floods the plains with its abundance; what reliance can be placed? It is sufficient to say, that the revenue from the public domain actually belongs, is a dictate, in the sense of sound policy, in reference to the effect of such relinquishment, than of strict justice, the right of the thing being considered. The distribution during the several states of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, upon the principle of the bill which was passed by congress several years ago,

*The following are the amounts received into the treasury from proceeds of sales of public lands during the years stated—extracted from the annual reports of the state of the treasury, viz:

In the year 1829	$2,613,791
1830	3,967,761
1831	4,857,660
1832	14,761,600
1833	15,081,999
1834	6,776,226

and which was arbitrarily and contemptuously prevented by president Jackson from becoming a law, will therefore, it would be the fortunate act of the extra session—first of the series of measures, which is, we fondly hope, to make that session memorable in history.

The distribution among the states of the proceeds of the public lands have been always regarded as a measure of justice and sound policy. It is no new opinion of ours. The measure is also one which, beyond the control of party discipline, we have seen approved upon its own positive merit, by almost every state in the union. It is a measure which gives satisfaction to us to know that this measure, which a majority of the states and of the people have always deemed expedient as well as just is now recommended by the additional consideration that it will yield to the indebted state (whom general depression of business has involved in the general embarrassment) the means, in part at least, of paying the interest upon their debts until they become able to pay the principal, and thus averting the otherwise inevitable bankruptcy of some states—a catastrophe little less to be dreaded and deprecated than the bankruptcy of the union—and involving indeed the worst consequences which would attend such a disaster. Happy is it not for the country that relief can thus be afforded to the debtor states without a violation of any principle, and especially without incurring the odium attached to the idea of an assumption by the general government of the state debt! Fortunate is it not that, by an act of simple justice, by paying the interest, whatever it may be by rights belongs to them, it is in the power of congress to do so much for the relief of the debtor state? More fortunate still, that the debtor state can thus be aided by the general government, not only without producing to the creditor states without advantage, by placing at the disposal of those states (their proportion of the revenue from lands) funds which they will be able to employ to the greatest advantage in purposes of intellectual and general improvement.

The disposition of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands will place it in the power of congress to impart to the financial policy of the government stability, that essential element of public prosperity. That an augmentation of the revenue is necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the government is known to every body. For several years past it has been coked out by supplements of treasury notes; but that expedient is a miserable and partial resort on any other occasion than on extraordinary occasions. The amount of treasury notes at any time outstanding is neither more nor less than so much public debt; in the most troublesome form which it can assume; and the amount of public debt contracted without a given limit, whatever that limit is, is but the measure of the deficiency of the revenue. What the total amount of public debt now is, in the various forms of outstanding treasury notes, deferred payments to contractors and other public creditors, stocks due to Indian tribes, the fourth installment due to the states under the act of 1836, &c. we have not the means of accurately stating; but we may, without fear of exaggeration, set it down at forty millions of dollars of debt, all contracted within the last four years. The deficiency of the revenue, the expenditures of the last years must have been, on an average, some ten millions of dollars a year. Allow what you will for the falling off of the imposts caused by the blighting influence of the policy of the government, still the revenue which for four years has been so far short of the wants of the government cannot be expected to improve, even under brighter auspices, to an adequate amount without some enlargement of the sources of supply. The ordinary expenses of the government are increased by the necessity of a more economical administration; the extraordinary expense of the Florida war—extraordinary in every sense—which has been such a drain upon the treasury, may cease altogether; all this may happen, and yet the aggregate of the ordinary expenses of the government must be increased instead of being diminished. For not a doubt is entertained, we presume, in the mind of the present administration, that large appropriations of money are necessary for extending and strengthening the public works by land and sea, and that no consideration of false economy ought to be suffered to stand in the way of the accomplishment of this great purpose. Such, we know, was the opinion of the late lamented president, and such was the opinion of the president and his successor. "I shall shrink from no proper responsibility attached to my station," said Gen. Harrison, two days before his last illness, to a friend with whom he conversed. "I shall recommend to congress large appropriations for the public works. If they shall not respond to my recommendations, or shall refuse or neglect to provide the ways and means to carry them into effect, with them will rest the responsibility, I shall have done my duty."—Believing that the sentiment of the late president reflects the true policy of the government, and the paramount duty of congress as well as the executive, we have no idea of any reduction of the aggregate amount of the expenditures of the government. An augmentation of the revenue to some extent, is therefore inevitable. Whether that augmentation is to be secured by a resort to direct taxation and excises, or by a modification of the duties upon imports, cannot be long, if for a moment, a question of expediency is admitted, if it were free, and who are determined to remain so.

A revision of the duties upon imports, therefore, with a view to revenue, is one of the main objects which require the attention of congress at the extra session. In modifying those duties, let no pretence be given for an anti-tariff clamor by any attempt to force or unduly favor particular arts or products of our own country by high duties or prohibitions. Not that in levying the revenue we would depart from the policy, common to all nations, and not incompatible with the most enlarged notion of free trade, of a discrimination in favor of American industry. But let a just arrangement be made, in which the principle of discrimination in favor of labor is not sufficient to represent a duty on a large portion of our imports left sufficiently free for all the purposes of a prosperous commerce.

The great object which requires the action of congress at the extra session is the condition of the currency, and the question of the currency is the most urgent and engrossing interest. The repeal of the sub-treasury act, that odious measure so unequivocally condemned by the voice of the people and the experience of the government, would appear to be a sufficient measure of course, and is so hardly a diversity of sentiment. Then comes the vexed question, what financial agent shall be employed, in lieu of it, to receive, keep, and pay out the public money? Our own opinion on that subject has been too often expressed, and it need not be known to our readers. Believing that all the difficulties and embarrassments under which the people and government have painfully labored—including our degraded currency, fluctuating exchanges, and the consequent depression of the market—have been the necessary consequence of the unwise policy of the two last administrations, we are of opinion that the true preventive of these evils is to be found in a restoration of the state of things under which the country has prospered, and in which the action of the government itself made them otherwise. In other words, we believe in the expediency, and indeed necessity, of a national bank, to discharge the double functions of a fiscal agent for the government and a regulator of the currency for the people. This is the opinion of the editors of this paper, in repeating which now and here they do not pretend, not being authorized, to represent the views of the executive.

That a central fiscal agent, under whatever form or modification of its details, is necessary and proper, if not indispensable, to the collection of the revenue and the regulation of the exchanges, (an essential element of commerce), we believe to be the conviction of nearly every intelligent person who has had occasion to examine the subject at all. What form that agent shall assume, what offices it shall perform, by what name it shall be called, where it shall be located, how governed, &c. constitute a mass of considerations, out of which only some central agent can be devised. If established, free from the objections of those who have conscientious scruples against establishing a bank or none, and from the objections against banks as now organized, or at least as now administered, it will be a great step towards the relief of the country.

If, owing to the scruples which have heretofore prevailed in some of the southern states against a national banking institution, it shall be found impracticable to unite a majority of the two houses in favor of such an institution, then there must be entertained those scruples bring forward their measure; and let that measure be tried.

The adoption of any rational system, under which the public revenues can be so managed as to establish some circulating medium of equal value in all parts of the United States (which nothing short of the power of the general government can effect) will restore tranquility to the public mind, which is preferable to continued agitation under any other system. We do not, however, have any opposition to the establishment of a central fiscal agent will not be found to be the sentiment of a majority of the representatives of southern feelings and interests, whatever it may have been heretofore. It is no school like academy. More than any other portion of the United States have the people of the southern states been ground down by the experiments instituted by their late rulers, one after another, so as to try how many such they could bear and live. If, indeed, the signs of the times are to be at all relied upon, great changes of opinion have very recently taken place on this subject in the south; and we should not be very much surprised if, from some states hitherto most opposed to a national bank, we were to have in the present congress nearly an unanimous expression of sentiment in its favor.

Of all speculations as to what congress may or not do in reference to the currency, perhaps, after all, none more can now be set down as certain than that the extra session will not pass away without the establishment of some fiscal agency as a substitute for that which exists under the familiar name of the sub-treasury system.

The measures, in fine, which may be expected to become subject of deliberation in congress at the approaching session, are,

1. The distribution of the proceeds of the sales of public lands among the several states.
2. A revision and augmentation of the duties on imports, for the purpose of securing from that source a revenue adequate to the wants of the government.
3. The repeal of the sub-treasury law.
4. The establishment of a central fiscal agent, to aid the government in collection and disbursing the revenue and equalizing the currency.
5. A temporary loan, if necessary to supply the immediate necessities of the treasury.

These measures would strew the clouds that have so long overhung and yet obscure the prospect before us. These measures, taken together, would, we feel entirely confident, suffice not only to restore to the country its wasted vigor, but carry it forward with a firmer step than it has ever taken.

We have said nothing about the existing public debt, which it will be time enough to provide for at the regular annual session of congress, when its amount will have been better ascertained than it can yet be. Nor have we taken into consideration the question of a uniform system of bankruptcy, which seems to be within the contemplation of some of our friends as a measure to be agitated at the extra session, and on which another question of a general character. Because congress has been called together with a special view to the revenue and the finances; and it seems to be desirable, under every aspect of the case, that the deliberations of the two houses be concentrated upon the subject as far as possible, to the objects for which they have been convened. POLITICAL. Announcement of a candidate for the next presidency and organization in his favor. The Philadelphia papers furnish the following: The undersigned, democratic citizens, having assembled for the purpose heretofore mentioned, unanimously adopt the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas, The name of com. Charles Stewart, of Pennsylvania, has been formally presented to the American people, as a suitable candidate to be supported for the high office of president of the United States—therefore

Resolved, That we will form a political association, the object of which shall be to use every honorable exertion to secure the election of com. Stewart to the office of president of the United States.

Resolved, That we will form a political association, the object of which shall be to use every honorable exertion to secure the election of com. Stewart to the office of president of the United States. Because, we believe him to be eminently entitled, by a long life of devotion to the public good, to the highest rank in the gift of his countrymen. Because, at a time when our gallant little navy, during the first term of the administration of president Madison, would have disbanded, had it not been for the timely interference of com. Stewart, and a few kindred spirits, who bravely stood by him, the enemy might come as they pleased, but by heaven they should never come by water.

Because the state of Pennsylvania having never had a president or vice president of the United States, we believe it is his duty to claim its share in the fact of it being one of the Old Thirteen, from its vast resources, its immense population, and its steadfast adherence to democratic principles of the government, throughout the most trying periods of its history.

Because, in selecting com. Stewart, we select a man who is in all respects a democrat, one who from early boyhood has been ardently attached to his country, one who has done more to maintain the honor and integrity of the Union than any one who ever lived, one who combines all the qualifications of a hero, patriot and statesman, and one whom Pennsylvania should delight to honor.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare bye-laws for the government of this association.

Resolved, That this association shall be known by the style and title of the "Old Iron Sides Club of Southwark, No. 1."

Resolved, That the democratic citizens who are friendly to the cause, be requested to attend an adjourned meeting, to be held on Thursday evening, the 15th inst., at the house of H. P. Mitchell, S. E. corner of Meeting and Fifth streets, at 8 o'clock, when an election for officers will take place.

"Old Ironsides Club."

Pursuant to adjournment of the 3d inst. there was a large and spirited meeting of the democratic citizens favorable to the election of commodore Charles Stewart to the next president of the club, on Saturday evening, the 8th inst. at the head quarters of the club, corner of Carpenter and Sixth streets. The large room in which the meeting was held was filled to overflowing. The preamble, constitution and bye-laws of the club were read, unanimously adopted and signed by all present. The new resolutions were then unanimously passed, and ordered to be signed by the officers, and published in all the democratic papers.

Resolved, That the first election of officers of this association, shall be held on Saturday the 15th inst. and that the officers then elected, shall hold their offices until others are elected pursuant to the 2d article of the constitution.

Resolved, That up to 9 o'clock on Saturday evening, all persons who sign the constitution shall be members, and that the election for officers shall take place at that hour.

Resolved, That this meeting adjourn in meet at the same place on Saturday evening next, at half past seven o'clock, where all the democratic citizens of the city and county, favorable to the object of the club, are respectfully invited to attend and enrol themselves among its members.

POPULAR RIGHTS AND POPULAR WILL. The absurd and impious doctrine, that the voice of the people is the voice of God, is thus dignified by professor Henry of the New University:

It is the fundamental maxim of all political ethics that political rights imply political obligations: so much the more liberty a people enjoy, and so many the more rights they possess, so many the more their duties. Yet at the present moment, notions of popular rights appear to me to have sprung up and spread over the country which are false, absurd and dangerous. We have got the habit of taking for granted that the people have a right to do whatever they please to do; and that whatever they please to do is therefore right. Political right has thus become separated from duty, and has practically come to mean nothing but mere popular will.

We are continually told that the sovereign power resides in the people. This is a naked form, but a half-truth; and, as has been well said, a half-truth is often the greatest of lies. It is unquestionably true that the sovereign power, in a certain sense, resides in the people; but in the sense in which it is commonly understood it is a great and pernicious error. It is God's ordinance, and the necessity of man's nature, that man should exist in society. To do this he must exist as a state—that is, a community in which justice and social order are maintained. Government is the power of the state organized, embodied, and put in action, and the form of government is the particular mode in which the powers of the state are embodied and put in action.

Hence it is clear, that the foundation of government is not in the people, unlimited will of the people; and that the sovereignty of the people is not in mere natural right, but in duty. We are too prone in general to forget the great comprehensive truth, that rights and obligations ever go together. There is scarcely such a thing as the unlimited will of God, as the absolute right of doing what one merely wills to do. The only absolute right in the universe, is the right of not being wronged. In political affairs, neither the mere will of a majority, nor even of the whole people, can make a thing right, or justify their action. Nothing can be made right by mere willing to do it. Still, as a right which is to be dutifully exercised, I maintain the doctrine that the sovereignty is vested in the people. And in the exercise of the sovereign power residing in them, the people of this country have organized our form of government—and have defined and distributed the powers of the state. They have done this in our constitution. Practically therefore to all intents and purposes, the sovereignty, at this moment, and so long as the constitution stands unimpaired, is lodged in the constitution. That is the exercise of the power of the state; there it resides in the sovereign power of the nation; and it resides there out of the reach of the present will of a mere numerical majority. The constitution can be changed only under particular circumstances, and by three-fourths of the states.

BLUE BOOK. The subjoined table has been compiled with all convenient accuracy from the Blue Book of 1840, and the returns of the census of 1840, so they have been prepared for printing at the state department.

Though not exact, they will probably be found very near the truth. There are a large number of officers and agents not named in the Blue Book, which are not included. And there are a number of purely honorary names, whose places of nativity are not designated. These are not included in the table.

The sum total does not comprise the list of post-masters in the United States, nor are the persons employed in Washington included.

HISTORICAL REMINISCENCES.

Naval battles and surprising naval heroes. The recent defeat of commodore Stevens, has led us to ascertain the list of the dead and living commanders who shed no blood lustre upon our national flag in the last war. War was declared in June, 1812—Peace was signed at Ghent, December 24, 1814, and proclaimed by the President, February 15, 1815.

*Returns from nine counties wanting, 7 of which contained in 1830, 55,881.

*Returns from five counties not included. Four of the five counties contain, according to the marshals' returns, 88,701.

*Returns from Carter county wanting. The amount of population in 7 counties of Georgia in 1830, and that of four counties in Alabama, mention in this note, are included in the sum total.

There were fifteen naval actions: between British and American vessels of war. In eleven battles, fought by single ships, the Americans conquered; in four only the British triumphed—16 of which were by single ships, viz: Chesapeake, of 47 guns, taken by the Shannon, 32; and the Argus, 16 guns, taken by the Pelican, 20. The other two British captures were two to one, and four to one against us.

During the war, there were captured from the British, on the ocean, three frigates and fifteen sloops of war, and smaller ships; and on the lakes thirteen, several of them frigates and sloops. The whole number captured by the Americans were thirty-one. The British took from us, and destroyed at navy yard, but twenty-three armed vessels, viz: three frigates, (Chesapeake, President and Essex), twelve sloops and gun brigs, and eight schooners.

Of the commanders who fought the naval battles, there have died—

Deaer, who took the Macedonian, Oct. 25, 1812. Bainsbridge, who took the Java, Dec. 29, 1812. Lawrence, who took the Peacock, Feb. 24, 1813. Barrows, who took the Boxer, Sept. 6, 1813. Blakely, who took the Reindeer, June 28, 1814.

Also, the Aron, Sept. 7, 1812. Perry, of the Lawrence, Alcmey, of the Commodore, Cookin, of the Tigress; Senat, of the Porcupine; and T. Holdip Stevens, of the Tripps, of commodore Perry's squadron that captured the British squadron of six ships on Lake Erie, Sept. 10, 1813.

Macedonough, of the Saratoga, and Henley, of the Eagle, of commodore Macdonough's squadron that captured the British squadron of four vessels on Lake Champlain, Sept. 11, 1814. Allen, of the Argus, taken by the Pelican, Aug. 14, 1812.

The surviving naval commanders in the last war, who achieved victories, are—

Isaac Hull, who took the Guerriere, Aug. 20, 1812. David Porter, who took the Alert, Aug. 15, 1812, and fought the ships Plumb and Cherub on Valparaiso, March 28, 1814. Jacob Jones, who took the Frolic, Oct. 18, 1812. Lewis Warrington, who took the Epervier, April 29, 1814.

Charles Stewart, who took the two sloops Levant and Cyane with the Constitution, Feb. 29, 1815. Jesse D. Elliott, who commanded the Niagara in Perry's victory.

Stephen Turner, who commanded the Scorpion. Stephen Cassin, of the Ticonderoga, in Macdonough's victory.

Of the surviving commanders, all are post captains except commodore Champlain and captain Porter.

There are many survivors still on the list of our gallant naval officers who were distinguished by bravery and conduct, in the war, under the command of superiors, but the above are all the survivors of those who had immediate commands. The catalogue presents thirteen deceased and nine living.

THE NAVY.

The rev. Charles Henry Alden, of Philadelphia, has been appointed a chaplain in the U. S. navy. Com. Charles W. Morgan, is appointed to the command of the Brazil station.

The return home of the Mediterranean squadron. Our readers will doubtless be surprised at the sudden return home of the United States squadron of vessels of war from the Mediterranean. So should we certainly have been, had not received information, some days ago, that advice had been transmitted by our minister at London to the commander of that squadron, of the great excitement in England on the receipt of Mr. Pickens' report, accompanied by some indication that the immediate return of that squadron to the United States was advisable, the station being one which, in the event of a war with Great Britain, it would be entirely unwise for it to attempt to remain in.

We have no doubt that our information on the subject, though unofficial, was substantially correct. That the commander so precipitate a return of the squadron to port at home, leaving the immense commerce of the United States unprotected in the Mediterranean, is very much to be regretted, and is besides calculated to spread an unnecessary alarm among our countrymen elsewhere, as well as in the Mediterranean, cannot admit of a doubt. We are admonished by the fact of such advice having been deemed necessary, how much nearer we have been to the point of actual hostilities with Great Britain, than we are at present. In this respect, nothing certainly but an absolute conviction of the probability of such a conflict could have induced our minister at London to take the responsibility of whining the return of our ships of war from that

What a lesson ought not this to be against such indications as the report of Mr. Pickens, if considered and heedless as it was, and unsustained either by the people or the executive of the United States! What a warning against consulting committees of such importances as the committee on foreign relations out of mere party men, having no idea of any policy but what is suggested by party feeling! We do not mean to apply this observation to Mr. Pickens particularly, but to the party majority of one vote in the committee on foreign relations. Such sustained bodies of party men, making such a report, not only gratuitously in itself, but under the circumstances of our pending relations with Great Britain, positively mischievous.

The immediate consequence of the return of the squadron under commodore Hull will, we presume, be to expedite the departure of the squadron, under commodore Morris, which was understood to be fitting out for the purpose of relieving the squadron now returned.

The United States ship Cyane, William H. Lathrop, esq. commander, from the Mediterranean by the way of the islands of Madeira, Canaries, Cape Verde, the coast of Africa and the Windward West India Islands, last from St. Thomas, which port she left on the 2d instant, was towed up to the navy yard at Norfolk on Monday evening by the United States steamer Poloset, and exchanged salutes with the Pennsylvania, the flag ship of com. Shrubrick.

Expanding expedition. Capt. Lawrence of the ship Chaugnon arrived at Edgartown from the Pacific ocean, reports the U. S. brig Porpoise, capt. Ruggold, at Tahiti, Jan. 26, to sail on a cruise the next day. The Porpoise had visited many of the Frigate Islands, and several others not laid down in the charts; officers and crew all well.

The Norfolk Beacon says: The United States ship of the line Delaware, capt. McCauley, destined for the Mediterranean, dropped down on yesterday the anchorage of the naval hospital in the bay of the U. S. steamer Poloset. The Delaware moved down in beautiful style, it being supposed that she went at the rate of six miles an hour against a flood tide, and wind very light from N.E.

A man-of-war was at anchor before the White Point yesterday morning, probably the Cyane, from the Mediterranean. [Norfolk Beacon, May 17.]

We regret to learn that lieut. Shrubrick, U. S. navy, accidentally shot away a part of his face while on a scout in the Everades, on the 15th inst.

[St. Augustine News, May 11.]

We are much gratified to learn that the United States government have adopted for the use of the navy, explain Taylor's submarine exploring apparatus. Three of these suits of Marine armor are to be put on board the three first large ships of war, which leave this country—and three are to be deposited at the navy yards, to be used as occasion may require. [Boston Jour.]

The United States brig Dolphin, from the coast of Africa and last from the Cape de Verdes, arrived at Guadeloupe on the 5th of April, thence sailed for Martinique, where she remained four days and arrived at Fredericksstadt, island of Santa Cruz, on the 21st ult. Thence she was to sail for Porto Rico and St. Thomas, and then returned to the U. States.

Ten deaths in all had taken place on board the Dolphin—the last was John Jackson, a seaman who died at sea.

On board the Grampus there had been five deaths; midshipman Caldwell had been transferred from the Dolphin to the Grampus, and his place in the former was supplied by midshipman McLaughlin, from the Grampus.

The Grampus was to remain at the Cape de Verdes until the return of the Cyane, when she would sail for the coast of Africa, and then home, via the West Indies.

The National Intelligencer states that the frigate Brandywine is to return forthwith to the Mediterranean. The residue of the squadron, it is possible, if not probable, has received such information, after the Brandywine parted company with it, as to induce it to return to the Mediterranean station.

Coast squadron. Some few weeks since, we mentioned that it was to be contemplated to organize and put in commission a squadron of the protection of our coast, and we are now pleased to learn that what was then only a surmise, is now about to be confirmed. The secretary of the navy, with a view to the effective defence of our large and sufficient naval force. A portion of the squadron will be stationed off the southern harbors commencing at Charleston, South Carolina. Another off Norfolk and that immediate vicinity. Another off N. York. Another off Boston—and the last to the neighborhood of St. George's Shoals and the Frying Bank. In addition to this the West India squadron is to be largely increased, and when all these additions to our present effective force shall be completed, we may begin to think ourselves in a tolerable posture for any emergency. Of the necessity for this step none can doubt, and we trust that nothing may occur to thwart the views of the department, for such important ends. As the work will doubtless be commenced as soon as practicable, we may expect busy times at our various yards and naval depots.

[N. Y. Sun.]

Submarine exploring apparatus. The National Intelligencer states that the U. S. government has adopted for the use of the navy, capt. Taylor's submarine exploring apparatus.

The Fredericksburg Arena states that commodore T. Ap. C. Jones has been appointed to the command of the Pacific squadron, and will hoist his flag on board the U. S. ship Independence.

U. S. ship Constellation. A letter from on board the U. S. ship Constellation, dated at Rio Janeiro, March 28, states that com. Kearney, after he took command of the ship, gave the men permission to go on shore, and that an apprentice boy by the name of Moore, of Charlestown, Mass. stabbed a man by the name of Miller, who died of the wound received.

It is stated in the New York Express that the sloop of war Fairfeld was put in commission on Monday, and a part of her crew placed on board. She proceeds forthwith to the North river, whence she will proceed to sea, when her complement of men shall be ordered. Surgeon Samuel Mosely has been ordered to the Fairfield.

RECIPROCITY OF TRADE.

From the Mobile Journal of Commerce.

The time is at hand when it will become necessary to remodel our system of duties, so as to increase our revenues to an amount adequate to the wants and necessities of government, or to adopt some other system of taxation for its support, if deemed by the majority more consistent with good policy, or congenial to the purity and permanence of our political institutions. That a great difference of opinion should exist on the subject, in a country like ours, where the mass are intelligent and capable of thinking for themselves, and discussing the most grave and intricate questions of national policy, is not surprising, or to be regretted.

It is to be hoped, when the congress of the nation shall be called upon to act on this important question, they will do so in a spirit of mutual kindness and forbearance, and that harmony and good feeling, divested of all local or sectional prejudices, may characterize their proceedings; that they may legislate as Americans should do upon a question of American policy.

Our present system of duties will doubtless occupy much of the time and attention of congress at its extra session; and the manner in which the subject was incidentally introduced into the debates of the last session, induces the belief that it will be approached with great caution, and no action taken without mature deliberation. The discussion of the subject will embrace such others as have any connection with, or even distant bearing upon, the question of revenue.—Finance, currency, free trade, protection, reciprocity and retaliation, commerce, &c. Although, nominally, there is but one object to accomplish, (that of bringing the receipts of the government to an amount equivalent to its expenditures), yet there may be said to exist four sets of opinions as to the best mode of doing so.

It is my purpose, briefly, to notice what appear to me the most flagrant errors of opinion on the subject of duties, which seem to prevail to some extent; though not with the expectation of doing full justice to a subject of such magnitude and importance; it requires an abler pen than mine. The views which I offer, are those of a merchant and not a politician.

I have said that four sets of opinions prevail in congress as to the most expeditious mode of enacting a revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of government. They may be classed as follows:

1st. The advocates of unrestricted free trade and direct taxation.

2nd. The friends of free trade, except so far as a duty is necessary for the support of the government, giving a preference to articles of luxury.

3d. The supporters of a protective system.

4th. The advocates of reciprocity and retaliative duties.

Though the advocates of "unrestricted free trade" are few in number, their position and standing in the councils of their country entitle their views, however absurd, to a passing notice. They would see our ports thrown open to every species of production and manufacture from other nations, while our products are either excluded from their ports, or made to pay a heavy tribute for the support of their governments. They would make us the abject dependants upon foreigners for many articles of consumption, and give them the power to dictate the price at which they will take ours. They would compel the poor man to pay more in proportion to his means, for the support of his government, than the rich man with his hoarded millions, who indulges in the luxuries of every clime. There need be no apprehension, however, that such notions of national policy will ever obtain currency in any civilized country, until all commercial nations shall agree to reciprocate.

The second, and probably most numerous, class in congress are those who believe in the policy of free trade, except so far as a duty is necessary for the purpose of revenue, and would select for their object articles of luxury, the product of countries that tax our products heavily; and such, also, as have the ability to produce ourselves, such as silks, wines, linens, &c., without wishing to interfere with the principle upon which the "compromise act" was founded, or disturb its previous any further than is necessary for revenue purposes.

They are opposed to free trade in its extreme literal sense but are so far its advocates, as to oppose any rate of duties beyond the wants of government, or equivalent to those paid upon our exports to foreign nations, at their ports. There are many, among the advocates of this course of policy, who believe in the expediency of the protective system, but feel themselves pledged, to consider that question settled by the compromise bill.

Among the many who a few years since were strenuous in their support of the "protective system," but few remain who so pertinaciously adhere to their opinions as to openly avow and advocate them, and refuse to consider the settlement of the question between the two antagonistic parties at that time, as binding. Whether the so called "American system" was one of sound policy, and calculated to promote the best interests of our country, remains for future generations to judge; the present one has been too much agitated, prejudiced for and against excited too deep and violent, to permit an unbiased decision, and the discussion of the principles involved in its policy, has been almost entirely abandoned by common consent, under the influence of a patriotic love of country and attachment to the union, alike creditable to its friends and its opponents.

The extraordinary discrepancy between the duties levied by many foreign nations upon our products, and the rates of duties required in our ports upon products and manufactured articles from these nations, has led some of our most enlightened statesmen to advocate a system of "reciprocity and retaliative duties."

The term "retaliative" may grate somewhat harshly upon the sensitive ears of statesmen, whose opinions of national wealth and political economy are founded upon fine spun theories; which, though they strike the mind as conclusive, will not stand the test of practical experience. But let us enquire if the exigencies of the case do not call for the adoption of such a course of policy in our commercial relations with foreign powers, as shall induce them to extend to on the same liberality we have ever manifested toward them.

It is an axiom in political economy, that the wealth of a nation depends upon its exports more than its imports; in other words, that it sells more than it buys. If the reverse is the case, it sinks into poverty and bankruptcy. It has, therefore, been the policy of every enlightened government so to legislate as to increase the one and diminish the other. One means by which this has been accomplished to a great extent, particularly by England and France, has been by effecting such treaties with other powers as to secure the admission into their several kingdoms, of their products and manufactured goods, on the most favorable terms; and, at the same time, levying enormous duties upon the products of other countries, particularly upon articles of luxury, which materially lessens consumption.

Both England and France, which make great pretensions to "reciprocity in trade," receive annually at their custom houses, more than double the amount of duties upon their imports from abroad than is paid on a much larger amount of exports at the custom houses of the several nations to which they send their productions.

Let us contrast the position of Great Britain with her restrictive and prohibitory policy, with the United States and her free trade, or "no-natal duty" system. The United Kingdom, with a population of 30,000,000 located upon two little islands, which possess no variety of climate, and a soil not capable of producing even its own bread stuffs, exports, annually to the amount of five hundred millions of dollars, exceeding its imports over $200,000,000, which excess goes to increase her national wealth. She is the wealthiest and most powerful nation upon the globe. Almost every nation is her debtor, and she has become the centre of the financial and monetary world.

The United States, with a population of 14,000,000, occupying an almost boundless extent of territory, which embraces nearly every grade of climate between the two extremes, a fertile and productive soil capable of producing every necessary of life, and nearly all of its luxuries, exports annually one hundred million of dollars, against an import ascending that amount, taking the average for 10 years past, of nearly 25 per cent per annum. She owes a foreign debt of nearly $250,000,000,* her citizens individually and collectively embarrassed, her currency unsound, confidence at home and abroad impaired, and nothing but her vast natural resources of soil and climate, and the physical and intellectual energies of her people, could save her from bankruptcy and universal poverty. This difference in the condition and prosperity of the two most enlightened nations in the world, inevitably leads me to the conclusion that there is something wrong in our commercial policy, that the evil grows out of our excessive imports and limited exports, and that legislation may and should be so applied as to remedy it by diminishing the one and increasing the other. This may be done by the adoption of a system of duties which shall permit the free introduction of foreign products into our ports, upon precisely the same terms that our products are received into theirs. If England will admit our cotton, tobacco, and flour into her ports free of duty, let us admit her silks and manufactured goods on the same condition, if she places a duty of 50 per cent, let us do the same. In this way, we can bring other nations to reciprocate and act upon our free trade principles; but without the adoption of some such course, we may continue to toil on for the benefit of other nations, enriching them, and finding ourselves more deeply in debt every year.

Were it possible by treaty or otherwise, for us at once to secure the admission of our products into all the ports of foreign powers upon as favorable a footing as we receive theirs, I venture to assert, that in less than 10 years our exports would be double what they now are, while our imports would not increase 50 per cent. In support of this opinion, I will make two articles of production which we have the ability to produce to an extent almost sufficient to supply the entire demand of Europe, if their restrictive duties upon them were reduced to the maximum of ours, namely, tobacco and flour. Upon tobacco, which costs at New Orleans but 5 to 10c. per pound, the duty in England is 3 shillings sterling, or about 75 cents (equivalent to 1000 per cent on its cost); and about the same throughout the continent of Europe, which to a great extent forbids its introduction and use, as it is too expensive a luxury for the poorer classes to indulge in; but remove the restriction so as to place it within the reach of the laboring classes, which embrace 9-10ths of the whole population, and the consumption would increase 100 per cent per annum for the next 5 years, cause a demand that would extend its cultivation in this country, enhance prices by which the planter would realize a good profit, and in a few years become as large and important an item in our list of exports as cotton.

Were the heavy duties on flour removed, we could export annually to England, the West Indies, and elsewhere $200,000,000 or more.

While England charges a duty of 72 cents per 100 lb. on cotton, $2 to $4 per bbl. on our flour, and 3c. on tobacco, we are taking from her, silks, linens, worsted-stuffs, &c. free of duty, amounting to more than $20,000,000 a year.

In our trade with France, of our imports, which are more than double our exports, more than two-thirds are admitted duty free, and the balance pays a mere nominal one of 10 to 25 per cent, while not an article that we export is admitted into their ports except at a heavy duty, our cotton paying 5 per cent more than Egyptian.

Similar discrepancies in the rates of duties to those above pointed out, characterize our whole commercial intercourse with foreign nations. In evidence of this fact, I herewith annex a table embracing our principal exports to, and imports from Havana, with their value, the amount of duties paid, &c. for the year 1840. It is proper to remark, that on all Spanish products, imported into the island of Cuba, the duty is materially less—as for example, flour in foreign vessels pays $5, and in Spanish vessels $2 per bbl.

*Buothes—1 Pounds weight—1 Boxes of 415 lb. each.
*The duty on sugar, under the compromise act, for the present year (1841) is about 1 4/10 cts.—after the first of January, 1842, 4-5 cts. per lb. as an estimated average of value.

From the above table, it will be observed that on our exports to Havana, amounting in round numbers to $1,700,000, a duty is paid at that port of $1,263,405, or 73 per cent, while on an import from thence of $4,150,000, our government requires a duty of $486,000, or less than 12 per cent; and after 1st January next, the same import will pay but $220,000, or less than 5 per cent.

I am aware that the friends of a "reciprocity and retaliative" system of duties will be met by its opponents with the argument that all duties are a tax upon the consumer to the amount levied. This, with a certain class of statesmen who can theorize eloquently upon the science of commerce, discuss by the week abstract questions of trade finance and currency without knowing practically the origin character or use of a bill of exchange, is deemed a conclusive and unanswerable argument against the expediency of increasing the present rates of duty upon articles of luxury. To adopt it as a settled principle that the consumer pays the duty, is as erroneous as it would be to assume that it was paid by the producer. No general rule can be made to apply, as the fact is contingent upon circumstances. If the duty be a mere nominal one, it is paid by the consumer, as the laws which regulate supply and demand are not interrupted by it; but if it be a heavy one, consumption is proportionately lessened—consequently the producer must sell at a less price than the falling off in consumption may be checked, and a market kept up for his products. For example, we can sell our flour in Cuba unless we produce it at a price and of a quality that will enable it to pay a duty there of $10 to 100 and compete with Spanish flour which pays but $2. A few years since coffee was subject to a duty of 24 cents per lb; the duty was removed, but the price did not decline, and has ruled as high since as before, the producer putting the 24 cents in his pocket, and the consumer receiving no benefit from it.

Let any one examine the list of our imports, and he will find that such articles as are the most heavily taxed have steadily declined in price, particularly those that we have it in our power to produce or manufacture; while such as are admitted duty free have remained stationary, or have advanced. The article of silk, on which there is no duty, and of which we imported last year over $300,000,000 worth, has steadily advanced for the last ten years.

An increased duty on port imported from Canada, which was levied a few years since by Great Britain, compelled the farmers on the frontier, whose most accessible markets were Montreal and Quebec, to produce or sell it at a less price than before to compete with Canada and the mother country.

Many facts may be presented which prove conclusively that the producer, in all cases where the duty is an exorbitant one, pays a large proportion if not the whole of it. The consequence is that under our system of nominal duties and free trade, the producer of flour is made to pay an enormous tax for the support of the government of Cuba, the grower of tobacco is a tax payer to France, England, &c. while the duties here on the cigars from the one, and the wines from the other, being merely nominal and insufficient to check consumption are paid by the consumer.

The tobacco planter, if he is a consumer of wine is taxed for the support not only for his own government, but also for that of France ten times as heavily as for his own. Why this should be so I can see no good reason, and it is time a remedy were applied.

This subject has not been taken up and discussed by the press so generally as its importance seems to demand. The time is short, our congress meets, and it is desirable that public opinion should be fully expressed. A duty upon silks and wines was objected to last season by certain members of congress, because, said they, "if we refuse to take these articles from France, she will not buy our cotton and tobacco in other words, if we do not put two dollars worth of her wine, France will not buy one dollar's worth of cotton from us. This is a singular kind of reasoning. Suppose a pleoter was to come to Mobile with his crop of cotton, worth $4000, and on offering it for sale, he should be told that no purchaser could be found, unless he would agree to purchase $8000 worth of merchandise, would he not laugh in the face of his informant? As before stated, we take more than twice as much from France as she takes from us, and pay her three times as much duty on our products, as hers pay at our ports, and it is perfectly ridiculous, childish, to suppose that a duty of 20 per cent, or even 50 on her products would induce her to do without our cotton, an article she must have, and cannot produce herself. If an additional duty on these articles should have the effect to lessen consumption, so much the better; we should be so much richer for it, in a national point of view; and certainly more temperate.

*While the United States from her excess of imports above exports has contracted a debt of $250,000,000 in 10 years, the excess in the value of exports from Great Britain over her imports in the same time reaches the enormous sum of 1856 million of dollars.

It is a humiliating acknowledgement of vassalage to a foreign power, to manifest an apprehension, that an increase of duty by our government on its products, would induce her to do without ours.—Fortunately we are not dependant entirely on France for a market, should she be disposed to punish us for daring to regulate our own commercial affairs.

I have above stated that could the exorbitant duties levied by the several powers of Europe upon our tobacco be removed, it would soon become as important an item in our list of exports as cotton. This fact, a slight examination into the subject will prove. Our exports of this article are about 100,000 hog-heads per annum, valued here at $90 per hhd, amounting to $9,000,000; the duty which it pays at foreign ports amounts to some $30,000,000. The United States consumes three times as much tobacco as Great Britain, with less than half the population, and more than England, France and Spain put together. It is used throughout Europe to the same extent as in the United States, with the improvement in price which would certainly follow an increased demand, would soon swell the value of our exports of this article to $50,000,000, and in less than 10 years to $100,000,000. In proof of the influence of the rate of duty upon consumption,—in 1792 the duty on tobacco in England was 1s per pound, the consumption 1,767,000 lbs, in 1793 and 4 the duty was reduced to 6d., and consumption suddenly increased until in the latter year it reached nearly 10,000,000 pounds. In 1795 and 6 the duty was increased to 8d and consumption fell to 6,000,000 pounds, in 1798 it was again increased to 1s and consumption was reduced to 4,800,000 pounds.—From 1860 to 1830, a space of 30 years, under a duty varying from 2s 2d to 4s, notwithstanding the increase of population, the increase of consumption was but about 300 hhd. In 1785 under a moderate rate of duty, France took from us 35,000 hhd. Under her existing system of monopoly and high duty, she takes but 6000 hhd. While France has been heaping onerous restrictions upon our commerce, we, in our excessive liberality, under the influence of free trade notions, have been removing the nominal duty that formerly existed on her silks, wines, brandies, &c, which enables her to sell us $40,000,000 per annum of these luxuries, for which she counterpays us but $23,000,000 per annum of our cotton, &c, if we will consent to pay 50 per cent more duty than other nations pay.

The power of cotton may say, he has no interest in forcing a market for the farmer of the west, or tobacco planter of Virginia, so long as he finds one for his staple. Such a conclusion could only result from a very superficial and contracted view of the subject.

In addition to the interest which every American citizen should feel in the general prosperity and increased wealth of his country, which is promoted by large exports of its products, the cotton planter has a direct individual interest not only in facilitating and encouraging a large production and exportation of tobacco, rice, sugar and molasses, but also in firmly establishing as a principle of our government in its commercial regulations, a system of countervailing duties. The very moment England finds she can obtain a supply of cotton from her East India possessions, that moment she will place a duty on ours sufficient to exclude it from her ports, or compel the planter to produce it at a price as much below the present, as will meet the duty levied, making the producer the payer of the tax; and if the experiment she is now making in the culture of cotton in India succeed, of which there is every prospect, that day is not far distant.—If however, our government shall adopt a course of policy by which foreign nations may be made to feel, that to remain us as a market, they must open their ports to our products on terms of fair and honorable reciprocity, they will do so; as they know we are their best customer. It is a fair and legitimate proposition for a grocer to say to a dry good merchant—buy your sugar from me or I cannot buy your silks' and it is equally so between nations, and one to which they can take no exceptions.—Another benefit which the cotton producer, in common with every other interest is to derive from increased exports is, it leads to more equal and better division of the physical force of the country in its application. Open a market for our tobacco, and a portion of the slave labor in Tennessee, North Carolina, the northern portion of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Arkansas, now employed in the culture of cotton, would be applied to its production—also probably employment given to the slaves of Virginia, Maryland and Kentucky, enhancing the value of the slave labor throughout the South.—Open a market for our sugar and molasses, or increase its consumption at home by excluding foreign sugars, and that portion of our cotton lands south of 32° of latitude may be used in their culture. Place a foreign silk and wines, half equal to the duty paid on products at the ports of France and England, and in less than 20 years there is scarcely a plantation in the cotton growing states of any magnitude, that will not have a silk nursery or vine-yard attached to it as one of its chief sources of profit. Every planter knows that the less cotton he makes the more money he gets for it—reduce the supply and prices advance at once, as a general rule.

It is of the highest importance to the cotton planter that profitable channels of employment, other than the one single staple presents, should be open to him, that when prices go to a point below the cost of production, he may turn his attention to something else, and that he be not necessitated to rely upon a single production as his only source of income. There is no one class in the country whose interest would be more directly promoted by the adoption of reciprocal and relative system of duties, than the cotton planter of the south.

To show that the measures here suggested as a means of relieving our commerce from the onerous burdens imposed upon it by foreign powers, are not new, or novel, I give the views of several of our most distinguished statesmen.

In 1793, Mr. Jefferson, who was secretary of state under general Washington, made a report to congress on the subject to the then existing restriction on our commerce by foreign nations, in which he says

"Such being the restrictions on the commerce and navigation of the United States, the question is, in what way they may best be removed, modified, or counteracted?

"As to commerce two methods occur: first, by friendly arrangement with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist; or, second, by the separate act of our legislature for countervailing their effects. There can be no doubt of these two friendly arrangements as the most eligible," &c.

And, after arguing the benefits of navigation and commerce reciprocally free with all nations, he says:

"But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and variations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them."

In another part of the same report, he says:

"The following principles being founded in reciprocity appear perfectly just, and to offer no cause of complaint to any nation:

"First, When a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs," &c.

Prior to this, in 1785, Mr. Jefferson presented a remonstrance to the French government, on this subject, in which he said that the government of the United States would be compelled to resort to countervailing duties, if the French government did not modify the burden. It is proper here to remark that this threat had the desired effect, the burden was in part removed for a time, but subsequently imposed again in a more onerous and objectionable shape, and now exists.

Our respectable and distinguished representative to the government of France, general Cass, made persevering efforts to induce that government to remove the restrictions placed by it upon our commerce, but without success. Some 18 months since he addressed a communication to the secretary of state on the subject, in which he seems to despair of success by negotiation, and recommends as a necessary measure relative duties, as will be seen by the annexed extract.

"I have nothing now to add, but that the matter is beyond the reach of ordinary diplomatic discussion, and that its solution must depend on the measures which the executive and which congress may see proper to adopt. As long as France, in carrying out the restrictive system she has adopted, can export to the United States twice as much as she imports from there, without any fear of a change of measures on our part, so long the present state of things will continue, exhibiting one of the most striking examples of inequality in the trade between two nations which is to be found in the history of modern commerce."

Mr. Tyler, now president of the United States, in his reply to interrogatories propounded to him by a committee of Henrico county, Va., on the subject of duties says:

"The power to lay duties is given by the constitution in express terms. The right to select the articles of import on which to levy the duties, is unquestionable. Every duty imposed, operates pro tanto as a bounty on the production of the same article at home, and it has been considered a wise policy on the part of all administrations so to impose the duties as to advance the production of such articles as were of national importance. I certainly do not doubt the policy or expediency of such a course. The duties, however, should be laid with reference to revenue, except when they are laid to counteract the policy of a foreign government, and with a view to the regulation of trade."

Those who know Mr. Tyler, will not for a moment doubt, that at an early day as president of the United States, he will call the attention of congress to this subject, and recommend a course of policy in accordance with his opinions as above expressed.

In my next I propose to consider the effect of a reciprocal and relative system of duties upon the currency and financial affairs of our country.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Worcester district congressional election. The votes for number of congress in the fifth congressional district were yesterday counted by the governor and council.

The whole number of votes was 5,362
Necessary for a choice 2,682
Charles Hudson had 3,999
Isaac Davis 1,752
Cyrus P. Grosvenor 533
Nathaniel Wood 94
Others 54

It will be seen that the hon. Charles Hudson is elected by a majority of 536 votes.

The Western rail road. Twenty-eight miles to Chester, next beyond Springfield, will be opened for travel next week, making (with 12 miles opened 4th inst. from Pittsfield onward), forty miles in use since the 4th inst. Thus will the travelling by coach between Boston and Hudson city, on Hudson river, be reduced to 22 miles.

RHODE ISLAND.

The legislature of Rhode Island met at Newport on Wednesday last, and the government was organized under the recent election. The hon. Henry Y. Cranston was nominated for re-election as speaker, but declined the honor, and Charles Jackson, esq. of Providence, was chosen. The votes were counted, and gov. King, lieutenant gov. Dimon, and the whole whig ticket were declared elected. Gov. King was absent, in consequence of the death of his wife. It is not customary in Rhode Island for the governor to deliver a speech or message on his inauguration, or on the opening of the session.

On Thursday the committee appointed to count the votes for members of congress, made the following report, which was accepted. That the whole number of electors voting was 2,725; necessary for a choice 1,363; that Robert B. Cranston received 2,516; Joseph L. Tillingham, 2,436, and that they were elected. The judges of the supreme court, the judges of the court of common pleas for Bristol county, the clerk and the sheriff, were re-elected.

CONNECTICUT.

The annual session of the legislature commenced at Hartford on Wednesday, the 5th inst. Hon. Samuel C. Selden was elected pro temp. of the senate, and C. J. McCunly, speaker of the house. The house adopted the principle of choosing its clerks beyond its own body, leaving the members untrammelled in their representative functions by extra legislative duties.

The message of governor Ellsworth is a concise and satisfactory document. It expresses himself strongly in favor of a protective tariff. Of the financial condition of the state he gives a good account. She owes "no man any thing," and has a school fund of $2,000,000, yielding an annual income of $113,000. The annual expenses of the commonwealth do not exceed $50,000. Over legislation is an evil under which Connecticut does not seem to labor, since all her public statutes, enacted during a period of two hundred years, are contained in one volume. The militia force is 40,000 men.

Altogether the state appears to be in a most enviable condition. [Star.]

Trade. According to Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, the amount of capital in the state invested in foreign trade, is $48,808,401. The number of retail dry goods, groceries and other stores in the state is 12,968, with a capital of $11,481,553. The total number of consumers in the state of New York engaged in foreign trade is 459, of which 417 are in the city of New York.

The total number of commission houses in the state of New York is 1,049, of which 918 are in the city of New York.

Agriculture. The legislature of New York has made the judicious appropriation of $8,000 a year for five years, for the promotion of agriculture and household manufactures in that state. It is the duty of the officers of the state and county agricultural societies to regulate and award premiums on such articles as are best calculated to promote the agricultural and household manufacturing interests of the state giving the reward for the most economical or profitable mode of competition. An accurate written description of the whole process in raising the crop, or feeding the animal, as may be, is to be given by the person claiming the reward.

The patron case. Every reader of the newspapers will recollect something of the controversy between the heirs of the late Stephen Van Rensselaer and his tenants, so high was the excitement, and so great were the rights and interests involved in the question that commissioners were appointed by the governor of New York to investigate the subject and if possible to adjust the difficulties. The following, from the Troy Whig is the clearest and the most comprehensive account of the subject that we have seen.

Report of the Commissioners appointed to effect a settlement of the disputes existing between the landlord and tenants of the manor of Rensselaer.

Hugh Maxwell and Gary V. Sackett having been appointed by the governor, commissioners for the above purpose, entered upon their duties during the last summer, and visited the western portion of the manor, where disputes between the late Stephen Van Rensselaer and his tenants had existed, for the purpose of obtaining information necessary to a proper discharge of their duty in regard to the state, the tenants and the landlord.

The manor of Rensselaer is about twenty-four miles in length from Barn Island in the Hudson to the Chocoma falls, and extends east and west from the Hudson river each way, twenty-four miles, excepting an extent of land one mile wide and sixteen miles long on the west side of the river, and including the greater part of the city of Albany, and also excepting the land on which the city of Troy stands and those portions of the counties of Albany and Rensselaer of which the fee simple has been surrendered. The tract which now constitutes the manor was purchased by Killian Van Rensselaer of the Indians during the several years extending from 1639 to 1637, under the sanction of a charter granted by the states general. After the conquest of the province of New York by the English, a new charter was granted by queen Anne to Killian Van Rensselaer, the then proprietor, in the year 1704. The charter conferred upon the patron the right to hold a court leet and court baron, to receive all fines, issues and amercements at such courts and at the assizes of oyer and terminer in assizes, distrain for rent, and to exercise all other powers granted to lords of the manor under the English law.

The American revolution left the proprietor in the enjoyment of a fee simple in the manor, but stripped him of his feudal rights and privileges.

In 1775, the manor came into the possession of the late Stephen Van Rensselaer who found a large portion of it unoccupied and unimproved. But by the use of liberal and judicious measures, he had the gratification at the end of fifty years of his active life, to see the manor settled, occupied and improved by an industrious, enterprising and intelligent population.

The policy which the patron adopted was to grant perpetual leases of his land, in quantities of one hundred and twenty acres each, with a reservation to the proprietor of all mines, minerals, streams of water—such fire wood and timber as the proprietor should find necessary for building or repairing mills and mining operations; also the right of egress, way and passage, and the liberty to lay out roads in any part of the land; the tenant was likewise bound to pay to the proprietor, a yearly rent in wheat and also to deliver annually at the manor house four fat hogs, and to render one day's service with his wagon and horses; also to pay all taxes and assessments upon the land.

There was also reserved a certain portion of the consideration money upon every alienation of the estate, otherwise than by devise or last will and testament; and there was a covenant that the tenant should pay such proportion of the price obtained at any sale. This right or claim is usually termed quarter sales.

On account of the indulgent disposition, however, of the late Stephen Van Rensselaer, many of his tenants became remiss and negligent in the payment of their rents, and at the time of his death, the rents in arrears exceeded four hundred thousand dollars.

The present patron of that portion of the manor which lies in Albany county, having urged the payment of these arrears upon his tenants, having, moreover, insisted upon the performance of certain provisions of their leases onerous in themselves, and inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions, became involved in serious disputes with a large portion of them. To settle these disputes, commissioners were appointed by the governor, with the authority of the legislature: from whose report we learn that general Van Rensselaer refused the payment of all arrears to be made by the 1st of March next, with interest from the late patron's death; and if the whole cannot be paid by that day, an acknowledgment to be given of the balance, to be paid at a reasonable time thereafter.

In cases of utter inability, poverty, misfortune, &c. the settlement of the arrears to be in conformity with the provisions of the late patron's will. If the arrears of rent are thus settled, he will release the quarter sale on a farm for $30.

He will consent to receive a money rent of $30 for a farm yielding 22½ bushels of wheat, one day's service and four fowls.

He will release the water privileges for a reasonable price.

All arrears of rent are paid he will release all his interest in any farm for $2400, payable one-fifth in hand, and the remainder in four equal annual instalments with lawful interest to be paid annually, to be secured by a bond and mortgage on the premises.

The following terms are only intended to include the towns of Rensselaerville, Bern, Westerlo and Knox.

In reply to these terms the tenants submitted the following proposition; that the rent in wheat be valued at one dollar per bushel, and all restrictions be taken off; and that the tenants have the privilege of purchasing the fee at a sum, at seven per cent. interest, which would amount to a given number of bushels of wheat. Meaning thereby, in pay for 400 acres of land (being the size generally of the farms for which they pay 22½ bushels of wheat) $221 42; or about $3 per acre.

In this situation do the affairs of the landlord and his tenants remain at present. The commissioners say they "have thought they should best perform their duty to the parties and to the public, by suspending the interference for the present, and until some indication shall appear of a disposition on the part of the landlord or that of the tenants, to reconsider the terms submitted, and approximate towards those offered by the other party. The disposition manifested by a great majority of the tenants, induces us to hope that finally a settlement will be effected between them and the landlord. The interest of the landlord, as well as that of the tenants, will be most advantageously secured by mutual concession and compromise."

Congressional election. The Van Buren convention met for that purpose at Uniontown, Pennsylvania, on the 8th instant, nominated Gen. H. W. Benson, as a candidate for congress in place of Enos Hogg, resigned.

Charles Ogilvie, member of congress, died on the 16th inst. at his residence in Somerset, Penn., of consumption.

The relief bill. We have been informed that the following banks have refused to accept the relief bill, viz:—Philadelphia, Commercial, North America, Western and Southward. [Pennsylvania.]

The revenue and improvement bill. The motives of the democratic members of the legislature, who voted, on the afternoon of the adjournment, for the bill, an act to provide revenue to meet the demands on the treasury, and for other purposes, having been most grossly impugned in the Philadelphia Spirit of the Times, of yesterday, (no doubt from erroneous information) several of the political friends of those members, who know that they acted from the purest motives, and with an intention of abandoning the principles of their party, deem it proper that the reasons for their votes, which has been placed upon the journals of the house of representatives, should be laid immediately before the people of this state. This course has been adopted without any consultation with the members alluded to, as they have left the seat of government. "Strike, but bear me," is a motto peculiarly applicable in the present instance, and one which, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, will forcibly address itself to every patriotic democrat of Pennsylvania.

Extract from the journals of the house of representatives, Tuesday, May 4, 1841.

Having read the statement on the final passage of the revenue bill, "an act to provide revenue to meet the demands on the treasury, and for other purposes," we respectfully ask leave to enter on the journals of the house the reasons for voting as voted.

It has been our anxious desire throughout the session to obtain the passage of such a bill to meet the public exigencies, as would accord with the views of our immediate constituents, and carry out the policy which has for many years been contended for by the party to which we are attached. The journal of the house will bear evidence that we have been our course of conduct on every bill which has been presented this session to provide the ways and means to maintain the honor and credit of Pennsylvania. But being in a minority, our views and wishes have not been sustained by the power of a majority, entertaining different opinions of public policy from those which we have always cherished. In this emergency no other alternative was presented to us, than to permit the legislature to adjourn, and to make use of any measure to sustain the plighted faith of the commonwealth, to prevent a portion of her citizens, to whom she is indebted from being reduced to a state of beggary, or to vote for the bill which has just become a law. In adopting this latter alternative, we have not abandoned any of the principles upon which we were elected. We have been governed solely by our solemn convictions of public duty. We have been willing in a patriotic spirit of conciliation to make such a compromise with our opponents on this floor, as to be satisfied by the majority of the state of the public treasury. The executive with which it is our duty to deal, had pointed out to him the most excellent vote message, the ground upon which he was willing to meet the majority of the legislature. But that majority having the power in their own hands, were unwilling to make a temporary sacrifice of many of our preconceived opinions. From the commencement of the present session, we have been strenuously opposing the objectionable features of this bill—we have used all our energies to obtain one more in consonance with our views, and we have endeavored the majority to meet us upon terms of a fair compromise—but our opposition the manufacture of salt, iron, of lead, of copper, and other metals, and in mining coal, for domestic use, and for exportation. As arts flourish and manufactures multiply in proportion to the abundance and convenience of the materials from which they are derived, or by which they are supplied, and as these have an intimate connexion with mineral treasures, certainly that policy which leads to a development of those treasures must have its foundation in true wisdom. Nor do the benefits accrue to arts and manufactures. Agriculture is promoted by the discovery of mineral manures and the composition of soils, a knowledge of which geology inculcates. In an branch of industry is more important than has been made in agriculture since our acquaintance with geology has been cultivated in this country.

The report which has led to these remarks is comprised in one hundred and thirty-two pages. To give an outline of its contents would swell this communication to an unreasonable length. Those who wish to be informed of its valuable details will resort to the report itself. But there is a portion of it which merits a wider circulation than that of a legislative document. I allude to the observations of professor Rogers upon the infusorial stratum of the tertiary formation, which he discovered during the last year's investigations. Besides the novelty of the organic remains which it includes, this bed has a peculiar and interesting character. It is described in a scientific point of view, from the fact of its composing a distinct subdivision of our great tertiary formations, and thus of age anterior to that of the infusorial stratum sparsely found in some of the tertiary strata. The position of the stratum is probably, but little different from that of the polar section of Bohemia.

Believing that an extract from the report of professor Rogers will be acceptable to many of your readers, I now send you his general remarks upon the infusorial stratum, which, if published by you, will be followed by another extract containing a more detailed account of this interesting formation in connexion with its associated bed of tertiary.

W. E. LOCKE.

Extract from the report. The peculiar feature of these tertiary beds, in view of which I have proposed devoting to them a distinct consideration, consists of a very remarkable stratum, varying from a few inches to several feet in thickness, and almost entirely of microscopic fossils between the beds containing the eocene and those containing the mesocene impressions.

This stratum, which will be more particularly described under the subsequent head, giving no indications to the naked eye, or even under an ordinary microscope, of its real composition, was until recently regarded by me as nothing more than a clay of unusually fine texture, such as is not sufficiently met with in the group of tertiary strata. Nor was its true nature unfolded until, struck by its remarkable lightness and its almost exclusively siliceous composition, and adverted to the recent discoveries of microscopic fossils in Europe, I was led to inspect it through a powerful microscope, when I found it to be made up almost entirely of exquisitely minute and delicate organic remains.

These curious relics, too minute to be described by the most penetrating eye, thus accumulated in a compact form into a stratum of great thickness, extending to a class of objects which, of late years, have excited much attention in Europe, from having been found to constitute an important portion of the mass of extensive beds of earth and rock, and are in fact the remains and remains of various animals, of marine, analogous to those which are met with in countless numbers in the waters of pools and marshes, and in the sea, and which are denominated infusory animals.

It will be the recent discoverers of the celebrated Eocene disclosed the important agency of these minute beings in the production of some of the mineral masses belonging to former geological eras, as observed in Europe, no one had ever dreamed of. The whole strata, of great thickness, which they literally made up of these shells and other solid appendages; yet nothing is more certainly established than that these remains form not only the principal material of the light white earth which is known gradually to accumulate in peat bogs and in other moist situations, of the Leat Tripoli found in many parts of Germany in widely extended beds of many feet in thickness, of the semi-opal and other dense products met with in these beds, and of the common sand-stone found in layers of thickness running through strata of chalk, but that they compose, in the shape of calcareous as well as siliceous shells, and especially the former, nearly the whole substance of the vast strata of the chalk itself, over a greater extent of districts of Europe, to a depth, in many places, of several hundred feet.

In view of these interesting facts, the discovery of the infusory stratum above referred to, as one of the members of our series of tertiary deposits, cannot fail to be regarded as an important addition to our knowledge of the tertiary of the country, and has the greatest interest at present from being the first example yet discovered in the United States of the occurrence of infusorial remains in any but the most recent geological formations. SOUTH CAROLINA.

A national bank—sufficiency. Some people have very large eyes—and believe other people to have very large ears. Nobody has ever proposed or imagined the possibility that the state would or could nullify the charter of a national bank. But the state might, and not improbably would, do the things following:

1. First declare in the most solemn form that such charter is a violation of the constitution, and as such ought to be repealed.

2. Enact that no branch or such unconstitutional corporation be established in South Carolina to impoverish her citizens and turn us into a colony of some northern city.

3. Enact that no bank chartered by this state shall receive or pay out the notes of such bank—under penalty of having their own paper refused in all payments to the treasury. We do not apprehend, however, that there will be any difference of opinion between the state and the banks on that point. South Carolina will regulate and protect her own local currency, but will not establish, preferably to the federal government its proper power to "coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins."

If a national bank is chartered, its charter will be repealed, and in that too, South Carolina will doubtless take part most cheerfully. [Charleston Mer.]

GEORGIA.

Important decision. The Augusta Chronicle states that Judge Andrews, of the northern circuit, (Oglethorpe held at the late term of the superior court, of Oglethorpe county—in a capital case—that a person could not be sworn as a witness in a court of justice, who did not believe in the existence of God, the obligations of an oath, and the future state, and whose testimony might be established, preferably to the federal government its proper power to "coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins.")

If a national bank is chartered, its charter will be repealed, and in that too, South Carolina will doubtless take part most cheerfully. [Charleston Mer.]

GEORGIA.

Criminal code. The laws of Alabama, as revised at the last session of the legislature, (says the Louisville Advertiser), make but one kind of crime punishable by death, while forty-two kinds are held punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, from periods varying from two to twenty years. Murder in the first degree is the crime in which the law makes punishable by death, but even this the court can, at its option, punish by sentence of imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. Death in a duel is held to be murder in the second degree, and made punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for a period of ten years. To give, accept, or carry a challenge, disqualifies for holding office in the state, and is further punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for two years. Bribery of executive, legislative, or judicial officers, from two to seven years; steamboat racing, by which life is endangered, for two years; and loss of life, or injury to the person by negligence or want of skill in professional offices, from two to ten years.

MISSISSIPPI.

This state will not be represented at the extra session of congress. Gov. McNutt has declined calling an extra session of the legislature for the purpose of appointing a period for the election, and does not consider himself authorized to order an election, without the intervention of the legislature.

Lost case—state of Louisiana vs. W. H. Williams. This case, originating in the attempt on the part of the defendant to dispose of a number of slave convicts purchased from the state of Virginia, under a pledge that they were to be sold by the territory of the United States, has been decided against the defendant. It will be remembered that he landed his slaves in Louisiana last fall, after an attempt to land them at Mobile. The New Orleans Picayune of May 2d, has the following notice of the trial:

Criminal court. Before Judge Canonge. The state vs. W. H. Williams. This important suit, which for the third time commenced on Friday morning, terminated at six o'clock yesterday afternoon by a verdict of "guilty" against the defendant. When it is known that Williams was represented by counselors Grymes and Mazureau, it will be presumed that nothing which legal ability could direct in favor of the prisoner was left undone. The amount involved in the issue of this trial and the loss of the defendant, is the large sum of $43,000, viz:

Cost of 24 slaves, at $500 each,	$12,000
The fare for each slave, $500,	12,000
The amount of bonds passed to the state of Virginia, that he would transport the slaves beyond the territory of the United States, and now, we presume, forfeited,	24,000
Total loss,	$48,000

LOUISIANA.

New Orleans, April 27, 1841. Our citizens have, within a day or two, been surprised and shocked at several instances of peculation and fraud on the part of certain officers of two of our banks. In the one case the book keeper of the Louisiana State bank is accused of having overdrawn his account in that institution fully eighty thousand dollars. His sudden disappearance led to an examination of the affair, when the defalcation was discovered. The excitement consequent upon the development of this delinquency had not subsided, when a rumor prevailed that two of the clerks of the Bank of Louisiana (the 1st book keeper and reviewing teller) had absconded, and the deficit of some $75,000 had been discovered. As the banks in question have so far published nothing explanatory of these alleged malversations, there may be some inaccuracy with regard to the facts, but it is not probable that officers of large deficits having been ascertained and of the departure of the delinquents—most probably to Texas—there can scarcely be a doubt.

The Batture case. Municipality No. 2 of the Orleans County Press reports. This important case was yesterday decided in the supreme court, four judges being for the defendants, judge Martin dissenting. The result of the decision is, that the defendants are entitled to the batture now formed, and all that may be found hereafter. The immense amount of property involved in this question, renders the decision of great importance, inasmuch as it has settled a point which will for the future put at rest any question about the ownership of the land fronting the river and the right to the alluvion.

ARKANSAS.

A gentleman who for some 12 or 15 years has resided in Arkansas, recently visited this, his native place. His statements were somewhat curious and interesting. The village where he lives is 1,800 miles distant from land; but in coming on by the White Mississippi and Ohio rivers, his route was 2,300 miles, on account of their sinuities. The Arkansas waters are materially shorter and milder than ours, and are so far from being cold in the summer in pure and healthy, though the heat is rather debilitating; and the day is followed by exceedingly heavy dews. The society is good in-clinging physicians and members of the bar. Being a Presbyterian in religion, he rides 100 miles to commune with the church of which he is a member, as there is no minister of that denomination nearer. There are but three Presbyterian ministers to 100,000 souls.

Of fruit, they have an excellent variety; but the current will not grow there. Sweet potatoes abound. As to game, they have various kinds in abundance; and of wild turkeys, with the exception of two months in winter, they trap or shoot as many as they wish, if it be a dozen a day. In the autumn the pigeons visit the forest to feed upon the acorns. In that of 1831 or '32 he heard that the neighboring forest was filled with them. Early one morning, just at the dawn, the inhabitants were roused by a tremendous noise in the air, and discovered clouds of pigeons. They were about a mile wide, and so numerous as to fly two hours without scarcely a break, and so dense as to obscure the rays of the sun. They flew so low that they could be killed with sticks and stones—being too much crowded in fact to get out of the way.

OHIO.

Public works. We learn that the amount of loan effected by the fund commissioners has been approved among the public works of the state, as follows:

Wabash and Erie canal	$130,000 00
Miami Extension canal	195,000 00
Hocking Valley canal	90,000 00
Welland canal	25,000 00
Nuskuungum improvement	125,000 00
Western Reserve and Nisnoore road	10,000 00
Urbana, Troy and Greenville road	5,000 00

Canal commerce of Cleveland. The Herald gives a tabular statement of property chargeable with tolls, which has passed through the canal from and to Cleveland, for the month of April, from which we make up the annexed particulars:

Arrived at Cleveland, during the month of April, 1841	14,925,742 lbs.
Last year, same month	12,906,407 "
Cleared, during last month	1,410,324 "
Last year, during April	1,315,539 "

The first arrival of property by the canal this year, was on the 17th of April—last year on the 7th of the same month.

The following are the chief articles which arrived, viz: 59,094 bushels wheat, 10,694 do. mineral coal, 26,561 barrels flour, 3,553 do. pork, 762 do. whiskey, 15,549 lbs. butter, 108,304 do. lard, 521,532 do. bacon, 304,224 do. iron and nails, 56,582 do. merchandise, 224 cords wood.

Among the articles cleared from Cleveland, we find the following, viz: 1,051 barrels salt, 1,822 do. lard, 108,985 pounds merchandise, 40,135 do. furniture, 136,855 do. gypsum, 50,901 feet lumber, 554 M. shingles.

MISSOURI.

The tragedy of the night of the 17th, at St. Louis. For some days past, the public authorities have been engaged in investigating some recent developments connected with the murder of Messrs. Baker and Weaver, and the burning of the store of Messrs. Collier and Pettus, and we have refrained from giving any of the particulars, lest our doing so might impede their operations. The object of secrecy being over, in the opinion of the officers, we feel at liberty to state the particulars so far as they have been developed.

A negro man named Edward H. Ennis, who has been for some time past in the employ of a barber named Johnson, on Market street, opposite the National hotel, made the disclosure. The communications it seems, were made by him, by one of the parties, that Ennis being uneasy about it, and very afraid, because of the excitement, and also of the murders, to tell what he knew, went on Friday last to Butcher, a yellow man, who resides in Brooklyn, on the opposite side of the river, and told him all that he knew, and asked his advice. Butcher refused to give any advice; on Sunday he went over again and went to Alton, when Butcher communicated the facts to two constables, who arrested Ennis, and after taking his statement, came here with expectation of catching one of the parties, (Warrick) but he had left before their arrival.

The circumstances of the horrible affair, as detailed by Ennis, are as follows:—About 10 o'clock, on Saturday night, Ennis went from the barber shop to his boarding house, kept by Leah, a free yellow woman, and Peter Clarteville, a free man, on Third, between Market and Walnut streets. Shortly after he had gone to bed, a negro slave named Madison, came to the door, knocked and was admitted. Soon after being admitted, Madison exclaimed, "G—d—n the luck," and on an inquiry why, he stated "I have done more murder to-night than I ever did before, and have not been paid for it!" and after remarking, that there would be an alarm of fire shortly, he stated in substance, that he and three yellow men, viz: James Seward, alias Sewell, Warrick and Brown, had gone on that night to Mr. Pettus' counting room, that the door was unlocked; Madison entered alone, Mr. Baker was sitting down with his boots off, reading a newspaper, Madison walked up and presented a bank bill to him, and asked him if it was good, and as Baker turned to look at the bill he struck him over the head with a short bar of iron, which he had concealed under his arm; the others then came in, and they repeated the blows until he was quite dead, his skull and one side of the head completely smashed. After searching the body for keys, they rolled it up in the bed clothes and placed it in the bed.

They secured the door and went to work on the vault to open it. Whilst at this work, Mr. Weaver came to the door and knocked, and called to Jesse, (Mr. Baker) to let him in. Some dispute ensued between Brown and Madison, which should kill Weaver; and it was insisted that Madison should be killed Baker, but he refused, saying that he had done his share and would do no more. Brown opened the door and placed himself behind it, and Madison Weaver passed into the room, struck him over the head with the bar of iron; on the second blow he fell, and attempting to rise, Brown thrust a sharp iron through his head. Ennis, in his statement, does not seem to firing of the bar of iron, but he says, that having heard Weaver was shot he asked Madison about it, and he told him that no pistol had been fired, and that they had no weapons but the bar of iron. Madison, from the statement it would seem that he had been concealed under the arm, and then some further effort at the vault, finding they could not get into it, Madison left. Warrick, Sewell and Brown remained a short time, then fired the house in five different places, came out, and the door, and went up the alley north from the house, and there was the key away. Brown took with him a gold watch and a blue rock, which he said he threw away for fear of detection.

It seems from the statement that Ennis, on the morning following, was in company with all of them, and many of the facts he got from others besides Madison. Warrick and Sewell said but little about it. Madison had with him, on the morning following, a small pistol, which he had taken from the house, and Ennis having learned the office it had performed, took it and threw it into a privy in the rear of Leah's house. The vault was yesterday searched and the bar found. We understand it proves to be identical with the one which was used to cut the chain on one end and claws on the other, one of the claws partly broken, agreeing fully with Ennis' description.

There are many other minor statements—but the above is the substance. The communication to Madison appears to have been made without any solicitation, and without any injunction to secrecy. Leah and her husband confirm Ennis' statement as far as the time he came home, and the time Madison came in. They heard the conversation, but not sufficiently distinct to understand it. It may be well, however, to remark, as a further confirmation of Ennis' statement, that yesterday Madison's coat was found in the lot of Leah's house besmeared with blood. From all that we can gather, it does not appear that the scheme had been long concocted, or that they had very well matured their plan of operations.

We subjoin such a description of the murderers as we are in possession of, and trust it may be sufficient if they have not been already apprehended to lead to their detection.

James Seward, alias Sewell, is a dark mulatto, and of New Orleans—has been here some time running at large, and if we are correctly informed, was sent here to avoid a prosecution in New Orleans. He is a stout, copper colored man, near six feet high, about thirty years old, very bold and impudent in manner. We understand that a short time since, he took a trip on his own hook, to Helena and Chicago, and lately returned to this city. It is believed he left here on the Wednesday following the murder, on board the Missouri, for New Orleans.

Brown is a dark mulatto, about 5 feet, 10 inches high, about 30 years of age, and it is said resided in Cincinnati. He seems to have been here a very short time. He is said to be on board the Goddess of Liberty, bound for Cincinnati.

James Seward alias Sewell, is a dark mulatto, about 5 feet 9 inches high, stout made, and a bold, cunning and very well educated negro. It is said he has a wife and a sister very well, originally from New York, has resided at New Albany, and during Madison's sojourn at Chicago was with him there. He is supposed to have left in the steamboat Atlanta, for the Ohio river.

Warrick was a barber, and has kept a shop for some time past in this city, on Franklin avenue. He is a very dark mulatto, slender made, about 5 feet 9 or 10 inches high, aged about 26, and remarkable for a bold impudent and haughty manner. It is believed that he left on the Chicago, bound for the Missouri river, and that his purpose was to join the company going to the Rocky mountains.

Officers have been despatched in every direction named, and it is reasonable to presume that they will be apprehended, should they unfortunately fail, it is hoped that all good citizens of every quarter will lend their energies to apprehend them and bring them to punishment. Ennis, the witness will remain in custody.

It would be impossible in us to bestow praise on any of the officers who have been engaged in this affair. The two constables of Alton, the mayor and the city police, the city constable and several citizens have spared no pains trouble or expense to ferret out the guilty, and we trust that they will, in addition to the reward offered, have that higher reward; the pleasure of seeing the inoffensive majority of the law, fully stood for. [St. Louis Gaz.]

The Louisville Journal of the 7th instant says:—The captain of the steamboat Fulton informs us that one of the party, who was arrested at the house in St. Louis was recently discovered and arrested at Cairo on board the steamboat Atlanta. He confessed his guilt, and was put on board the Pre-emption to be taken to St. Louis. The excitement against the wretch was very great, and many expected that, on his arrival at St. Louis, he would be burned at the stake. It must be confessed that the conduct of a St. Louis mob upon a certain other occasion afforded some ground for such a horrible expectation.

St. Louis. What a change has twelve years effected in the appearance of this city! we joyously exclaimed, as the Monson landed us at the St. Louis wharf a few days since. We have visited St. Louis, and the city has changed so much in a few years has made come up so vividly before us as at that time. Twelve years ago, there were but few good looking buildings in the city. Now Front or Water street shows half a mile of substantial three or four story houses, with a great deal of merchandise from all quarters of the globe. Main street is metamorphosed from a muddy lane, with a few well paved streets, with many scattered ill-looking houses, to a well paved street, filled up on each side with well built and neatly finished houses, with a great deal of Broadway itself. Here the retail merchants, to a great extent, vend their dry goods, and, of course, in such a street the smiling faces of the St. Louis beauties are very every day. The cross streets have improved in the same ratio. So have 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th streets, some of which, twelve years ago, had not even a single building to mark their locality. Twelve years ago, the First Presbyterian, the old and ill-shapely Catholic, and the Methodist, were the only houses of worship—now a new Catholic, Presbyterian, Unitarian, Methodist, Episcopal and other churches are to be seen, some of which are truly magnificent and highly ornamental to the city. Then, there were but few genteel hotels; now, there are quite a number, but the emperor of them all is the mammoth Planter's house, kept in tip-top style by Stickney and Knight. Then, the Republican was printed there, a weekly paper, and it was printed at that time, weekly, and another paper, which died for want of patronage; now, the Republican, Bulletin, Evening Gazette, New Era, Pennant, and Argus are in a flourishing condition, and the Argus, which was first published in 1829, have kept more than an even pace with the other improvements. The Argus was the only loco loco paper in St. Louis twelve years ago; the Argus is the only loco loco paper in St. Louis now. This is one of those emphatic truths which are to be acted with all over the land, showing that the people encourage those papers and those alone which advocate their interests. We might also mention the improvement in the city, and the facilities now compared with what they were twelve years ago when the arrival of a steamboat was a great curiosity; but we must forbear. Instead of a few isolated and poorly constructed boats, the levee now shows a line of those magnificent craft, which are to be acted together, and extending from the foot of Market street to another cross street full a mile off. St. Louis is now a great and beautiful city, and, from her position, is destined to grow and become greater and more beautiful still. [Herald-Eye.]

POSTSCRIPT.

FOREIGN NEWS.—By the Caledonia at Boston. The steam ship Caledonia, capt. McKellan, arrived at the Boston wharf on Wednesday morning last, in fourteen and a half days from Liverpool, where she sailed on the 4th inst. We give below an abstract of the most interesting items.

No intelligence of the President steam ship had been received, and although her safety seems to be abandoned. She cost £25,000, and was insured on leaving Liverpool $60,000.

A large meeting of American residents was held in Liverpool on the 30th ult. in relation to the death of President Harrison. Francis B. Ogden, of New York, presided. A series of appropriate resolutions were passed.

England. The ministry sustained a defeat on the Irish voters bill on the 27th April. The corn laws is to undergo a speedy revision.

The health of prince Albert is stated to be very poor. The duke of Wellington, as a godson of Spain, invested him on the 1st of April with the insignia of the order of the golden fleece.

Major gen. Sir John Harvey has been made governor of Newfoundland. The British funds are heavy. But little business doing in the commercial market. The tea trade, however, is brisk.

Cotton has declined 1 8 to 1 4—demand limited. The Great Western railway terminus, Bristol, has been destroyed by fire—loss estimated at from 19 to £20,000.

Serious disturbances have broken out in Ireland. France. The king and queen of the Belgians arrived at Paris on the 30th ult. The ministerial revolution which took place in Constantinople recently is considered a triumph of the French government. The works of the fortifications of Paris have been commenced.

Spain. In this country the regency question is still unsettled.

CHRONICLE.

ARMIES. Interesting statistics. The standing armies of Europe bear a proportion to the population of their respective populations of the kingdoms and states as follows, abstracted from a late work on the subject:

England	1 soldier to every 140 of its population.
France	1 do. to do. 110 do.
Austria	1 do. to do. 100 do.
Russia	1 do. to do. 90 do.
Prussia	1 do. to do. 80 do.
Poland	1 do. to do. 65 do.
Württemberg	1 do. to do. 60 do.
Saxony	1 do. to do. 57 do.
Denmark	1 do. to do. 53 do.
The Roman states	1 do. to do. 300 do.
Tuscany	1 do. to do. 300 do.

It may be well to add that the proportion of the U. States army to its population is 1 to 1,600.

In China, according to the most accurate accounts, the population exceeds 360,000,000, and the army is rated at 700,000, making a ratio of 1 soldier to every 514 persons.

BANK OF THE U. S. OF PENNSYLVANIA. The Pennsylvania of the 17th inst. (1841). The adjourned meeting from the 3d instant was held at the banking house yesterday, and was fully attended. A report was made by Mr. Lippincott, closing with a resolution, which was adopted, accepting of the provisions of the "relief bill," and agreeing to come under any laws which may hereafter be passed for the regulation of banks. A resolution offered by Mr. Randall was also adopted, authorizing the board of directors to give public notice, according to law, of an application to the legislature for a reduction of capital and a change of name of the institution, and another, authorizing the board of directors to exercise their discretion as to the time and manner of pledging certain notes for the payment of the circulation and deposits of the bank. A preamble and resolutions offered by Mr. Drake were adopted, condemning in the strongest terms, the management of the bank under its former administration.

BANK NOTES. An experiment was yesterday made by an English gentleman, on the notes of one of our city banks, in the presence of the directors of the Bank of England, by which he demonstrated his ability to efface totally and without leaving a solitary trace, every ink mark existing on the face of the notes. The impression made by the ink was removed by the father point of a quill imbued with some chemical preparation compounded by the gentleman in question. He then established with perfect ease that certificates of deposits and other bank documents in writing can be altered for purposes of counterfeiting. After this experiment, he wrote a few lines on a piece of ordinary writing paper, and then, in the most experienced chemist in the city, declaring that it was impossible to remove it.

We understand he has offered to give his secret to the various banking institutions, at a reasonable rate. We likewise learn that the same gentleman has made known his discovery to the Bank of England.

A NATIONAL BANK. The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Courier says: "The secretary of the treasury has prepared a plan for a national bank, which he has submitted to the cabinet, and is to be reported at the commencement of the coming session. In its main features it will resemble the late bank, but will be surrounded with such checks, guards and restrictions, as experience has indicated as useful or necessary. He will propose a capital of thirty-five millions. He has not determined, it is said, upon the locality of the national bank."

COTTON. At Charleston last week 1,465 bales of upland sold at 9 1/2c; Sea Island 21 1/2c. Stock, 4,240 upland, 12,381 Sea Island.

MADEIRA. May 8. The sales since Wednesday morning were $2,800 bales on quality of middling fair and above have been established a slight advance, owing to their scarcity. Business this season will close at least one month earlier than usual. Liverpool—clarification—end 9 1/2c; mid. fair 10 1/2c; fine 11 1/2c; fully fair 11 1/2c; good fair 12 1/2c; good fine 13 1/2c; fancy copra 14; N. Alabama and Tennessee 9 1/2c.

The Orleans chamber of commerce has appointed a committee to endeavor to procure an alteration in the period for making up the annual statement of the cotton and sugar crops. The 31st of August is generally the date of the close of the season.

No other district heard from.

NEW CAROLINA. Reports say that the whigs have gained two or three representatives at the recent election.

THE FLORIDA. From the congressional district lately represented by Mr. Randolph, Andrew Kennedy (V. B.) is elected. This is the strongest whig district in the state, and the whigs defeated themselves by running a democratic minority.

Whig representatives are elected from the other districts of the state.

THE COAL TRADE. The Miners' Journal says: The Shamokin coal trade commenced on the 25th ult. by the Danville and Potomac road to Sunbury. A large increase of coal will be mined at Shamokin this season, nearly all of which will be required at Danville and the surrounding towns, to supply the iron works in that quarter.

The water was let into the Delaware and Hudson canal on the 26th ult., and the transportation of coal from the Lackawanna region commenced this week. This region will furnish this season a supply of from 100 to 170,000 tons.

Very little if any coal will be shipped from the Lehigh region before the middle of July. The supply will be regulated in a great measure by the time they commence business.

The Schuylkill canal trade will commence about the 17th inst. The supply from this region will be entered in a measure by the demand in the early part of the shipping season, and the prices obtained for the article. The great prostration of the coal trade of our coal last two years, has crippled the resources of our coal to an almost ruinous extent and it is certain that without their obtain fair remunerating prices for their coal in the early part of the season, a full supply of coal cannot be expected.

DEATHS during last week—at Philadelphia 130, of which 49 were under two years of age, and 17 of consequence. At Baltimore 44, of which 19 were under two years of age, 7 free colored and 4 slaves, died of consumption.

FLUKE at New York is down to $4 50; 84 1/2c—a large supply arriving from the west. At Baltimore the price $4 25; 84 1/2c; city mid. $4 75. The inspection of the week 11, 412 bales and 306 half bales.

FIRES at Toronto, U. C. about twenty-five dwelling houses were destroyed by fire a few days since—loss estimated at £15,000.

AGENTS. The AgENTS' cotton press, Magazine street, with 350 bales cotton, value estimated at $15,000.

LUMBER. The steambark Relief, captain Sanner, arrived from Port Deposit, having in tow a raft containing five millions cub of lumber, consigned to colored Weatherly and others. Baltimore is the principal port for the products of the Susquehanna valley, and it only requires a small amount of enterprise to make the market one of the first in the country, for many articles of admirable use. Among the products of the great valley, none is more valuable than the lumber, of various kinds and qualities, which float down the river in great quantities, and which, when properly marketed, will tend to bring purchasers "all along above."

MALT. The following is a return of the quantity of malt used in distilleries, for the years 1839 and 1840, in England, Scotland and Ireland:

	Bushels.	Bushels.
England	237,072	238,163
Scotland	3,321,754	2,912,619
Ireland	486,540	486,540
Total	4,223,342	4,037,122

It will be seen from the above, that while there has been a small increase in the quantity of malt used in the distilleries in England during the last year, and only a very slight decrease in Scotland, the falling off in Ireland has been nearly one-third. So much for the labors of Father Mathew!

MICHELLE. The FORGER. Officer Bowyer received Governor Seward's requisition on Lord Sydenham, and proceeded to Montreal. Captain Comau of the Montreal police accompanied Mr. Bowyer to Burlington, and as soon as they reached the American waters formally surrendered the prisoner in the name of her Britannic majesty. Mitchell is said to be perfectly calm and to show his determination to plead guilty of the crimes with which he is charged. He is in the N. York prison.

ST. LOUIS TRAGEDY. All four of the persons accused of the atrocious crime of murder and arson perpetrated on the 15th April, have been arrested, three of them had reached St. Louis in time, and Madison, their leader, was on his way on the 5th inst. strictly guarded.

"SCOLARMASTERS ABROAD." The Boston Journal of Monday says: The three Normal schools in this state, will send out during the present year, over one hundred and fifty teachers—more thoroughly prepared, unacquainted with any other number have ever been before at any one time.

THE STEAMER. The steamer Britannia, capt. Chalmers, left Boston on the 16th inst. at 3 o'clock for Halifax and Liverpool. She had eighty-three passengers; and twelve who wished to go out in her, says the Boston Transcript, were unable to obtain berths, they having all been previously taken up. Only four of the passengers on the 15th April, have been arrested, and thirty additional. Two measures are now on the ocean, leading for the United States. The Boston steamer, now thirteen days out will arrive this week, and the British Queen a week from port—the steamer, "Sloop."

SLAVES CAPTURED. A letter received at New Bedford, from H. Carroll, esq. U. S. consul at St. Helena, dated March 26, 1841, states that five Portuguese slave-ships, captured on the coast of Africa, by the British naval force on that station, with upwards of 500 slaves, were on board. The slaves had been landed at St. Helena, and remained on board subject to the orders of the British government.

STOCKS. At N. York, May 17, $100,000 N. York stock at 29; 20s sold at par. Indiana sterling bond sold at 98. Illinois 1870 at 55. Bank of U. S. shares $18.

FEET. A draft on the sub-treasurer of one of the sub-treasurers, in the city, for $30,000, was presented yesterday from a bank in Wall street, with a particular regard that it might be paid in bank notes. But the sub-treasurer had more silver than paper at his command, and the bank was compelled to receive the amount in specie.

TEA. New York auction sales, May 17. 6 months—Gunpowder—34 half chests at 47 1/2c; 49 1/2c and 130; boxes at 50 1/2c. Boxes without iron. Imperial—24 1/2c; boxes 55c; 47c and 1,061 1/2c with drawers. Hyson—49 1/2c; boxes at 51 1/2c; 300 bbls. with drawers. 200 bbls. Hyson—130c; boxes at 55c; 85c and 400 bbls. with drawers. 49 1/2c; 49 1/2c; 49 1/2c; 49 1/2c. Congo—10 half chests 34 1/2c; 30 do. and 100 chests with drawers.

Tobacco. The Huntbills Journal says that northern Maryland is fully supplied with any other part of the United States in producing the article of tobacco and hemp. It is believed that 1,000 to 1,500 loads of tobacco will be shipped at St. Louis alone this season.

New Orleans. May 8. Our tobacco market remains without any material alteration. We estimate the quantity available for sale at 4,000 to 5,000 bales. Sales of the week are upwards of 1,000 bales at very steady prices.

WEATHER AND CROPS. The St. Louis Republican of the 4th ult. says: The weather continues cold, and the corn and chaff. It is supposed that heavy rains must have fallen to the north of this. The river is high, and for a day or so past has been at a stand, having risen about two feet the day or two previous.

The Newark Advertiser of the 4th ult. inst. says: The season so far has been unpropitious to the planters. Not an acre of corn has yet been planted in this neighborhood, which we know of, and very little of the wheat has been sown. The prospect is gloomy for the farmer; but they should not forget the promise, that "after the rains come, the time and harvest." The fruit buds on well, we believe.

WHEAT. At Baltimore, Maryland wheat is quoted at 95 to 91; old 82 1/2c.

certainly one of the most important of the poor man's comforts. He proposed to leave the duty on colonial sugars, as now, at 21s. per cwt.; and to reduce the duty on foreign sugar from £3 3s. per cwt. to 36s. retaining in both cases the 5 per cent. added last year. He estimated his gain from the reduction of the duty on foreign sugar at £1,000,000 from the timber, would give a total of £1,300,000. The duties attaching upon corn, if the measures contemplated by government were effected, would provide for any remaining defalcation; but at all events, he was determined to make up the deficiency out of the other sources.

Lord John Russell gave notice that on Monday, the 31st May, he should move for a committee of the whole house to take into consideration the acts relating to the trade in corn. (Loud cries of hear, hear, hear, and the ministerial benches, which are followed by one or two of the opposition benches, as we ever witnessed in the house; after the cries of hear, hear, heard subsided on these benches, the tory members cheered repeatedly, over and over again, in a manner between irony and mere vociferation.) The speaker, after a short quiet interval, of the utmost excitement, during which Mr. Sergeant Jackson handed to Lord Stanley a pocket book, which that noble lord handed across the table to Lord John Russell. This was also followed by a renewal of the tory noises. Ultimately, it turned out that the day was to be a holiday by the house. The noble lord (John Russell) shortly after fixed his motion for the first order day after that he had first named.

-Now, as to sugar: For the last two years the lower classes have suffered severely from the high price of this article, now almost a necessary of life.

They must see that this involved a question of great interest and of vast importance. He should state, and had stated, only this point, with respect to what he considered would be the effect upon the revenues of the country. His right honorable friend, the president of the board of trade, as belonging to his department, would submit to the committee measures which, with safety to the revenues, would be referred to parliament for the revocation of certain duties that had been levied (hear, hear). The whole question was a measure of finance. He had come before the house to state to them the revenue and the income likely to ac-

Mr. Hume. If he understood rightly, the plans of the government embraced a remodelling of the corn laws. (Cheers.) They were about, also, the right honorable gentleman had declared, to alter the duties on timber and sugar, the two most important articles. He thought that the right honorable gentleman did right in putting forward those articles as a means by which the revenue might be kept up. He hoped they would be so. But suppose the duties on the expenditure, but suppose they kept up the expenditure, he thought that the changes to be made with regard to those two items, and in the article of coffee and other articles, to which the president of the board of trade was to call the attention of the house, would be productive of advantages to the commerce of the country beyond any measures that had been brought forward in his time; changes effected not only without defalcation, but with an increase of revenue; changes by which not only would our commerce be increased, but the working man, who had hitherto been neglected, would take the means of earning his livelihood, and would not be driven to depend on the poor laws, or any other dependence; and he would tell the noble lord who had charge of the poor law bill that much of the elation that distracted the country, much of the complaint against the neglected poor laws, would never have been brought forward if the government had, two or three years ago, when the bill was brought in, offered the measure now proposed; and if, when they threw the workman on his own resources, they had at the same time thrown open the markets of Europe for their food, and the markets of the world for their industry, thus enabling them to free themselves from the workhouse. (Hear, hear.) No people in any part of the world labor like Englishmen; and was it not that the destructive laws should be allowed to exist to deprive him of the means of labor, and of food, its reward? He was glad to hear the right honorable member for Tamworth, on a former occasion, state that he did not object to a reconsideration of the corn laws, and hoped that now, when the occasion offered, he would not disappoint the just expectations of the people on this head. He was obliged to the chancellor of the exchequer for the promises he held out in favor of an enlarged free trade, and he hoped that to treating of this important subject the honorable gentleman opposite would treat it as a great national question, and not as a party question. (Hear, hear.) For his part, he was prepared to take the right honorable gentleman's promises in the spirit in which they were given, having no doubt that in the end they would result to the increased happiness and prosperity of the country.

Lord John Russell. With regard to the general principles on which the government propose to act, I stated before the house, at the close of the Easter holidays, that we had made up our minds as to the change which it was necessary to effect in the regulations of trade. I do believe that sound as those principles are on which we mean to proceed, unanswerable arguments have been advanced which have been urged by great writers and statesmen as applicable to them, this is the occasion, and the critical state has arisen in the affairs of this nation, which require the application of those principles. (Cheers.) Not only has an opportunity been presented for a prudent application of those principles; not only can you enjoy the advantage of maturely considering the laws which have hitherto prevailed on the subject, but this is the particular time that great mischief, not to say great peril, can be avoided by your settlement of this question. (Cheers.) And if you determine, I will not say to adopt this proposition or the other, but if you determine to reject some such change in duty on corn as that which I mean to submit; if you determine to make no change in the commercial policy, but to stand by the principles of monopoly and exclusion, this is the particular time that such a course will have an influence, and a most unfortunate influence, on the prosperity of this country. (Cheers.) Thus persuaded, as the government fully believe, and as I stated they were on a former occasion, it will be for my right honorable friend (Mr. Labouchere, we suppose), to proceed with his propositions at as early a period as will be consistent with their due consideration, and for the rest of the measures to be carried on the corn laws of which I have given notice. I trust that what I have said as to the general principles on which I mean to proceed will rather have a good than a prejudicial effect; and if I expose myself to the disadvantage of giving the effect of the measure without urging the grounds and reasons on which it is supported, I must be content.

Mr. Labouchere said he did not rise to trouble the house with any lengthened observations on a question which, as the government fully believed, and as I stated they were on a former occasion, it will be for my right honorable friend (Mr. Labouchere, we suppose), to proceed with his propositions at as early a period as will be consistent with their due consideration, and for the rest of the measures to be carried on the corn laws of which I have given notice. I trust that what I have said as to the general principles on which I mean to proceed will rather have a good than a prejudicial effect; and if I expose myself to the disadvantage of giving the effect of the measure without urging the grounds and reasons on which it is supported, I must be content.

He said the chancellor of the exchequer, the government, in proposing to revise the duty on corn, did not do so in connection with reference to that single question, but that inasmuch as they had come to the conclusion that it was necessary for the great interests of the community that the whole commercial system should be revised, it would be both unjust and inequitable to insist upon revision without the first instance, grappling with the greatest difficulty, namely, the duty on corn. (Hear, hear.) Indeed, he should be ashamed of the position in which government would stand, if, while they were prepared to favor the manufacturing interests by changes in the tariff, they might neglect the interests of certain classes of the community, they should shrink from this question, merely because the great interests connected with it might raise a powerful opposition. He thought that if government had pursued that course they would have been open to the reproaches of the house and of the country. Some remarks had been made as to the right of his honorable friend having made the corn law a budget question. As a mere question of revenue, his right hon. friend had not brought it prominently forward; all he had done was, that while dealing with great commercial questions, while recommending great fiscal alterations, he could not ask the house to impose taxes; to vote money which he had hopes he should be able to raise by some of those alterations. (Hear, hear.) Incidentally, therefore, this question had become a budget question, but it would have to be considered in conjunction with many others which had not yet been alluded to—considered with the utmost care and deliberation. All he, (Mr. Labouchere), hoped was, that, having arrived at a great crisis, speaking not only financially, but commercially, the house would show an intention of acting in the right direction. Some honorable gentleman had alluded to the report of the import duties committee, and seemed to suppose that some great man, who had been put in motion to spread that report throughout the country. He knew that the feeling was on the subject throughout the country. There never had been a more intense, a more general feeling, although the feeling had not been in the form of any popular declamation. He could assure the house, and he appealed for corroboration to those honorable gentlemen opposite who were connected with the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country, that the meetings which had taken place in the autumn of last year, and which had character, but had consisted of men of all shades in politics, who had merged all their differences in anxiety for the general good. (Hear, hear, hear.) Was it to be supposed for a moment that the merchants and manufacturers of England were so ignorant men as to propose a great and important change merely on the report of a committee of the house of commons? It was not the opinions of the witnesses, but the statements and the figures they gave, which formed the great basis of the effect. (Cheers from Lord Stoddard.) His noble friend opposite charged. He (Mr. Labouchere) thought that many statements in the report were wild and exaggerated, but many of them, he must also say, were exceedingly valuable. He would remind the house of a petition which had been presented—a petition which, from the signatures which were attached to it, deserved the serious consideration of the house. As it was exceedingly short, he would draw the attention of the house to its contents. The petitioners stated that the present tariff was a great injury to our commerce, and pressed heavily on the consumer while giving an undue protection to our colonies, and they concluded by praying for a revision of those duties. That was a rational petition, and he hoped that the measures which were proposed, they would see that, since the petition which was presented by the present Lord Ashburton at the time Mr. Huskisson introduced his great commercial measure, no petition had been presented representing a portion of the mercantile community, and the intelligence of the city of London. To state that the excitement on this question had nothing in it of a party character, he had only to mention the first name attached to the petition, that of Mr. Horsey Flower, a gentleman who, without remarkable intelligence and station, was totally opposed to the present government. (Hear, hear.) The name of that gentleman was followed by those of some of the leading firms of the city of London, a fact which clearly proved that the agitation had not been brought about by speculation or by any such influence as was suggested by the report of the committee. In reality, the feeling had been excited by a sense of suffering, by the evil effects which the present protective system was producing on our commercial relations with the foreign countries. A petition was presented that the time was come when some important change was absolutely necessary. With regard to the manufacturing interests, he could only say that he had received deputations from Lancashire, composed of men of all parties, and he had never seen a stronger feeling displayed than that which animated those gentlemen. He hoped that the house, in considering these questions, would not leave out of view the points which had been alluded to by his right honorable friend, the chancellor of the exchequer, namely, the condition in which we stood in reference to the two countries which were the great consumers of our manufactures—the U. States and Brazil. The U. States were our best customers, and next them Brazil; indeed, in the article of manufactured cotton, the latter was our best consumer. With regard to the U. States, the question stood thus: There would be a special meeting of congress at the end of the ensuing month, for the consideration of commercial affairs. The Americans were in the same state as ourselves with regard to revenue, and at this congress there would no doubt be a struggle as to whether the deficiency should be supplied by additional duties laid on foreign manufactures, or in a way similar to that which his right honorable friend had proposed. Mr. Clay's act would then have expired, so that the congress would be completely free to consider the propriety of remodelling the tariff, and he had no doubt that their proceedings would be greatly influenced by the steps which might be taken by this country. It was notorious also that our commercial treaty with the United States was about to expire, and that the great dissatisfaction existed at our pursuing a system which prevented our receiving, in return for our manufactures, the only produce which the Brazilians had to offer. He had no doubt that, if the present system was continued, we must make up our minds to lose a trade valuable at present, but which, under a proper system, would soon become much more extended, in consequence of the new channels which steam was opening to us in the interior of the country. (Hear, hear.) The right honorable member for Tamworth had twitted him with the opinion he had expressed on the motion of his honorable friend the member for Wigan last year. He was prepared to repeat what he had then said, that this was a subject which he had not been in the habit of doing, and then carefully considered the subject in all its bearings, with reference to the interests of our colonies and our trade in general, and he had come to the conclusion that the best way to protect our colonies would be to give them, not a monopoly, but a free trade. The colonies and consumers of this country, would not promote their interests, but a moderate and reasonable amount of protection. He believed that such an amount of protection was better than a monopoly, inasmuch as it would give our colonies a free trade; whereas monopoly would stimulate excessive production; and glut, highly destructive to commerce, would be the consequence. It has been said that this question should not be discussed as a party question. In that question he heartily concurred. And he knew that, whatever might be the feeling within the walls of that house, out of doors it would be considered also as a party, but a national question. (Hear.) He hoped that in subsequent discussions there would not be any of that acrimony which had that evening been unnecessarily introduced, as if the measures had been introduced for a mere party purpose. As a party measure it was not likely to be advantageous—indeed, he had never seen any party reap much advantage by interfering in a question of this kind. He could assure them that, although a warm partisan, so deep was his sense of the importance of this question, that he would rejoice if the honorable gentlemen opposite were to introduce it, in which case he would have his earnest thanks to offer. (Hear, hear.) London, May 1841. The duke of Devonshire, on a petition having been presented from the India merchants, against the recent proceedings in the shape of a settlement of Chinese affairs, stated that the failure of the expedition appeared to have been occasioned by the want of proper instructions to explain the condition and condition of the British armament in the Chinese seas. Lord Melbourne declared that no official accounts has been received by the government.

The two brothers Wallace, who were sentenced to transportation for life, for having cast away the Dryad, the purpose of which was to destroy the insurance companies, have made a full confession. They admit having been connected with the wilful loss of four other vessels, and implicated one of the most respectable and wealthy merchants and shipowners in Liverpool in the same business.

The fitting up of the royal nursery cost £4,000. When will the people open their eyes to such folly and wanton extravagance?

NATIONAL INSTITUTION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SCIENCE. The National Intelligencer says: This new institution is advancing rapidly in its sphere of usefulness for the diffusion of knowledge. It has recently been removed to the commodious apartments of the basement of the new patent office building, where it can better accommodate the immense collections received from the exploring expeditions. Already it has received one hundred and fifty large boxes and packages, containing, among a great variety of other specimens in natural history, about eighteen hundred birds, many of which are rare and beautiful. They are now undergoing a preparation for exhibition in the hands of a very superior artist, Mr. Townsend, from Philadelphia. Another shipment of twenty tons from the same squadron has arrived at New York; and it is understood another one may be expected in the course of the summer.

A very handsome donation has been received from Dr. George C. Leeb, of Philadelphia, of three hundred specimens of North American birds.

A liberal patronage is also received from numerous other sources, by the donation of a variety of valuable articles.

EXPEDITION FOR LIBERIA. New Orleans, May 14. The bark Union sailed for Monrovia, on the 13th inst. having on board forty-two emigrants sent out by the American Colonization society. They are good, honest, industrious and intelligent persons, well provided with farming utensils, household and kitchen furniture, school-books, and other articles necessary for their comfort and usefulness.

The bark had on board several thousand dollars worth of goods, &c. sent out for the use of the colony.

The Union goes in the service of a large commercial house of this city, with a large cargo on board, for the purpose of trading with the natives; our fellow-citizen Joseph G. Walton, esq. goes out as purser.

This is a new era in the commerce of this city. The trade of the western coast of Africa is immensely important, and we are glad to see our enterprising citizens engaging in it. We hope the day is not far distant when many such expeditions will leave our city.

THE ARMY.

Major general Seth B. Bankhead arrived here in the steambot from Richmond yesterday afternoon, and we learn that major general Macomb, commander-in-chief of the army, is expected this morning by the steambot from Baltimore. The object of the visit of these distinguished officers, it is understood, is to inspect the military works at Fort Monroe and the Rip Raps.

[Norfolk Herald, May 20.]

General Wool, of the U. S. army, is now on a tour of inspection of the fortifications of the United States.

Married. At Brownville, N. Y. on the 19th inst. by the rev. F. Rogers, lieut. Larkin Smith, U. S. army, to Miss Catharine Storow, daughter of the late major general Jacob Breen.

St. Augustine, May 28. The steamer Wm. Gaston, captain Griffin, arrived here on Saturday last from southern ports. We learn by this arrival that Wild Cat, (Cocochee) had been in at Fort Pierce (Indian river) with fifteen warriors and went again on the morning of the 25th inst. He was, as usual, very insulting to the officers, and demanded of them powder and lead, and other things which was refused. He acted in his usual pompous manner, as though he did not care for any of them.

Several Indian signs have been seen at New Smyrna recently.

We regret to learn that lieut. Shubrick, U. S. navy, accidentally shot away a part of his face while on a scout in the everglades, a short time since.

Florida, May 15. Dear sir: On the 26th ult. about 26 miles from Tampa Bay, the mail rider and horse were killed. A friendly Indian gave the news at Tampa soon after the deed was done. The commanding general ordered out a command of dragoons, under captain B. Beall, and dragoons, who as soon as possible, proceeded to the place of the murder, buried the express rider, and pursued on the track made by the murderer. After several hours pursuit, he came upon a camp regularly fixed and comfortably situated, occupied by one Indian, who was leisurely opening the mail and burning the letters. Captain Beall shot him in his occupation, but saved but one entire letter of the mail. This Indian proved to be Maxey Hadjo, of famous memory in these parts. Captain Beall was complimented in orders for his long and arduous pursuit after this savage murderer, and for bringing him to condign punishment.

May 17. Dear sir: I am happy to announce a second shipment of Indians, which took place at Tampa on the 7th inst. Two hundred embarked for New Orleans, under charge of capt. McKavett, 3th infantry. Alluek Tust-nuggee has sent in 19 warriors to consult with the general.

[Savannah Georgian.]

Later. Letters of the 18th and 19th May, confirm the foregoing account. Amongst the two hundred and twenty Indians shipped from Tampa on the 7th was the heretofore inveterate and troublesome chief, Cusaa Tust-nuggee. Hitherto he has resisted every effort to bring him to terms, and not until the Arkansas delegation had an interview with him, did he feel inclined to hold any intercourse with the whites; now he is on his winding way to Arkansas, whither most of his band have preceded him.

Alluek Tust-nuggee, the gentleman so handsomely welcomed by the general, Alluek last winter, has, in view of that dripping, concluded to emigrate. A delegation from his majesty has reached the general, and announced that he will soon be in at Tampa to treat. Cocochee (Wild Cat) has been at Fort Pierce with twenty-four of his band. They obtained provisions and promised to go in soon at Tampa.

Col. Worth has left for the Carolanahatchie with one hundred picked men. His object is to secure Hovatska.

Many of the troops in the territory are now suffering severely from illness. The 1st infantry have removed to Cedar Keys for their health. Two hundred and fifty of their number are now sick with fever. One hundred of the 7th at Mowick are also sick with fever. Seventy of the 24 are sick in hospital at Fort King, also with fever. Forts Russell and Holmes continue very healthy.

THE NAVY.

The U. S. brig Dolphin, arrived at New York on the 23th inst. from the coast of Africa. List of her officers: Commander, Chas. H. Bell; lieut. James H. Ward and Timothy A. Hunt; purser, Douglas Gibson; assistant surgeon, R. W. Levee; passed midshipmen, Maxwell Woodall, Midshipmen, Jas. Barry, Peter Wager, Augustus McLaughlin; master's mate, Adam Young; captain's clerk, Thomas N. Meeker; purser's steward, John B. Fulkington.

Captain Conner and lieutenant Tracy, of the United States revenue cutter Vigilant, on the Rhode Island station, have been dismissed from their situation. The Vigilant, under the command of these officers, was somewhat conspicuous during the late political contest.

The U. S. ship Boston, arrived at Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, on the 10th of March—officers and crew all well.

Extensive desertion. Thirty-four of the seamen belonging to the Brandywine have deserted while she has been in port. A reward of $25 each is offered for their apprehension.

The U. S. ship of war Preble, from Malta, bound W. was passed, 5th ult. off Cape de Galt, by the Mordao, at Boston.

The U. S. brig Porpoise, capt. Ringgold, was at Tampa Jan. 26, to sail on an cruise that day intended to visit the Society Islands. The P. has now been from home about two years and a half, has discovered some new islands, and visited many of Fejee and other islands never before explored. The officers and crew were very well at the above date, and wished to be reported.

[Hatch's New Bedford Express.]

The court of inquiry at Brooklyn, instituted to ascertain the truth or falsity of certain anonymous charges against com. Jas. Renshaw, convened on Monday at the navy yard, Brooklyn—com. James Biddle, president; com. Geo. C. Read, esq. David Comer, members; Phil. Hamilton, esq. judge advocate. The preliminary steps only were taken, and commander H. Paulding has been, at his own request, relieved from his duties as commander of the navy yard, Brooklyn, and commander Joshua N. Gaus ordered in his stead.

STATES OF THE UNION.

RHODE ISLAND.

Showing proper resentment. At the last session of the general assembly in this state, a bill was passed exempting the property of negroes from taxation, on the ground that they were debared from participation in social and political privileges. The exemption gave offence to some of our able citizens, who have accordingly got up a petition that the law be repealed, and that taxes be imposed upon them in the same way as upon white people. They say that if they are taxed, they have claims upon the general assembly which they cannot otherwise urge. We question, says the Providence Journal, if history will furnish another example of a body of men reconstituting against being exempted from taxation.

VIRGINIA.

Elections. We find in the Winchester Republican, prepared to our hand, a correct statement of the result of the recent elections in this state. The names in italics are Van Buren. Those designated thus * are gains.

Congress.

First district,	Francis Mallory,
Second district,	G. B. Cary,
Third district,	J. W. Jones,
Fourth district,	W. O. Goode,
Fifth district,	E. J. Hubbard,*
Sixth district,	W. Cotes,
Seventh district,	Wm. L. Groggin,
Eighth district,	Henry A. Wise,
Ninth district,	R. M. T. Hunter,
Tenth district,	John Taliaferro,
Eleventh district,	E. J. Harris,
Twelfth district,	T. W. Gilmer,
Thirteenth district,	Linn Banks,
Fourteenth district,	Cuthbert Powell,

Seventeenth district,	A. H. H. Stuart,*
Eighteenth district,	G. W. Hopkins,
Nineteenth district,	G. W. Summers,*
Twentieth district,	H. L. Heya,
Twenty first district,	Leah Steward,*

In the ninth district there were three candidates; Mr. Corbin, a wing; Mr. Braxton, Van Buren; and Mr. Hunter, who is termed an "abstractionist," and does not profess to belong to either party. Exclusive of Mr. Hunter, the delegation from this state in congress will be equally divided; in the last congress the whigs had eight members, and the Van Buren party twelve. Nett whig gain, two members.

State senate.

Berkley district,	C. J. Faulkner,

Administration 68—Opposition 66.

The foregoing is made up from the best information in our possession, and it is believed to be correct. The whole loss and gain are as follows:

Whig gain.	Whig loss.
Stafford	1 Frederick
Fairfax	1 Caroline
Southampton	1 Petersburg
Minorce	1 Powhatan
Bath	1 Buckingham
Montgomery, &c.	1 Nelson
Giles and Mercer	1 Prince Edward
Jackson and Mason	1 Marshall
Cabell	1 Tyler
One senator	1 Accomac
	1 Wythe

The whigs have, therefore, carried both branches of the legislature, and one-half of the congressional delegation.

ARKANSAS.

Census statistics. We are enabled to furnish our readers with an abstract of the official census of the state of Arkansas in the following tables.

1 No return.

rule, but be so adjusted as to aid our industry against foreign competition. We cannot yield to the doctrines of free trade, for the obvious reason that such a trade does not exist, and will not be reciprocated to us. Among advanced nations, it has hitherto existed; and if we may judge from the past or present state of the world, we cannot anticipate it for the future. However beautiful in theory, such is the diversity in the natural and superinduced condition of the chief nations of the world, that free trade would be found impracticable, and I am fully convinced it will never be in England and France, with whom we have the most of our commerce, will never consent to open a new, and hitherto unpractised trade with the U. States. Their restrictive policy is unchangeably established, and whether wise or unwise, liberal or illiberal, it enters so deeply into their political relations, into the very texture of their domestic and foreign interests, that we may not expect such a radical change in their commerce and system of taxation. If England would open even her colonial ports to a free trade, we should find more reason to distrust her policy, and hope for more free commercial relations, but we are not to be deterred by all reciprocity whatever; our grain, tobacco, and other products, if admitted at all into any of her ports, being burdened with enormous and ruinous duties. So long as England and France continue to lay such contributions annually for their wares, their silks, and other manufactured goods, we must protect ourselves by counter exacts, or forego our manufactures, never again to be revived. It is wise for a nation of eighteen millions of people, to shut up their own workshops and manufactories, and even open a new door to year a national debt, the inevitable consequence of large importations; and by rendering the market unsteady, or by opening it to the fluctuations incident to the trade of Europe, suffer our own establishments to be broken up, and an enormous depression of labor. Our products multiplied, as they must be, if agricultural pursuits become universal, will perish without a market, or sell at prices greatly reduced. The interest of the farmer and southern planter, are most certainly promoted by extending manufactures to diversify and diversify labor, and create a certain and convenient market. I am not an advocate for a tariff beyond the wants of the government; but let its necessary revenues be raised by a system of duties so adjusted, as to protect the industry of our citizens.

I entertain great confidence that such a tariff was the established and steady policy of the country, not to be broken in upon by any change of men or measures; and together with it we possessed the currency which we enjoyed for forty years, and which the trading intercourse of states, now fatally sundered, the gloom which has so long attended upon us would be dispelled, and hope and confidence, and courage shed a cheerful light over many an anxious and desponding heart. I express the exact character of a tariff, all arguments that a tax on consumption, or in other words, duties on imported goods, collected by government officers at the custom house, is the best and least expensive method of raising a national revenue. Whether these duties shall be laid by a uniform rate, or apportioned so as to avoid a harmful competition from the surplus capital and super labor of Europe, is the question to be decided. The compromise act, so called, passed in the year 1832, virtually gives up the principle of discrimination. Distinguishing statements in the south, who profess to break the compromise act, and to be free traders (how correctly I cannot say), assert that a discriminating tariff, with special reference to domestic industry, is independent and unconstitutional; that it will destroy the peculiar rights and interests of the southern planter, and is contrary to the very spirit of the constitution. Now I have sought in vain for any such limitation of the benefits of a tariff; and I am confident that the provisions of the constitution are broad enough and clear enough to sustain the advocate of American industry. In regulating commerce as in exercising other powers of the constitution, congress is obliged to seek after the greatest good, and surely it ought not to seek after or be satisfied with the attainment of any thing less. The advocate of the planting interests profess to believe that unrestricted trade with England and France would increase the demand for the produce of the price of southern cotton in Europe. He therefore pleads for the removal of every obstruction to commerce, and for the greatest encouragement of importations. He is not satisfied with free exchange which he now enjoys, but he would open his ports to the free import of all foreign goods. If it is his theory to manufacture little and import much, I am convinced this class of politicians are combating commercial impediments which have no existence but in imagination; and that their boasted theory in favor of free importations is intrinsically insensical principles. Neither experience nor reason will establish the fact, that southern cotton will not sell in Europe if our importations are lessened, and greatly lessened nor that the encouragement of a domestic market for cotton will not counterbalance the loss, there would be a loss, resulting from a diminution of foreign commerce. It is quite certain that hitherto the amount of cotton exported and of merchandise imported has not always corresponded in amount; and hence the theory against which we contend is tellacious and productive of injury. It is incorrect, in fact, only, which I judge England and France to purchase our cotton. Is it from any affection for us—do they not find this article to be for them the most profitable within their reach; and when either of them can procure a better from any other quarter, and especially from their own possession in the east, for which England is now putting forth the strenuous and unexampled efforts, will their ports be any longer open to our cotton, or will not this trade be brought within the exclusive policy which distinguishes all their laws of trade and manufactures? I have no doubt, that every American, whether he be a farmer, planter or manufacturer, is interested in extending the domestic market for cotton—a market which the American can forever and fully secure to himself, and which, until of late, has been regularly and increasingly increasing. The southern politician is mistaken in the cardinal principle of his theory, "that duty on imports is a duty on exports." It is a tax chiefly on consumption; to some extent on foreign capital and labor. If indeed it be true, that a duty on imports is a tax on exports, then every article of cotton affected by the tariff, and not the southern planter. The south in proportion to its population, consumes less, very much less, than the north, or the states of free labor, both on account of climate, and the character of their laboring population. Besides, it is nothing to offer employment to our countrymen, to render them comfortable and happy, and provide the means by which they may educate and establish their families! Is it nothing to secure to labor its just value, and ready markets to agricultural products, and to carry on the honest and industrious of a foreign debt, the millions paid to France for her silks, and to England for her numerous manufactures! This country abounds in the raw material used in the manufacture of many of the articles imported, and with proper attention these materials can be turned into goods, and rendered adequate to the supply of our wants. Why now send them abroad to be wrought? We have capital enough, water power enough, hands waiting to be employed; and in a brief period, might become to a great extent independent of foreign goods and shops. I ask it, therefore, is not important to make the most of our resources, to re-animate once more our manufacturing villages, and embellish this glorious land with countless flourishing and smiling hamlets, where content and plenty shall dwell securely? The policy advocated by certain southern politicians, if followed out in its consequences, would not merely impoverish the country—it would make us vassals of foreign capitalists, and wither the dearest interest of New England.

When the compromise act, so called, was passed, I was respected the gentlemen from the planting states asserted, on the floor of congress, that in 1832, when the act would take full effect, we should see that the planting states had been paying well nigh the whole of the national revenue, as they said, in the article of cotton. The compromise act, however, has nearly expired, but the discovery has not been made, while in the mean time both the north and the south have been greatly impoverished.

The policy of a protective tariff is so much affected by the growing out of another interest, that I trust I shall not be accused of asperity towards the south, or of officious interference in their concerns, by expressing the opinion that free labor throughout the nation, and especially the manufacturing portion of it, are interested in the removal of all powerful influences of slavery. But that I may not be misapprehended, let me observe that, in the government, we should not depart from the constitution of the United States, the supreme political law of the land, which we have sworn to obey, this day, to observe and maintain. I would give to this bond of our glorious union a hearty and vigorous support, in its several provisions, as the wisest and best compact which could at the time, or could now, be obtained. But I feel no obligation to protect at all beyond the limits of the former or perpetuate a system of slavery. I would in this matter observe good faith towards sister states, because I hold faith between states as inviolable as between man and man; while beyond this concessions to slavery will not readily be made by those who look on it as a great wrong, and a ruinous institution. I have said the laborers affected generally by slavery. This is produced chiefly by the national policy and public measures to which it gives rise. It may be observed further, that few improvements by means of machinery and water power can be introduced into the regions where free finds its chief employment in raising cotton, tobacco and sugar; nor in time to come can slave labor derive much aid from those inventions which give immense facilities to free labor, and multiply its power beyond computation. Of the character and wants of free labor, and especially the policy which fosters manufactures, navigation and the fisheries, the planter has necessarily little knowledge, and with its peculiarities, little sympathy. Of this however, we do not complain. Perhaps our views are erroneous. We wish only to say, that where slave bears upon general interests, as in national affairs, we may with propriety speak of its tendency, and firmly maintain our rights against its power.

A national currency. I cannot pass from a subject so vital to our constituents as the protection of our industry, without expressing my regret that on this and the kindred subject of a national currency, nothing is settled in the government. One alarming disease of the country is its vacillation in public opinion, and especially in the policy of the policy of one year or one administration before the policy of the next. It is certainly true, after the experience of half a century, to discover where our true interests lie, and to pursue them by some established land marks in legislation, that labor and capital may be preserved in peace and order. If hitherto the country has been deluded and unwisely governed, if we have for so long a period been pursuing false theories, let us carefully search out the true path, and when it is found, persevere in it with free government. We must, however, take care that in our efforts to preserve liberty, we do not hazard every thing which makes liberty worth possessing; that in our ardor for equality and simplicity in social life, we do not permit the great ends of our political being to be broken up. It is believed in our country, that the policy of the present and past administrations has been to be too deeply imbued with popular sentiment, to be uniform and fixed in their policy; but, fellow citizens, the experiment is in progress, and we cannot but look to the final result with deep solicitude. I believe the policy of the present administration is to be too deeply imbued with popular sentiment, to be uniform and fixed in their policy; but, fellow citizens, the experiment is in progress, and we cannot but look to the final result with deep solicitude. Resolutions of states. It will be seen by the resolutions to be laid before you, which I have received from the governors of Indiana, Vermont, Kentucky and Delaware, those states are in favor of amending the constitution of the United States, so that no person shall be eligible to the office of president. These resolutions, I doubt not, will have your careful attention. Should they not lead to the altar of union proposed, we may anticipate the influence of the patriotic declaration made by the late president, that he should not be a slaveholder. We do most heartily desire that the precedent may become an example.

In addition to the foregoing resolutions, others on various subjects have been received from several of the states, which will be transmitted to you on an early day.

Affairs of the state. In surveying the affairs of the state, I perceive but few subjects which demand your particular attention. Our territory is small; our laws not institutions few, uniform and without complexity. The concerns and interests of the state are for the most part well understood by the representatives of the people. We resemble an industrious, economical and well regulated family, presenting a republic which secures more good, and avoids more evil, than any other form of political organization. propriety of his public acts. Since the performance in his part of the act which rendered necessary in my judgment for you to assemble here, that distinguished individual has been suddenly cut off by the hand of Providence from all participation in the affairs of men, and has ceased to be numbered among the living. And for one, I never may have been my objections to his election, and they were strong, sincere, uncompromising and decided on principle, I am perfectly disposed to spread the veil which covers human imperfection, on all his acts, without presuming to say that he had more than fall to the lot of other men; to do him the justice to suppose that in his official acts he was governed by a patriotic sense of public duty; and to remember his virtues only. But while I cheerfully accord to a distinguished and departed citizen, of honesty of purpose, and a lofty attachment to principles which he no doubt believed to be correct, I should be unmindful of truth and forgetful of all the principles, upon the sacred observance of which I believe our happiness and dearest interests, do not distinctly aver that in political sentiment so far as his public acts, I differ with him, and most of those by whom he was elected, in almost every essential particular. And perhaps, after all, an honest difference of opinion, candidly expressed, and confined within the limits of prudence, moderation and patriotism, affords the best guarantee for the continued preservation of our liberties and happiness.

It is impossible to recur to the signal disposition of an all powerful Providence, the death of the president of the United States, without being forcibly reminded of the extreme uncertainty of all the affairs of this fleeting and transitory life, and with the littleness and exceeding vanity of human ambition; and without being deeply impressed with the momentous weight of the awful and inextinguishable truth, that success in the accomplishment of the highest objects of earthly gratification, is but another step to that eternal and unchangeable state, to which magnitudes and people are alike hastening; and where no distinctions are recognized but those that flow from excellence and virtue. What is to be the effect of this unexpected event upon the administration of the affairs, and the general policy of the government? The public interest, for the remainder of the period for which General Harrison was elected, time, the great offender of events, can only determine.

The vice president, chief, will of course, according to the constitution, provide for the discharge of the duties, succeed to the powers and duties of the president of the United States for the term of four years from the fourth of March last.

From a general view of the present condition of the various departments of the public interest, I am not aware that any thing will importantly require the attention of the legislature, except the subject which brought you together.

In your high public character, however, as representatives of the people, it will be entirely competent for you to embrace within the sphere of your deliberations any subject which, in your judgment, the public interest may require. But from the very short time which has elapsed since your last adjournment, and considering the busy and interesting season of the year at which it becomes necessary to call you from your families and accustomed occupations; and especially, taking into view the important consideration of public economy with a just sense of which I have no doubt you will be fully impressed, to entertain the expectation that your interest as citizens, and your duty as representatives, will alike indicate the necessity of prompt attention to the important subject which rendered it necessary for you to assemble, and of a speedy return to the bosom of your families.

UNITED STATES BANK.

ANOTHER REPORT FROM THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

An adjourned meeting of the stockholders of the United States Bank was held at Philadelphia, on Tuesday the 18th instant. After organization, the minutes of the former meetings were read and confirmed. Mr. Lippincott, the chairman of the investigating committee then handed the following report—

The committee appointed at an adjourned meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, held on the 2d April last, in pursuance of a resolution adopted at an adjourned meeting held on the 4th May instant, to take into consideration the condition and prospects of the bank, and also any laws passed by the general assembly of Pennsylvania, tending to interfere with or restrain such measures as the committee might deem expedient, respectfully report:

That on the 30th of April last, an act of the general assembly of Pennsylvania was passed, entitled "an act to provide revenue to meet the demands of the treasury, and for other purposes," which presents two distinct propositions for consideration:

The first proposition is under the seventeenth section, which contemplates the continued existence of the bank, and provides for its relief from the penalty of 12 per cent. and from the forfeiture of its charter for the non-payment of its circulation and deposits in gold and silver on demand, upon the condition that the stockholders shall consent to be subject to any general laws hereafter to be passed for the regulation of the banks of the commonwealth.

After taking into consideration the condition and prospects of the bank, which requires time only to render its ample measure available, the committee do not hesitate to recommend the adoption of the first proposition. They, therefore, respectfully report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 17th section of an act of the general assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, passed at the last session of the general assembly, entitled "an act to provide revenue to meet the demands of the treasury, and for other purposes," is it provided, that being the bank of the United States, shall be subject to the benefit of the said section, the stockholders of the said bank shall, by a resolution adopted at any general or adjourned meeting held in pursuance of the charter, and duly certified by the governor under their corporate seal, to the effect, to consent to be subject to any laws hereafter passed for the regulation of the banks of the commonwealth; and

Whereas, It is deemed expedient by the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, duly convened at an adjourned meeting held in pursuance of the charter, to avail themselves of the said 17th section; therefore

Be it resolved, And it is hereby resolved by the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, convened at an adjourned meeting held in pursuance of the charter, That, for the purpose of obtaining the benefits of the 17th section of the act of the general assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, entitled "an act to provide revenue to meet the demands of the treasury, and for other purposes," passed at the last session of the general assembly, the said stockholders do hereby consent to be subject to any general laws to be hereafter passed by the general assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for the regulation of the banks of the commonwealth, and that the president of the bank be, and he is hereby authorized and requested to make this resolution known to the governor of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, according to the provision of the said section.

JOSHUA LIPPINCOTT, chairman.

Bank of the United States, May 18, 1841.

In reply to a question asked, as to the condition of the bank, Mr. Bayard read the following statement, which was handed to him by the president, Colonel Drayton.

Relative position of the assets and liabilities of the bank, May 17, 1841. The liabilities of the bank, for post notes issued to the other city banks, amounting in $5,078,444—were secured by an assignment of assets amounting to $7,772,226. The liabilities of the bank in Europe, were $153,869,282—secured by deposits of assets, amounting to $24,718,715.

It was further proposed to ascertain other liabilities of the bank, for circulation, deposits and balances due to other banks amounting to $5,449,925, by a special pledge of assets amounting to $1,921,839. These arrangements would leave the amount of $1,787,436 in assets unpledged; and of liabilities, $3,224,588.

Joshua Randall, esq. then called up for consideration the following resolution, which was adopted, with little or no opposition, as follows:

Resolved, That the board be directed to give public notice of the agreement to the condition and laws of the commonwealth, of an intended application to the next legislature, to alter the name and reduce the capital of the bank, together with such other alterations as may be deemed expedient.

Mr. Drayton, the president of the bank, then, in reply to some remarks from Mr. Finch, made reference to the state of the institution, remarking that it was a subject definitely referred to a committee, who were actively engaged in the duties devolved upon them. He said that the directors of the bank had found it difficult to carry into effect a resolution of the stockholders, authorizing an assignment in favor of holders and depositors, as trustees could not be found to labor without compensation, which had not been provided for by the directors.

After some explanation, Mr. Randall offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the board of directors be, and they are hereby authorized to exercise their own discretion as to the expediency, as well as to the time and manner of carrying into effect the resolution adopted at the last meeting, for pledging certain assets in trust for the payment of the circulation of, and deposits in, the bank.

Mr. Lippincott, chairman of the committee of investigation, then handed in a report of the committee, which was read. The following is a copy of the document:

To the stockholders of the Bank of the U. States.
It is with considerable reluctance that the members of the committee of investigation, appointed at the meeting of the 4th of January last, request the attention of the stockholders to a few remarks on certain statements made by Mr. Nicholas Biddle, in his letters to "the hon. John M. Clayton," lately published in the newspapers.

In submitting their report, they performed a duty which was to them as unexpected as painful; yet having assumed the responsibility upon them, it is a duty from which they could not shrink. Information of the causes which had occasioned the prostration of a bank of so large a capital, and which had been declared by its president, but two years before, to be a safe and sound property, was demanded by the almost unanimous voice of those who had been heretofore due to the stockholders, due to the community, and due to the character of the members of the committee themselves, that the answer should be an honest and candid statement upon them. It is a style of a simple narrative of facts, which had occurred in its history since it became a state institution. To all who could think and calculate, these facts were amply sufficient to account for its actual situation. If the inference fairly deduced from them is unfavorable to any of those who had been heretofore entrusted with its management, it was for them to exculpate themselves before the stockholders or the public. The committee were not a judicial tribunal, and it was not their province to arraign at their bar the officers and directors as persons interested. They therefore confined their examination to the banks, and when explanation on any particular subject was needed, sought for it from those who were supposed to be able to furnish it.

A candid and honest statement of the measures and policy of his administration was certainly to be expected from the former president, and had his publications been limited to this, the committee would have remained silent. But a personal attack having been made upon them, and upon the community, they were compelled, and some of the facts presented in their report having been formerly denied to be true, some notice of charges grave as these seems absolutely necessary.

It will be remembered that the committee were appointed not only to verify, but to examine the details of the report of the directors of December 21, 1840. We did proceed both to verify and examine those details. We succeeded that we had an undoubted right to inquire how the immense mass of stocks on hand had come into the possession of the bank; an inquiry which at once conducted us back to the authority originally granted to the exchange committee, to the loans and settlements which had been made, and with officers, to the cotton operations, and to the causes which had produced the prostration of so large and valuable a part of these securities for debts abroad. No doubt was entertained that the stockholders intended such an examination to be made, and the public expectation in regard to the forthcoming report showed that the community in general looked for something more than a mere verification of the assets. The committee were further confirmed in these views by the resolution of the board of directors, inviting them to investigate the affairs and transactions of the bank, and "the causes of its actual situation," and "expressing the wish that such an investigation should be made, in order that the results might be laid before the meeting of the stockholders of April following." It is probable that this resolution is to be attributed to the "alarm and confusion" which followed the last suspension, and was meant by the directors as an appeal to the committee for the purpose of relieving themselves by throwing the blame upon the directors.

Whether this was or not, it is enough at present explicitly to deny that it was received with any understanding such as that referred to. Nor is it necessary to add after what has already been said, that it is not the province of the committee to determine whether the committee had before determined to pursue. If no such resolution had been passed, a full and thorough examination of the affairs and transactions of the bank would have been attempted; and if access to the books and papers for the purpose had been refused, the fact would have been reported to the stockholders, and they would have been left to adopt such measures as they might have deemed proper under the circumstances.

It has also been asserted that the investigation was "a conspiracy got up by the managers of the Schuykill Navigation company aided by a few weak persons who did not see that they were the dupes of their selfish associates," and that the report was "the vengeance of the Schuykill Navigation company against the Bank of the U. States for lending money to the Reading rail road." The stockholders have already been informed that four of the six members of which the committee was composed did not, and do not, own a single share of Schuykill Navigation stock or loan, nor have they interest of a single dollar in that improvement.

As additional evidence it would seem, of these assertions, it is stated that Mr. Layton, the chairman of the committee, was the owner of only five shares of stock in the bank, and Mr. Murphy of but two. The important fact, which the very books from which this information was obtained would have furnished, is not noticed, that the remaining members were the proprietors together of five hundred and fifty-five shares, which the whole board of twenty directors, elected in January last, (in which election, it is understood Mr. Biddle had a considerable agency) owned in all but one share and fifty-four shares. Now ought Mr. Biddle to have been so incensed, by advertising to this subject, as to invite the remark that Mr. Massey's interest of two shares was just double his own.

Much pains have been taken to inspire the belief, that the labors of the committee have been, or are likely to be, injurious to the interests of the stockholders. Now the facts are, that the stock of the bank had fallen upon the publication of the statement of December 21st, 1840, from 61 to 59, and upon the suspension of February last, to 16, and the notes to a premium of 16 per cent. Whether the losses of the stockholders are to be ascribed to the policy and measures which caused prostration, as the committee thought, or to the occurrences which made that prostration known to the world, as Mr. Biddle contends—in either case, the mischief had all been done before the committee made their report.

But it was evidently one of their leading objects to re-assure the stockholders, by attempting to present them with a fair and honest picture of the present and probable future of the bank, and to carry down the worth of their assets in better times, and under more favorable circumstances, and thus encourage them to hold on to their stock. This was a prominent feature of the report, utterly inconsistent with any intention to break down the bank, or carry down the Reading rail road, and thus increase the profits of the (Schuykill Navigation) company.

A single observation may here be appropriately made on the subject of the condition in which Mr. Biddle left the bank. The reports of the directors and committees, and the published resolutions and statements of the directors have been referred to, and much relied on by him. The readers of the report may be safely left to examine pages 41 and 54 of the appendix, and form a judgment on this question for themselves.

It will be there seen that the stock account in April, 1839, amounted to $17,657,745 42
Stock remittances to Europa 2,170,349 88
Special loan to the commonwealth 671,900 00
And the following:
The bank having not entered, but for agreements entered into previous to April 1, 1839:
Bonds of Planters' bank, $656,000 00
Mississippi 5 per cts. 2,000,000 00
Michigan 6 per cts. 2,154,687 00

$24,830,942 80
To this may, with great propriety, be added the following items in the account of April 1, 1839, as being essentially of the same nature with the foregoing:
Bills discounted on other than pre-sonal security, $15,814,500 44
Real estate, 952,046 93
Banking houses, 427,761 93
Bonds and mortgages, 313,627 13
$20,638,336 49

So disproportionate an investment of assets in such securities would render any bank essentially unsafe and unsound; and looking at the fluctuating character of the stock market, make it highly problematical whether an institution thus circumstanced would not be obliged to succumb to the first commercial revolution that might occur.

It cannot be denied that this course of policy crippled the bank, and compelled her to sue for money in Europe; and can it be satisfactorily explained, if Mr. Biddle left her prostrated on the 29th March, 1839, how it happened that not quite five months after, and before any of those occurrences to which the prostration is now ascribed, before the "protest by Messrs. Hoffington & Co." before "the sales of post notes in the fall of 1839," before "the publication of the first of January," before "the resumption," and before "the third suspension." On the 22d of August, 1839, Mr. John Massey Massey's name and Biddle's for $50,000, and trills them, "life or death to the Bank of the United States is the issue."

We proceed now to a brief review of those points in regard to which the accuracy of the facts presented in the report have been called in question.

1. As to Mr. Biddle's own account.
The first item of that account at p. 51 of the pamphlet is as follows:

"Jan. 30, 1840. His note due Feb. 2, 1842, with interest, being for 700 shares of Reading rail road stock, purchased of the bank by his agent."

Jan. 3, 1839, $31,500 00
Mr. Biddle affirms that it was not until December, 1839, long after he had left the bank, that he bought this stock of a stock broker.

The journal entry of the suspended debt department in relation to this item is as follows:

Feb. 3, 1841. Nicholas Biddle, to bills discounted suspended, for amount due from N. Biddle, according to the following statement, with interest, from Jan. 30, 1840, $31,500 00
"Sold by Thomas Biddle & Co. for account, J. M. Coperthwaite, cashier, 1839, Jan. 29, 100 shares Reading rail road, at 61s, $31,500 00 Interest 12 mos. to Jan. 1840, 1,890 00

Commission 1/2, 83 48
$33,306 52

1839, Dec. 11. To cash paid, 1,000 00
1840, Feb. 1, do. do. 806 82—1,506 52

Balance due by N. Biddle, eqs. $31,500 00 on 700 shares, which is payable in 12 months from Jan. 30, 1840, with interest, at 6 per cent. per annum.

(Signed) THOS. BIDDLE & Co."

Thus it appears, if this entry is to be relied on, that the stock was bought on the 29th January, 1839, made payable with interest in 12 months from January 30, 1840, and that when its maturity arrived, February 2, 1841, not being paid, it was transferred to the suspended debt department; and Mr. Biddle there asked and obtained an extension of 12 months more.

The second item of the account is as follows: "Jan. 2, 1840. His note due Jan. 6, 1842, with interest, originally a debt to the bank, guaranteed by Mr. Biddle and now assumed by him, $100,000 00"

In the original impression there was a typographical error, the word new printed for now, which was not discovered until after some four hundred copies had been struck off. As soon as discovered the correction was made in the form, and with the pen in as many as had been printed. It is possible, however, that a few copies may have been given out before this was done. This is the only error pointed out in the second item, which as it was an absurdity as originally printed, would have led almost any one to suspect a typographical mistake.

The third item of the account is:

"Balance of loans from bills receivable, $29,500 00"

Now it is true the committee were shown a letter from Mr. Coperthwaite, declaring that he had obtained this money from the bank for Mr. Biddle, without his authority; but it further appeared that Mr. Biddle had authorized Mr. Coperthwaite to purchase for him the lands in Dauphin county, for which the deed was given, and that after the fact was brought to his knowledge that the money had been taken from the teller's drawer, and while he was president of the bank, and charged on the books to him, he had admitted the debt by the payment of interest upon it.

It is thus to be seen that the account of Mr. Biddle, as submitted, was, setting aside the typographical error, correct, and fully sustained by the books of the bank; yet he has not hesitated to pronounce it a "falsification of representations."

The committee continued themselves to so much of this account as was standing unpaid or unsettled that they gave further back it would have appeared that the following loans had been made to Mr. N. Biddle, and entered as "bills received."

January 1, 1838, $70,000 00
February 13, 1838, 10,000 00
February 28, 1838, 5,000 00
June 30, 1838, 25,000 00
September 1, 1838, 10,000 00

amounting in all to which remain unpaid up to March 25, 1839, upon which day it was paid in full with interest.

If it is asked, why parade Mr. Biddle's account before the world? the answer is a simple one. It is because the committee were told that it was an officer—the chief officer—and bound as such to set an example to those in subordinate office, and because, as he himself expressed it, "officers of banks ought not to be borrowers at all—never large borrowers."

2. The account of Mr. S. Jaudon.

The statement of the expenses of the agency, London, and Mr. Jaudon's commission, were introduced, not for the purpose of casting censure upon him, but in order to show one of the consequences of the policy of the bank, which had subjected it to heavy discounts and expenses in London loans to Europe; and also to exhibit the loans manner in which the agreement with that gentleman had been made, so that he could still charge extra commission to so large an amount, while it appeared that he was to be part of the understanding with him that for the ordinary compensation stipulated he should devote himself exclusively to the business of the bank.

Mr. Jaudon had also been a borrower. The committee referred to and gave for account in the appendix, where the amounts and dates of his several loans, and the amounts and dates of his cash payments with the list of his collateral securities are all stated in detail. "Here are a parcel of statements," says Mr. Biddle, "called facts, and I suppose they are so; but they are separated and the great truth which they contain is studiously hidden." This great truth seems to be, that Mr. Jaudon had reduced his debt to $117,000; that his cash payment amounted to $307,400; deducting which, from his receipts for services, showed that the latter only exceeded the former by about $29,000.

Yet this, we are told, "gives an entirely new aspect to the whole question. For after all," says Mr. Biddle, "what debtor of the bank has paid so much or so well during that time. I doubt whether there is one single man who has paid as well as Jaudon, like the same proportion of his debt." Perhaps there may be other heavy debtors of the bank, who would engage to pay even in full, if employed in an agency or office at a salary or commission of one hundred thousand dollars per annum, four times the salary of the chief officer of the United States, and eleven times that of an American ambassador abroad.

Mr. Jaudon's accounts would not have been again introduced, had not Mr. Biddle chosen to charge the committee with "slandering and separating the facts, so that the great truth which they contain is studiously hidden." This is a very strange assertion for any one to make with the report before him. At page 16 Mr. Jaudon's indebtedness at the time he was elected foreign agent is stated at $408,000 25, and in the very next line that on the 1st of March, 1841, it had been reduced to $117,500. And again, at pages 49 and 50, his whole account is given debt and credit—side by side on the same page. What closer juxtaposition, what more full disclosure could have been desired?

3. THE EXCESSIVE OPERATIONS.

We have here fully examined Mr. Biddle's first letter in relation to the cotton operations, without having been able to discover that a single fact stated in the report on this subject, has been directly controverted. It is intimated, however, that these transactions were publicly known at the time they were going on, and that therefore the board of directors could not have been ignorant of them, though it remains unexplained, why their formal consent was not asked and obtained to so large an appropriation of the funds of the institution for so unusual a purpose.

The evidence referred to in order to sustain the position, that the directors could not have been ignorant of it, is an extract from Mr. Biddle's own published letter to Mr. John Quincy Adams, of the date of Dec. 10, 1838, in which it is to be remarked, that in the letter it was said that it was seen that the capital and industry of the country had time to subside into their accustomed channels, these operations were relinquished, and now they have totally and finally ceased. So that, according to Mr. Biddle, the position was after the fact was seen to be closed; and supposing that it stated them correctly, it would be of no avail as to the point in question. But it by no means stated the operation as it really was. It contained this language: "As the bank could not purchase these staples, it made advances upon them in the south." The bank, however, did not advance to the southern planter or shipping merchant, as the paragraph implies. On the contrary, its funds were used by Mr. N. Bidle and his partners in interest, to enable them to purchase cotton and ship to England, in order that it might have the privilege of purchasing their bills or the bills of their agents, for the proceeds in which to make remittances.

Now, the evidence that the operation never was authorized or sanctioned by the board of directors is:

1. That not one syllable in relation to it is to be found on the minutes of the board, either at the time of its inception or during its progress.

2. The preamble and resolution of the committee, Messrs. Cabot, Wain, Niff, Connell, Eyre, Price, Lewis, Martin, Handy and Taylor, adopted unanimously on the 21st of December, 1840:

"As it appears by the report of the committee on advances, that large transactions have been going on for several years without the sanction or knowledge of the board of directors, and as it further appears that these transactions were mostly if not wholly for the account and to the profit and loss of the executive officers of this bank at those times, it is due from this board, that their just condemnation of such things should be fully expressed and recorded in the resolutions."

Resolved, That the large advances made by the officers of the bank in the periods of 1837-8, and 1838-9, being totally unauthorized and unknown to the board of directors, merits and receives our just censure and condemnation."

3. Mr. Bidle's own admission. "I determined that as it must be done I would do it myself."

Indeed, it is very apparent, that Mr. Bidle, especially during the latter years of his presidency, considered himself as the bank, and still considers himself to have been so. This he told us in several other parts of his letters, besides that which has just been adduced. For example, in speaking of the resumption in January last, he says: "Had I occupied the position I once did, I would not have permitted that resumption." Referring to the assurance given by the bank to the directors, he says: "The first I took in hand myself, making the necessary advances to carry them through their troubles, and they were accordingly saved. With the house of Thomas Bidle & Co. I would not interfere, but I requested a committee to examine their affairs, and if they thought it expedient, I would consent to it."

It is true, that by the sale of the bank, laid upon the directors' table at every stated meeting, the amount of these advances on merchandise, was included in the amount of "foreign bills of exchange." It is true, also, that the committee thought when they made their report, and still think, that so large an item ought to have attracted attention, and an explanation and detail of the particulars called for and examined. Still it is fairly open to this result, that as the dealing in foreign exchange had always been regarded as the favorite, because the most profitable, and at the same time the safest branch of the business of the bank, the directors who inspected the statement were doubtless gratified rather than otherwise, in observing the extent of that line, and certainly had no reason to suspect any thing improper under such a head.

On quoting the passage of the report in which this is mentioned, Mr. Bidle exclaims: "thus to this blind rage for more vengeance, they thus reveal what completely answers all that they have previously written; and never, certainly, was seen at the quarterly sessions a witness caught more completely in his own trap." The committee can only say that every part of the report was well weighed, and this part as well as every other. The facts which it states are not controverted, and they show, what the paragraph was intended to show, with what improper laxity the business was transacted—what a mere form the board of directors and its standing committees had become, and how entirely satisfied the president seemed to be of his own ability, unassisted, to direct its affairs.

On a re-examination of the whole matter, the committee are fully borne out in their position that the "advances on merchandise" was an operation undertaken and carried on, without the authority, sanction, or even knowledge, of the board of directors.

Some facts, however, have been stated in relation to this business, which were not known to the committee, and which require a few remarks, in order that their proper bearing may be clearly understood.

1. We supposed that the $800,000 drawn from the bank, and distributed among the parties, were for profits actually then realized.

It now appears from the statement of Mr. Joseph Cabot, published by Mr. Bidle in his first letter, that one-half of this amount was for anticipated profits. We take the statement as correct, although there are some plain mistakes in the calculations.

So that we have it from the best authority, that on the 25th of August, 1839, when Mr. Jaudon, the agent in London, wrote Mr. Messrs. Bidle and Humphreys for the advance of £50,000, telling them "if 5,000 bales of cotton must go, let them go, be the loss what it may," and on the following day for £50,000 more, in consequence of which, as is pretended, the cotton was sacrificed,—at that very time Mr. Bidle and his associates in this business were in possession of an amount drawn from the bank as estimated profits, which without doubt would have been sufficient, if in the hands of Mr. Jaudon, to have prevented the necessity of the sacrifice.

2. It appears that Mr. Bidle undertook this operation "without the least idea of pecuniary advantage to himself," and that the object was not profit, but simply to enable the bank to make with safety the large remittances necessary to meet its obligations in London, which then were the means of protecting and saving the agent of the bank and of course the bank itself from prostration."

If then the whole operation was undertaken for the benefit of the bank, in order to enable it to transmit its funds, how is it that, after the $800,000 had been withdrawn and repaid, and a dividend of a part of this sum to make good subsequent losses, the transaction suddenly changes its character? It becomes all at once, according to Mr. Bidle, "a question, how far, looking at it as a simple commercial operation, the only possible light in which it could be regarded," he, "a stranger, no longer connected with the bank, ought to bear the burden of this sacrifice."

If according to "the only possible light in which it could be regarded," it was "a simple commercial operation" of Mr. Nicholas Bidle, then here was the chief officer of that institution, employed at a salary of $5,000 per annum, in order that he might devote his whole mind to its business, engaging in a large commercial operation for his own benefit; and what is more and worse, using to the extent of means, the money of the bank for that object, without the approbation or even the knowledge of the board of directors.

If, on the other hand, it be regarded as an operation undertaken solely for the benefit of the bank, to enable it to make remittances to meet its payments in Europe, then when it becomes absolutely necessary to make a sacrifice in order to sustain the agent of the bank and the credit of the bank, the very object of the whole operation, on what principle, consistently with this view, could the parties refuse to repay the money appropriated to them selves under the name of profit?

Had the $800,000 never been drawn, it is evident that the bank would still have been a loser on the whole business to the extent of $141,462 27. For the reason of the report will remember that, to enable it to account, the parties interested claimed and were allowed a deduction for loss on southern funds, and in the purchase of cotton, of $310,071 30, which was a proper allowance, if it was an operation designed for the benefit of the bank, but was not such if it was intended for the benefit of the parties in which it could be regarded? was that of a simple commercial operation of individuals.

One or two other matters remain to be briefly noticed in connection with this branch of the report:

Mr. Bidle states that it was after he had left the bank that Mr. Cabot presented to him the statement of the profits realized and expected on the sales of the cotton, and that when he received this account he presumed the matter was correctly stated, and he was so settled accordingly. Mr. Bidle assigned the presidency on the 29th of March, 1839. The committee cannot of course say when he received the $100,000, his pretended share, in hand, but the books gave the following as the dates at which the money was drawn:

March 28, 1839,	$150,000
April 19, "	50,000
May 21, "	100,000
May 21, "	200,000
May 21, "	$800,000

More than one-half the sum that was actually drawn before Mr. Bidle left the bank; and whether he received it on those days or not, it is certainly a curious coincidence that upon the 29th of March, 1839, the date upon the first of these drafts, he paid his debt to the bank as heretofore mentioned of 70,000 dollars with interest.

2. Another circumstance to be mentioned relates to the letter signed "T. Dunlap, president," to Messrs. Bevan & Humphreys of February 28, 1840, in which he requests them to direct Messrs. Humphreys & Bidle to raise funds by the sale of any or all the merchandise consigned to them, and, "if this sale should be attended by any sacrifice on its cost," undertaking that the bank would make up the difference, and "that the same difference would be made up on that day they had already sold." It is to be observed that this letter never received the approbation of the board of directors, and was without their knowledge. The committee have also good reason to believe that it was drafted by Mr. Bidle himself, urged by him upon Mr. Dunlap, and signed by the latter gentleman with great reluctance—as an error, for such it undoubtedly was, which he afterwards rectified, as far as it was possible, by insisting in the final settlement, upon the liability of the parties to refund the loss, and by making the best arrangements in his power to repay his own share.

3. The permanent expense account. Before proceeding to remark upon these portions of Mr. Bidle's letters, which relate to this account, we may be permitted to state, as far as we are able to ascertain in the history of the account of $40,000 to "losses chargeable to contingent fund" for the parent bank notes, to be found in this appendix to the report, (p. 68), and mentioned also at (p. 25), as not having been satisfactorily explained.

It appears that the account of January, 1836, the amount of $40,000 in the first letter of February, 1840, $145,511 49. Of this sum $40,000 were the receipts of the president, for moneys paid him on the cashier's orders. This amount of sundries on the following day, March 1, 1836, stood at only $1,048 90. The balance of the account of $40,000 had been taken out and cannot now be found. About the same time a quantity of bank notes was burned under the supervision of a committee of the board, and among them ten post notes of $40,000 each, which had been entered in the post note register, but marked "burned." The cashier's order of the bank, authorizing the burning made out as usual by the officers, was signed by the chairman of the committee, and presented to the board.

This report included the amount of the post notes destroyed, and the general head of parent notes. An entry of it was made in the general ledger of that day, and the whole amount destroyed and carried to the credit of the account of parent bank issues in the general ledger. Some time after, June, 1839, the clerk who kept that account found, to his surprise, that the balance was on the wrong side, by which it seemed that more parent bank notes of the particular denomination had been destroyed than had ever been issued, and having satisfied himself that there was no mistake in the calculation, reported the fact. It became necessary to balance this false entry by a corresponding entry upon the other side, which was accordingly done upon the 27th of June, 1840, and the amount as we are carried to the account of losses chargeable to the contingent fund.

Thus, then, the amount of $618,546 15-100, distributed by the officers of the bank without account, since the recharter, is to be added this sum of $40,000, expended on or about that very period, making in all the sum of $1,018,546 15-100.

In regard to these expenditures, the objects of which the committee were ignorant, the committee addressed the president of the bank for information. His answer was in substance, that as to those amounts which had been expended before the period of his presidency, he could not furnish the committee with any information; that as to $99,500, charged in March and April, 1839, he had been burned under the directions of a committee of a board, appointed under a resolution of March 3d, 1840. Similar letters were then addressed to Mr. Bidle and Mr. Cowperthwaite. From Mr. Bidle no answer was received. Mr. Cowperthwaite, as it has been stated, called on the chairman of the committee, and informed him that he had been at bank, where access to the vaults had been refused to him. The chairman wrote upon a small piece of paper, and requested Mr. Cowperthwaite to add and sign this further, in which he had been written that he was willing to furnish the committee any information he was possessed of. This was not signed by him nor addressed to the committee. The only variance between this statement and that of Mr. Cowperthwaite is, that he said he had been asked by Mr. Lippincott, what "this recollection was" respecting the vaults; that he, (Mr. Lippincott), expected it might be put down in writing, and a short memorandum was accordingly made. Yet Mr.

Great attention has been paid to distributing the Bible among emigrants, 75,859 of whom arrived at this port within the last ten months. Books have been sent to many foreign countries and the following grants of money have been made to promote the circulation of the scriptures abroad:

To aid distribution in Prussia	$942 85
" " " Prussia	1,000 00
" " " Belgium	500 00
To aid in preparing and distributing in Northern India	1,000 00
To aid in publishing a Hebrew Spanish Arabic Testament, at Vienna	6,000 00
To aid preparation, &c. at Ceylon	4,000 00

For the same at Madras	6,000 00
For publishing the Hawaiian scripture at the Sandwich Islands	5,500 00
For printing gospels in the Grebo tongue on the west coast of Africa	350 00

The report states that $50,000 is the least sum which should be provided for the coming years. Resolutions were presented and passed, relative to the general designs of the society, and addresses were made by rev. Dr. De Wit, of this city, rev. James W. Dale, general agent of the Bible society, rev. John Coleman, of Philadelphia, rev. J. W. Yarnall, of Trenton, N. Jersey, rev. Prof. Emory, of Baltimore, rev. George Scott, from Stockholm, Sweden, rev. H. Bingham, from the Sandwich Islands, and the rev. Mr. Thompson of London.

AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY. This society held their anniversary at the Tabernacle last evening. Although the day had been very wet yet quite a crowded audience assembled. Some very brief abstracts from the report of the society were read. With regard to the foreign operations of the society, it stated that there was, at present, no agent at Honolulu in the Sandwich Islands. The agent of that station, while on a voyage for his health, had died, another had been appointed who was expected soon to sail for the Island. At Sidney in Australasia a new station, had, during the past year, been established. At Havre in France, at Stockholm in Sweden, at Lisbon in Portugal, and at the other foreign stations the labors of the chaplain had been attended with much success. The domestic operations of the society had been attended with the like happy results. At several of the New Orleans and Mobile, chaplains were regularly stationed at the most important ports on the sea coast. The Bethel churches under their charge were increasing, and the condition of the seamen within their influence was improving. Reading rooms had been established in connection with several Bethel societies. The number of boarding houses for seamen had been increased, and the number who resorted to them had been greatly augmented. Their influence on the character of the sailors who boarded at them had been such as to cause a reformation in their morals; their ways instead of being thrown away, were either deposited at inebriate or sent home to friends. At the boarding house for colored seamen, newly established, there had been more than 400 during the last fourteen months. The operation of the society on the western lakes and rivers had exerted a happy influence.

The various auxiliary societies had besides sustaining their operations paid into the treasury of the society $700 during the past year. These societies had in their operations expended $40,000. The expenditure of the American society during the past year had been 25,692 55, and it is at present considerably in arrears.

The audience then listened to interesting addresses from Mr. Spaulding, the rev. Mr. Scott, chaplain at Stockholm in Sweden, Mr. Dana, of Boston, Mr. Stillman, and Mr. Biogham, of the Sandwich Islands. [Jour. of Com.

THE FOREIGN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY. The Mercer street church was filled with an intelligent and attentive audience last evening on the occasion of the anniversary of this society. After the religious introductory exercises, the president, honorable Theodore Frelinghuysen, made some opening remarks relative to the position and importance of America, in carrying forward the great object of this society, and as having connected with it circumstances calculated to furnish to the Christian and the patriot grounds of the strongest hope. Mr. Clester then read the report of the treasurer, from which it appears that the receipts of the past year from the several churches of this city, from other cities and sections of our country, and from various benevolent societies, amounted to above $14,000 while the disbursements for the various purposes and operations connected with the object of the society amounted to about $8,000. Rev. Mr. Kirk read extracts from the extensive and interesting report of the executive committee, giving an account of the present condition and future prospects of the various missionary stations connected with the society. Europe was first mentioned. The number of Tylic colles, sent to print the report, and accompanied the motion with remarks on the duties and responsibilities of the American churches. Mr. Kirk offered several resolutions setting forth the principles of the society and the objects which it proposed to accomplish. Rev. Mr. Cleverly, rev. Robert Baird and rev. Mr. Scott from Stockholm, gave most interesting accounts of their efforts and success in disseminating evangelical truth, and exciting a more deep-toned piety in the several countries of the old world. The meeting was closed by some remarks from Mr. Kirk. [Tribune.

NEW YORK AND AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION. Under the direction of this association, the children of the Sabbath schools throughout the city were presented and marching in procession to the principal streets to Castle Garden. The celebration of the society was held at the Tabernacle in the evening, the exercises commenced with a prayer by the rev. Dr. Macaulay, rev. Dr. Ferris being in the chair. An abstract of the annual report was read by the corresponding secretary. The number of Sunday schools in the city reported to the society was stated to be 81; there were 12 not reported. In these there are 17,032 scholars, 6,889 of which are in the classes reading the scriptures. There are engaged in these schools 1,249 male and 1,521 female teachers, these 2,770 are professors of religion. Bibles, pamphlets, &c. to the value of some $300 these various schools have libraries containing Bibles, Hymn books, Question books, &c. to the amount of about 12,000 volumes. In the penitentiary school, about 800 persons have received instruction during the year. The influence of this school is said to have been very sensibly beneficial.

After the report was read, an address was delivered by rev. Dr. Huttof of this city. He spoke particularly of the influence of Sunday schools upon society, and of the good of it, at some length, as being a means of doing good, at once the humblest and most powerful, the most limited and yet the most far-reaching, the least costly and yet the most valuable, the most direct and all embracing inculcating instruction, and addressed all that are burdened as religious duties, as the most trying and yet the most pleasant, the most unpromising and yet the most hopeful among all the agencies employed in disseminating religious and moral truth. Eloquent addresses were also delivered by prof. A. C. Kendrick of Hamden college, rev. Joel Parker, D. D. president of the Union Theological seminary in this city, and rev. Mr. Teusely from the western part of this state. The attendance was large and a general interest was manifested in the exercises and in the cause of Sabbath school instruction. [Tribune.

AMERICAN HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The report of the executive committee of the American home missionary society, read at its anniversary meeting on Wednesday, represented that six hundred and ninety missionaries, ten more than last year, had been this year in commission, in 862 congregations and missionary districts, which are to be found in 21 different states and territories, in Canada and in Texas.

The receipts of the year were $85,412; being an increase of $7,068 upon those of the year preceding. Older congregations in the east had ceased to need aid, and new ones in the west had taken their places.

110 of the churches there had been interesting revivals of religion, and 3,283 had been reported from all the churches as hopeful subjects of renewing grace. Between 50 and 60,000 Sabbath schools and Bible class pupils were connected with the congregations, and between 50 and 70,000 subscribers to temperance pledges.

The society had already pledged to the missionaries for the coming year, $34,683; and it needed $50,000 more another year, than it had received last time, to enable it to meet the most pressing necessities of our infant settlements.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY. The sixteenth anniversary of the American Tract society was held in New York on Wednesday. The annual report showed the extent of the operations of the society for the past year. Seven volumes have been stereotyped during the year. The number of new tracts and tracts issued is 26; total publications 994, including 93 volumes, approved for circulation in various languages abroad. Total printed the past year, 4,136,710 publications, or 254,710 volumes, including 254,710 volumes; total circulars 4,124,372 publications, or 30,821,565 pages, including 133,310 volumes. Total circulation since the formation of the society, 59,383,771 publications, including 1,596,150 volumes, making in all 1,122,282,811 pages.

NEW YORK COLONIZATION SOCIETY had its 9th anniversary on Wednesday. The treasurer read his report for the past year. The subscriptions received amounted to $19,250, which was expended in various outlays for goods sent to the colony at Liberia and other necessary expenses. The report of the board of managers contained many encouraging facts in relation to the progress of the colony in Africa and the colonization cause in general. A resolution was passed that the clergymen and churches of every denomination in our country be solicited to take up a collection on the 4th July, being the anniversary of our independence, in behalf of the funds of the colonization society.

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY. The old organization of the abolitionists held its anniversary at the Broadway Tabernacle on Tuesday morning. Mr. Lindley Coates, president of the society in the chair. Mr. Gibbons presented an abstract of the annual report, stating the inauspicious circumstances under which the society assembled. The collision in its ranks, the alienation of the Emancipator, and the transference of the books, plates and apparatus of the society, amounting to $10,000, were spoken of as prominent causes of discouragement. The society was deprecated. The exclusion to secession. A new press, the "Anti-Slavery Standard," has been started; an agent is laboring abroad to secure the co-operation of European abolitionists; and the conventions which have recently been held in western New York are alluded to as cheering indications of prosperity. The exclusion of their delegates from the World's convention is mentioned, and the report stated that "an impression unfavorable to the society had been produced in England, chiefly through the efforts of James G. Birney." Political action was deprecated. The treasurer's report, read by Mr. O. Johnson, stated the receipts of the year at $6,821 40, and the disbursements at $6,671 96, leaving in the treasury a balance of $149 44.

The resolutions were then offered and an address was made by Wm. Lloyd Garrison of Boston. He lamented the poverty of the English language to express the emotions excited by the horrors of slavery; declared that the American people were liars, and filled with a most unrighteous and hateful prejudice against the colored portion of our population; and avowed himself proud of the deterioration in which he knew he was held from one end of the land to the other. He closed after reading extracts from the writings of several foreign abolitionists. The convention was further addressed by Alvin Stewart, of Utica, Nathaniel E. Rogers, of New Hampshire, and Charles C. Burleigh, of Philadelphia, when it adjourned until afternoon. On coming together again, some amendments were made to the report, and a spirited discussion arose upon an expression of the report, in which the Emancipator was said to have been "transferred to the stable hands," in which Messrs. Fuller, Garrison, Burleigh, Dwyer, Rogers, Benson and Miss Abby Kelly took a prominent part. The expression was finally changed so as to read "hostile to an organization," &c.

course of the "World's convention" in excluding from its deliberations some who presented themselves as delegates, was also the subject of considerable remark. [Tribune.]

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY. The first anniversary of this society was held last evening, at the church corner of Houston and Thompson streets, at which Mr. Arthur Tappan presided. It appears that this society is composed of seceders from the old anti-slavery society, in which there was a great deal of dissension last year, and so great a difference of opinion as to the measures to be adopted, and the rules for their government, that a separation took place, and this society took the name of the American and Foreign anti-slavery society, and carried on its operations entirely distinct from the old society. The assembly, composed of blacks and whites promiscuously, was not very large. After a prayer, an abstract of the annual report was read by the secretary, the Rev. James Leavitt. It did not contain anything startling, but was rather a general view of the progress of the anti-slavery cause all over the world. The executive committee have published a journal called the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter, which has been widely circulated. Some account was given of the great anti-slavery convention in London last summer, and the doings of the delegates from this society. It is proposed to hold another similar convention in London next year. The executive committee have been compelled to dispense with the services of their two secretaries, Messrs. Birney and Stanton, for want of funds for their support. The past year has been one of comparative inaction in the anti-slavery cause; still the committee are assured that its progress has not been retarded. Many more churches had resolved not to receive slave-holders to their communion.

The Amistad case was referred to, and the conduct of the late administration in relation to the attempt to deliver up the negroes to the Spanish authorities severely annunciated on. The opinions of various southern politicians, and their speeches in congress and elsewhere were cited to prove that the subject of emancipation was beginning to be thought of seriously at the south.

The first speaker was the rev. Mr. Brisbane, of Cincinnati, formerly of Charleston, where he was a slaveholder, but who freed his slaves some years since, and has been since an active abolitionist.—His remarks were generally on the hackneyed topic of treatment of the colored people, and the cruelties of the system, and presented nothing new. He was followed by Mr. Stuart, of Utica, on the subject of political abolitionism. Mr. S. insisted on the obligation every one, particularly the friends of emancipation, were under to give their opinions by their votes, and maintained that it was the duty of abolitionists to maintain a distinct political organization. Mr. Sturges, of England, then made a few remarks on the progress of the cause in England, and various parts of the British empire. Another gentleman, whose name we did not learn, said a few words, and then the meeting dissolved. [Express.]

THE LIBERATED AFRICANS. A meeting was held at the Tabernacle on Wednesday afternoon, at which the Africans of the Amistad schooner were present, and in which they took the most prominent part. The meeting was organized by the election of hon. James G. Birney, chairman, and the exercises were opened by the prayer of rev. Mr. Rush, colored minister in Zion's church in this city. Mr. Lewis Tappan then made some remarks apologetic for the absence of hon. John Quincy Adams, by saying that he was engaged in writing out his argument in this case. He then read the resolutions the abolitionists from a charge preferred against them by rev. R. J. Breckinridge, in the Baltimore Religious and Literary Magazine, of having made use of the circumstances attending the Amistad case to further their own designs. They were denied, and proceeded to state the objects of the meeting as being—1. To show the improvement these Africans have made since they have been in this country; 2. To excite an interest in the mission to the interior of Africa, which was proposed at this rate; and 3. To raise money for their support. He stated that they would probably return to their own country, which is about 800 miles from the African coast, within a year. A letter was read from a gentleman in Monrovia stating that the cabin boy Antonio, whose return to Cuba was ordered by the court, was safe in that city.

Of the 33 Africans who were shipped at Havana, 9 died on the way, and 8 died at New Haven, and the 26 survivors, 18 were living, including Cinquara. Mr. Booth, who has been their teacher at New Haven, gave a brief account of his efforts and success in instructing them to read, and related many very interesting incidents and marks of their character which he had observed during his intercourse with them. He also presented some statements with regard to their native country, in which some twenty days' labor will procure subsistence for the year. The people live in small villages, have laws, and are exceedingly hospitable and scrupulously honest. Whenever a father has a son old enough to work, he himself works no longer—the children always living with their parents. The negroes read portions of the Bible in succession, and one of the lads, about 18 years old, made an address in English, giving the history of their captivity, &c. and containing many piquant though of course homely remarks on American character and manners. Cinquara then, in addition to his native language—delivering it in a remarkably energetic style, abounding in violent gesticulation, and occasionally appealing to the others for confirmation of what he was saying, who always responded by a shout, and cheering him on in his native language, and appeared highly pleased with the interest they excited. [Log Cabin.]

LAW CASES.

NO SLAVERY IN OHIO. An interesting and important decision has just been made by the supreme court of Ohio, sitting at Lebanon, in the case of A. T. Brooks and others, vs. the state, being a writ of error to the court of common pleas of Warren county. Chief Justice Lane and judge Hitchcock on the bench, the chief justice delivered the opinion of the court, deciding that if the owner of a slave voluntarily bring him into this state, or permit him to come, although it should be only for the purpose of visit or residence, or to sell him, or to use him in any way, the slave in such case, becomes a free man; the moment he touches the soil of Ohio, and consequently that if, under such circumstances, the former owner, or any person, should attempt to detain in bondage, or to use him in any way, or to sell him, against the will of the latter, such pretended owner or other person would thereby become himself a violator of the laws, and might lawfully be resisted and prevented in his purpose in like manner as any other person might be found attempting the commission of a crime.

It will be observed that this decision in no degree interferes with the provision in sec. 27 article 4, of the constitution of the United States, that "no person shall be held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, contrary to the basic laws, and in consequence of such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

MRS. GAINES' SUIT—Court house scene. The following scene occurred the other day in New Orleans in the suite of Mrs. Gen. Gaines before Judge Buchanan. The PEYTON says—Here an informal discussion was entered into, in consequence of Mr. Peyton pressing his right to read the evidence which he held in his hand, and when this was denied him, of giving the substance of that evidence orally, instead of—as he was called on to do by the judge—valuing what it was that evidence would go to establish, if it were ruled by the court that it should go to the jury. It ended by the court calling peremptorily on the counsel to desist and follow no further the course he had been pursuing, otherwise he would find him liable for a contempt of court and a violation of all the rules of practice.

Mr. Peyton said he might have been guilty of an error, but before no other tribunal would that be construed into a contempt of court. If, however, the right of giving evidence were denied him—it is a bad, a vile way to treat a man, and he would at once withdraw from the defence of the case; and hereupon the learned gentleman took up his hat, bid good day to his fair client and the jury, and left the court.

Here Gen. Gaines and Mrs. Gaines suddenly started from their seats.

Gen. G.—"May it please the court, the lady will take charge of the case herself, she is prepared to do it."

Mr. G.—(taking the book in her hand which Mr. Peyton had been prevented from reading)—"Yes, I will proceed with the case."

The judge—"Do you intend to offer the testimony in that book as evidence?"

Gen. G.—"Yes, I do."

The judge—"Well, then, I cannot permit you to proceed."

Gen. G.—"Then I thank my God! I can go before the judges of the United States supreme court, and I will not expect a just trial, unless I can do so; which I cannot expect here, where I see such partiality."

The judge—"General Gaines, this is language which I shall not suffer. Decorum must be preserved in this court; there are no privileged classes here."

Gen. G.—"It is not my intention to be indecorous to the court. I know my rights and will maintain them in despite of any outrage, and despite of New Orleans and its sixteen banks."

The judge—"Order must be preserved in this court."

General Gaines—"Has not your honor acted as counsel for the opposite parties in this case before you were raised to a seat on this bench?"

Mrs. G.—"Yes, he had and he is now sitting in judgment against us."

The judge—"Mrs. Gaines, I again repeat that I will not sit here as a judge of language as this to be made use of, even by my woman."

During this singular discussion one of the officers of the court was sent for Messrs. Grimes and Chinn, the associates of Mr. Peyton for the defence, to take charge in dispute of any language, but neither of them was forthcoming, and Mrs. Gaines addressed the court, urging the right of the defendants to a liberal construction of the law of evidence.

General Gaines again rose and alluded to the controversy which closed previous to Mr. Smith's address to the court.

The judge—"I have said nothing, Gen. Gaines, against the lady. I am sure I acted with great forbearance. I did not prevent the argument of any question of law, but I interpreted to prevent a scene of wrangling and impropriety. I let the language pass from my ear to the idle wind. Since my wife has been alluded to, I insist upon her right to be heard."

The judge—"I do not deny her right to address the court, but, for the evidence closed?"

Mr. Smith, for the plaintiffs, argued that from the nature of the pleadings put in by the defendants the evidence was necessarily closed.

The judge then gave his decision on the points of law at issue between the parties. He first ruled that the evidence offered was inadmissible, except in as far as it related to the perpetration of Ellen O'Connell. The counsel for the plaintiff, (Mr. Rosellus), said yesterday that my remarks relative to one of the parties to this suit were impertinent. This I never suffered any person to tell me before, but coming from the confederate, I let the language pass from my ear to the idle wind. Since my wife has been alluded to, I insist upon her right to be heard."

Gen. Gaines then said, as the evidence was closed on him, and as he was deserted by his counsel, he would take the case in his own hands. It then appeared in the uniform of a United States officer, it was a mark of respect to the court, than as a badge of privilege.

(Here the judge explained what he meant by "mark of privilege.")

The fact of his wife being in court, he said, was no subject for a sneer. She was deeply interested in the issue of this case, and he thought that she, or any well educated lady, or indeed any woman of an intelligent mind, was capable of forming a correct opinion of the merits of the case, and he thought that she also could well understand it, as she could the proper subtleties and flourishes of her gown.

With the permission of the court, Mrs. Gaines then rose and read to the court and jury several pages of the evidence, and then, in a short and plain manner, she alleged wrongs, and of the artifices and devices of Richard Reel, Beverly Chew and others, to keep her from possessing or enjoying the property of late Daniel Clarke, bequeathed to her by him, whom she had a daughter, and was, and not his natural child as they have alleged.

It being now four o'clock, the judge discharged the jury until Monday week—the first day on which a jury sits in that court.

INVENTIONS, &c.

London, April 3, 1841. Captain Taylor, of New York, has just had awarded to him the sum of £2500 for his invention of a new electric machine, for his discoveries in electric magnetism, whereby he proposes to supercede steam on rail roads, and for proelling machinery. This gentleman, some months back, exhibited a very beautiful model of his electro-magnetic engine, at the Colosseum here, which set forth the application and advantages of the men of the higher practical knowledge and scientific attainments. On that occasion the engine was devoted to turning a lathe, and most admirably did it perform its functions. The inventor has now constructed a machine of considerable power, which he expects to be enabled to get ready for service within the present year.

No anguine is the captain, that he emphatically declares he does not intend to return to America until he can go back by lightning. But this is not the only wonder which he claims. For he has been exhibiting to the astonished gaze of the natives of Cokerseyshire, for he has a patent for steaming wood and then, when in a soft state, slicing it like soap, and forming the same forthwith into shingles, staves, garden paling, &c. &c. He has fitted up some extensive premises for this purpose, and also for making casks by machinery, and to such perfection has he brought the latter, that his lady visitors can manufacture a cask in less than five minutes, without the aid of a cooper. At the present moment the worthy captain is all rage in town, and he is also, as might be imagined, playing the very deuce among the coopers in England.

Mr. Wells, an American gentleman, who is the proprietor of the late cotton spinning company in London, who have commenced the manufacture of this very peculiar fabric. The works are at Leeds, and great success has attended the experiments. Orders have been given to the company which will take some years to execute. I have visited the depot in town, and been highly gratified with some very splendid specimens of this admirable discovery. The cloth you are aware, is made without either spinning or weaving.

General Monmouth, from your far west, are zealously laboring in the provinces here for the purpose of making proselyts to their strange faith. In some parts they have been successful, and several simpletons have been induced to dispose of their property here and set sail for the United States, to make the general belief. In some towns the missionaries have been very roughly handled.

CONGREGATE ROCKETS. The report just received of the attack on the Chinese fleet and shipping, has produced the most extraordinary excitement as part of our means of defence which was called into operation. These auxiliaries to our artillery were supplied, no doubt, from the stores of the East India company, who keep a large stock at all times in India. Among the many causes of excitement, and astonishment which the "temper of the sun and moon," with his strange people, will have had, as the consequences of this collision with our forces, will be the circumstance of the superiority of our fireworks. It is a fact, we believe, that the Chinese are the real inventors of the rocket as an artificial firework, and even as an instrument of war: its capability, however, for this aerodrome object, in their hands, being confined—so trifling is its projectile force—to a simple means of annoyance, instead of destruction, for conquest, the ranks of artillery. It is to the late Mr. William Congreve, after many years of practical experiment, that this weapon owes its present character for destructiveness and precision of flight. To him belonged the merit of manufacturing rockets almost unlimited weights of bringing up the range, for instance, of the 33 pounder to 3,000 yards, and of gradually increasing the power of even the 12 pounder to the penetration, at 1,200 yards distance, of a solid bank of earth to the depth of 20 feet. The rockets, and the inventions of the late Mr. Congreve, the substitution of strong iron for paper cases, and the fixing of the stick by a screw in the axis of the rocket, instead of by binding on the side, so as to give it the straightness of the arrow. These improvements have been the conservation of the celestial nation with such a visitation of their native and familiar plating, with its appalling roar, and to them, new and gigantic dimensions and powers of destruction: in the case of the Congreve rocket, it is thought that one period just to give the inventor a pension of £1,200 per annum, which he enjoyed for very many years, and now to continue to the widow £300 of that pension. Yet it is notorious in the ordinance department at Woolwich, that the Congreve rocket has never been observed to preserve its secret though handsomely paid for, which would have been a much easier task than in many other cases, as it was mere specification in writing will not adequately reward the art without the aid of practical workmen, and many of these have been taken on board as common laborers. There are two individuals who, from the first, as directors and masters of the only war rocket works in England, should be the de-positors of all the essential particulars for the manufacture of these articles. The deposit of such particulars, with drawings of the machinery and tools, in custody of the master general and head of ordinance, would seem to be a measure of prudence and could hardly be overlooked. We doubt very much, however, if even this precaution has been taken. With all due deference, let our rulers look to it, says the London Times.

CULTURE OF WHEAT. There is good reason to believe that the export from Lake Erie of this great western staple will not fall below ten millions of bushels during the present season. Any improvement in the production of so article of such immense importance to the commerce of Buffalo, and to all classes who desire an abundance of good cheap bread, cannot fail to interest our readers. Hence no apology is necessary for devoting considerable space in our columns to detailing the practical results of careful experiments made in Great Britain with a view to cheapen the expense of culture, and augment both the quantity and quality of wheat grown to an acre in the highest degree.

Colonel La Cour, of the island of Jersey, has recently made some important discoveries in the propagation of wheat plants, their adoption to peculiar soils both natural and artificial, and, in the whole process, of obtaining the greatest amount of the product at the least expense of manure. From some strange oversight, his valuable work upon "wheat," and his "essay on pure and improved varieties of wheat lately introduced into England," which received a prize of twenty sovereigns, have not been republished in this country. We are indebted to Mr. L. Cras, lately a resident of the island of Jersey, for the perusal of these works, and the privilege of making an abstract of such portions as we deem of most service to the wheat growers of the United States.

Colonel La Cour has succeeded in producing, by crossing the different kinds of wheat formerly cultivated, over 160 varieties and sub-varieties of this grain. He commenced his experiments some six years ago by selecting a few of the best heads of the wheat of the last season, esteemed varieties cultivated in England. The kernels in these heads were all carefully counted and planted in separate parcels, and treated alike in every respect as to soil and culture. The result demonstrated as astonishingly the difference in the product, and the quality of these several varieties of wheat. No kernels were counted except such as grew, and the experiment was most satisfactorily conducted in every respect. Sixty-one grains of white Dantzic gave 3 lbs. 3 oz. of wheat, and 3 lbs. 5 oz. of straw; 59 grains of red wheat gave only 1 lb. 10 oz. of wheat, and 2 lbs. 5 oz. of straw. No. 8, a downy variety of white wheat, gave 4 lbs. 4 oz. of wheat, and 3 lbs. 3 oz. of straw, and 55 grains of wheat, which grew better in this country would be rejected to cultivate a variety of wheat which would yield him a good crop of straw bearing an amount of grain one third larger in weight than the straw itself. And yet this was obtained at the first experiment, as stated above.

The author selected five or six of the best varieties of these 164 several parcels, and cultivated some of them at great pains in their pure state, while he commenced a judicious system of crossing with actual mixtures of the pure and the inferior, superior to any of them. In this he was quite successful. To prevent mistake and undesirable mixing of different varieties of wheat when in blossom, only one pistil on a head was preserved, while all the other pistils were carefully removed. The result was fructified by the selected pollen, and only one kernel was produced, which, when planted, sometimes yielded 1,600 kernels of the new variety. By pursuing this course for a series of years, and cultivating the pure and the mixed, he produced, from these kinds only which produced the most and best flour with the least bran, Colonel La Cour now obtains over twenty-four hundred pounds of super-fine flour to the acre, and his wheat is so very fine skinned, that 52 bushels per acre upon an acre give only 542 pounds of bran, middlings and shorts. A hundred pounds of the flour of his improved wheat will make, as repeated and most careful experiments have demonstrated, from 6 to 12 per cent. more than the same quantity of the best common flour in the market.

It is estimated that there are five millions of acres sown to wheat annually in Great Britain; and it is considered quite practicable to increase the product without any additional expense, eight millions of acres in the same millions in the same way, more than supply the home consumption, and enable the British nation to export many millions of bushels of wheat. How important is it then that the producers of a great American staple should fully understand the best method of its cultivation, to compete successfully with the science and skill of English husbandry. The struggle heretofore between civilized nations in agriculture, and in the war even, will depend far less upon superiority in mere physical force, than the combinations and deductions of practical science. The steam power of Great Britain performs an amount of labor which, if executed by human hands, would employ all the able bodied men in the world. The vegetable, mineral, and arid ingredients which combine in nature and can be brought into contact by art, for the production of the most valuable wheat, ought to be studied and thoroughly understood by every cultivator of the soil. SPLENDID ERUPTION OF A VOLCANO. We are indebted (says the Newark Daily Advertiser) to an officer of the exploring expedition for files of the Polyceanian, a useful little paper published at the Sandwich Islands, and transfer the following extract from a full account of the last volcanic eruption, which was briefly referred to by our correspondent in a brief notice having been witnessed by the officers of the squadron:

"Several days before the eruption, smoke was seen by the natives rising from the direction where the lava afterward burst out, but it was attributed to brush on fire. On the morning of Sunday, the last day of May, a bright light was seen from Hilo toward the south, which spread with great rapidity, and increased to such an intensity that it was immediately attributed to a volcanic eruption. This the report of the natives, confirmed by eye-witnesses to the eruption, was not a little surprising. It was judged to be thirty miles distant, and at night was the brilliancy of the light that the finest print could be read at that distance. This noon tide brightness, covering night into day, continued for two weeks in a great degree, but by eye-witnesses to have been a spectacle of unsurpassed sublimity. It was like the glow of a furnace on fire, and was seen for upward of a hundred miles at sea. It also rose and spread itself above the lofty mountain peaks, so as to be distinctly visible on the leeward side of the island, where the wind drove the smoke in dense and massy clouds.

"The lava continued flowing toward the sea, which it reached on Thursday, four days from its first egress. At times it would rush forward with a velocity of a mile in a minute, and at others, a short distance only, then become very sluggish and move heavily and slowly on. Its general movement was in immense semi-circular masses, owing to its great consistency. These would roll on, gradually accumulating until the mass had become too heavy to hold itself together, while the exterior was partially cooled and solidified; then bursting, the liquid interior flowing out would join a new stream, and thus aid in forming another. By these accelerated and progressive movements, the wave-like ridges were formed, which are every where observable on the outer currents. At times, if forced its way under the circumjacent soil, presenting the singular appearance of earthy rocks and trees in motion like the waves of the ocean.—Mr. C. was standing near the stream and watching its progress, when the load beneath him began to rise, and in a few minutes he was 100 feet above his companions, who were but a short distance from him. He had barely time to leave this dangerous position before he was again thrown down, and out. The color of the whole stream was of the deepest crimson. On the windward side its heat was not so powerful but that persons could approach and plunge sticks into the fiery mass and draw forth specimens. So great was its heat, that large rocks were seen floating down the water like cork upon the water. In one night the stream appeared from a few rods to half a mile in width.

"The spectacle, when this burning mass reached the sea, and the lava was seen to rise to its highest degree. The conflict between the two antagonistic powers, fire and water, was on a scale which the eye of man but seldom witnesses. The heavens were lit up in an intense glare, while the sea was covered with a white foam, glassing all in every direction. Ashes and sand were thrown to a great height in the air, and descended for miles distant in showers of fiery spray. Volumes of smoke and steam rolled heavily up, rendering the lurid glare still more intense, and were accompanied by loud reports of exploding gases, and the roar of the conflicting elements were distinctly heard twenty five miles off, like discharges of artillery.

"With such rapidity and to such a degree was the water heated, that the following day (June 5th) the fish floated, when dead, as far as Keau, fifteen miles distant, where the water was hot to the touch."

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamer Acadia, arrived at Boston on the 2d inst., in 133 days from Liverpool, via Halifax. Liverpool dates are to the 19th ultimo. Not much of general importance had transpired since our previous dates. No findings of the steamer President. Every breeze from the broad Atlantic, to the anxious watchers, gave signs of woe, that all was lost. Every hope was abandoned to despair.

In the British parliament a succession of important debates had taken place on the corn laws and other financial matters, and this time they crossed the attention of the country. No very definitive action seems to have taken place. Among the less important subjects brought before the house of commons, we notice that Mr. O'Connell moved a committee to investigate the election riots in Canada.

Thomas Barnes, esq. for many years well known as the principal editor of the London Times, died during the second week in May.

Meeting has been held at Dublin, in order to make arrangements for a general meeting of the citizens to petition the queen to visit Dublin this summer.

In the house of lords on the 14th inst., lord Fitzwilliam, whose constant tirades against the corn laws upon every opportunity have been not unreasonably objected to, gave notice that no Monday next he should present a petition from the corporation at Manchester upon the subject of a total repeal, and should take occasion of entering fully upon the question, and particularly upon that part of it relating to our foreign trade.

Great as is the enthusiasm against the corn laws in England, it is much surpassed by the feeling which exists in Scotland, and there is scarcely a town or district of the least importance that has not petitioned, prepared to petition, or taken some other measures to accomplish the overthrow of the land-lord's monopoly. In addition to the immense number of petitions already presented to the legislature from Scotland, many, very many have been forwarded within the past week. From Edinburgh, petitions follow each other by dozens and half dozens at a time. The demonstration which "Auld Reekie" has made against the hated bread tax, by public meetings and by petitioning, is highly to the honor of the inhabitants of that great city, and is an example to the rest of the kingdom. Public meetings have been held at Greenock, Selkirk, Stirling, Kelso, Exeter, and many other places.

The Great Western arrived at Bristol on the 14th ult. in 14 days. The Columbia reached Liverpool on the 15th.

Horrid affair at sea. The ship William Brown, from Liverpool to Philadelphia, Haver, May 10, 1841. The Louis Philippe New York packet ship has this moment arrived. Information having reached the town that some shipwrecked seamen were on board, the report became general, and they belonged to the William Brown, the vessel was beyond all description. On the arrival in dock, however, a strong body of the gendarmes were in waiting, and immediately took into custody the mate and eight of the crew of the ship Wm. Brown, bound from Liverpool to Philadelphia, which was sunk by an iceberg in the latter part of last month, for as yet I cannot give you precise dates for any thing except that three men were taken from the Crecent, which vessel had picked them up in their long boat. But a list of horror is to be told about them. It appears, from the vessel struck, thirty-three passengers, the mate, and eight of the crew, took to the long boat; the captain, three of the crew, and eleven passengers, took to the jolly boat; all the rest sunk with the vessel. The boats parted in the night. Some days after, the mate and crew determined (as they say, in order to lighten the boat) to throw seventeen of the passengers overboard, which they accomplished, and some of the most horrid and revolting scenes took place.

There were two brothers and a sister of one family; the brothers were thrown over, and the sister jumped in after them. One fine boy prayed for a few minutes to say his prayers; they refused, and hurled him into the sea. One man, close to the side of the boat, praying for mercy, but their hands were cut off, and they were pushed into the deep. Fifteen ladies and two men remained in the boat. After this manner, the Crecent tell us with the boat, and saved the survivors from this horrid deed. The passengers remained on board the Crecent; the crew arrived in the Ville de Lyon; they underwent examination before the American consul. Each separately examined, and to the same statement, and they were released by the consul under the persuasion that the extremity of self-preservation had rendered the act excusable.

The following statement has been sworn to by the crew and two passengers.

"The passage was very rough, accompanied by squalls and loss of sails. On the night of the 19th of April, in lat. 43° 39' N. and 49° 39' W. long, making all sail in open sea, and running ten knots an hour, we labored under the vessel side of an iceberg, which stove her in. At ten minutes past six we struck upon another. I then proposed to the captain to take in all sail as quickly as possible, which we did; and sending the pump, we found two feet of water in the hold. On going below, I found that the vessel was rapidly making water. All hands set to work to discharge the boats, and at 11 o'clock, they were alongside. I deeded into the longboat, with eight of the crew and thirty-three of the passengers; the captain, lieutenant, a lady and five sailors embarked in the jolly boat, and we listened the boats together. At midnight the vessel sunk, and carrying with her thirty-three persons. We remained along side each other until five o'clock in the morning. Capt. Harris then informed us of his intention of leaving us, and making the best of his way to Newfoundland, and advised me to do the same. My boat being full and heavy, I could not manage it; to pursue that route was impossible. I, therefore, directed my course south. In the afternoon we fell in with a large quantity of ice. Throughout the night the wind blew with violence from the north in squalls, with rain and hail, and a very heavy sea. Finding that the boat was being surrounded by small and large masses of ice, that the water was going upon her, I thought it improbable she could hold out unless relieved of some of her weight. I then consulted the sailors, and we were all of opinion that it was necessary to throw overboard those who were nearly dead, until we had room enough to work the boat, and take to our oars.

The weather becoming worse, it was almost impossible to keep the boat afloat and discharge it from ice. At daybreak we were still surrounded by icebergs. On counting the passengers, 16 were missing, and the rest were in a desperate state, and almost stiff with cold. At 6 o'clock in the morning, we perceived to the westward a sail steering an easterly course. We exerted every effort to approach it. The captain being aloft in order to steer his ship through the ice, saw our boat, and notwithstanding the danger to his own ship, made sail for us. On Thursday morning at 7 o'clock we were within sight of her, and before long she came up all on board, was struck by the ice, which stove the boat. We, however, succeeded in saving her. Banks and islands of ice were in sight as far as the eye could reach. I then ascertained that it was the Crecent, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, capt. G. F. Ball, bound from New York to Havre. We met the kindliest reception on board, and assistance in the way of food and clothing were lavished upon us. "Signed by the crew saved in the boat, and two passengers: Francis Rhodes, mate; Lemercal, steward; H. Murray, cook; James Patrick and Jas. Black, passengers; Joseph Stretton, Alexander Williams, Charles Smith, James Northon, Isaac Freeman and William Miller, seamen.

"The above is a correct statement of the loss of the William Brown, which I have been able to learn from the mate and passenger. Signed, S. J. BALL, captain of the Crecent."

FROM THE EAST.

The Egyptian question is, at last, it appears, really settled. The difficulties which had arisen as to certain points in the hatti sharif of February 13, involving Mehemet Ali with the government of Egypt, have been totally removed in consequence of the proceedings of the representatives of the powers who have signed the 15th of July treaty, and this affair has been terminated to the satisfaction of all parties.

But the Egyptian question had no sooner been satisfactorily adjusted than insurrection broke out in Candia, and the representatives of the Turkish empire, which promise to be as difficult to put down as the refractory pasha. The armed insurgents in the island of Candia, amounted, at the latest dates, to about 17,000, and they were receiving new accessions.

INDIA.

The latest intelligence from India is declared by the London papers to be very unsatisfactory. In an engagement at the fort of Rajput, on the 20th of February, col. Wilson, a meritorious and valuable officer, and a considerable number of men were killed. In a late action between some troops of the Bengal establishment and a tribe of the Khyberies, the latter were defeated; but two European officers, capt. Dunder, and lieut. Pigott, of the Bengal engineers, were killed.

CHINA.

No important news from China has been received since the departure of the Britannia. The overland mail brought dates from China to the 13th February, Calcutta to the 22d March, and Bombay to the 1st April. The Chinese chief commissioner Keshen, in an interview with capt. Elliot, evinced an intention to procrastinate, which added, to a report that warlike orders had been received from Peking, produces an impression that hostilities must be renewed. Trade continued suspended, and the blockade was not raised. The government appears to be dissatisfied with Mr. Commissioner Elliot's proceedings, and colonel sir Henry Pottinger has gone out by the overland India mail as envoy, to supersede him, and with full power to settle all differences.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

PRESENTATION. The Chevalier Gaspar Jose Lisboa, minister resident of his majesty the emperor of Brazil, arrived in Washington on Friday evening, and on Saturday was presented, by the secretary of state, to the president, to whom the new minister delivered his letter of credence.

DOCUMENTS. The documents accompanying the president's message to congress consist of—
1. Correspondence between the secretary of state and the minister of Great Britain, concerning the case of Alexander McLeod.

2. A report from the secretary of state to the president of the United States, on two subjects connected with the commerce of the United States.

3. Report of the secretary of war to the president of the United States.

4. Report of the secretary of the navy to the president of the United States.

5. Report of the postmaster general to the president of the United States.

The report from the treasury department will of course be made, as usual, directly to congress.

THE PAWNEES. The Pawnee Indians number 6,244; but are entirely unimproved—dress exclusively to skins—manufacture no cloths, and have no agricultural implements. Singular as it is, they are said to be entirely free from the deleterious effects of intoxicating liquors. Their religious views are generally consistent with actual civilization. They are extremely superstitious, and give ready credence to the impostures of jugglers. Their women perform all the labor of raising vegetables, dressing skins for tents and beds, building houses, preparing food—in short, they do every thing, but kill the buffalo. [Boston Rec.]

The preceding tables, furnish a view of the tobacco trade, from 1821 to 1840.

It appears that during that period, there were exported 1,792,000 hogheads, valued by the treasury department, at $131,346,514, being an annual average of 86,600 hogheads, or $66,567,325.

During the years 1821 to 1839, (we have not received the account of 1840), there were exported 758,077 pounds of snuff, and $7,196,254 pounds of manufactured tobacco; valued together at $5,586,581 dollars.

For the first 10 years of the series, 1821 to 1830, there were exported 924,245 hogheads of tobacco, valued at $56,928,291; and during the last 10 years 1831 to 1840, 967,735 hogheads, valued at $74,457,222, being an excess in the last 10 years over the first 10, of hogheads 143,510, or 17,567,922 dollars.

The average annual export in the first 10 years was 82,424 hogheads, or $5,688,922; and during the second 10 years, 96,775 hogheads, or $7,415,722.

The average price during the whole 20 years was $73.21 per hoghead. For the first 10 years $69.11, and for the second 10 years $76.83, or it is 20 per cent taken as the average weight of the hogheads, the price during the 20 years will be 6 to 10-100 cents per pound—first 10 years $1.00, and second 10 years $1.06 to 100 cents per pound.

It is to be regretted that an account of the quantities of tobacco, the produce of the different states, has not been kept, as the quality of each varies, as does also the size of the hogheads.

It will be observed that owing to the short crop in 1839, the average price exceeds that of other years very considerably.

It is remarkable how nearly uniform, has been the quantity annually exported, for the last 20 years, with the exception of 4 or 5 years.

The second table, presents a view of the exports to those countries which receive from the U. States the largest share of our export of tobacco.

The whole amount sent in the 20 years was

To England 524,640 hds. $80,194,466

France 146,834 " 16,361,346

Holland 43,707 " 21,967,469

The average annual export in the first 10 years was 82,424 hogheads, or $5,688,922; and during the second 10 years, 96,775 hogheads, or $7,415,722.

To France in the 10 years, 1821 to 1830, were exported 65,822 hds.

To France in the 10 years 1831 to 1840, were exported 61,012 "

Being an increase in 10 years of 15,190 "

The annual average to France is 7,841 hds, or $818,967.

To Holland there were exported from 1821 to 1830 43,707 hds.

To Holland there were exported from 1831 to 1840 43,707 hds.

Being a decrease in the last 10 years of 18,631 "

The average annual export 51,189 hogheads, or $1,095,373.

To Germany from 1821 to 1830 were exported 389,515 hds.

To Germany from 1831 to 1840 were exported 389,515 hds.

Being an increase of 4,886 "

The average annual export 19,099 hogheads, or $956,709.

To all other countries the exports were in 1821 to 1830 158,310 hds.

To all other countries the exports were in 1831 to 1840 164,591 "

Being an increase of 6,281 "

Of other countries, Gibraltar on an average of the three last years received annually 5,130 hds.

Sweden and Norway, 1,564 hds. Belgium 1,253.

Italy 1,660. Cuba 769. Africa 1,108. Spain 1,067.

Scotland 854 hds.

We are indebted to the register of the treasury for the statement of exports of tobacco in 1840, in anticipation of the report on commerce and navigation.

In the preceding columns will be found various other tables and statistics of tobacco.

It appears by the article published this week relating to British commerce, that the duty paid in Great Britain in 1840 on unmanufactured tobacco was $2,555,956 against $2,481,908 in 1839.

The quantities imported in 1840, was $3,626,266 against $5,692,228 pounds in 1839.

THE ARMY.

General orders, No. 29. Adjutant General's office, 7th March, 1841.

The local and faithful services of a general of arms in Florida, during two campaigns, under a former commander, and now, as commanding general, entitle him to be relieved from this arduous duty; in accordance with his own desire, he will relinquish the command and report in person at the headquarters of the eastern division.

The secretary of war deems it but an act of justice to tender to gen. Armistead the thanks of the department for the services he has rendered, and that he has encountered the complicated difficulties that have hitherto obstructed the execution of the objects of the government in the treaty with the Indians of Florida.

11. Col Worth, of the 8th infantry, the officer next in rank with the troops in that quarter, will relieve gen. Armistead and assume the command of the army of Florida; and he will adopt all efficient and proper measures necessary for the speedy termination of hostilities, as well as to afford the most perfect protection and security to the frontier, and to such citizens as may be disposed to penetrate the country for lawful purposes of trade or settlement.

III. The president directs that hereafter all officers of every branch of the service, assigned to duty with the Florida army, shall only be relieved, or be transferred to orders of the general or other officer commanding the troops; and, when it may be necessary to withdraw any officer of the army from duty there, the requisite instructions will be communicated through the adjutant general's office.

IV. Offices of the general staff, serving in Florida, will report to, and receive the instructions of the officer assigned to the command of the army.

By order of ALEXANDER MACOMB, major general commanding in chief.

R. JONES, adjutant general.

A blunt soldier. Ever since Jack Falstaff commanded his company with but two thirds between them, we believe it has been the fashion to consider bluntness of manner the peculiar property of the soldier, and that like Othello, he was to be "rude of speech." This perhaps was the mark of bygone times, and destined to remain amid the lore of the past; for a late event had not revived it, in all its original beauty. This, it is good news to be true, and if not only shows how have been gulled by some waggish friend.

On Wild Cat's interview with major Childs, at Fort Pierce, the other day, after exhibiting his consequence in several outbursts of impudence, he saw an iron pot, which he recognised as having once belonged to him. Pursuing his strain of untutored eloquence, "You call yourself a warrior," said he, "and yet you took that pot from an old woman. If it had been a man, and the argument the pot was borne off, to gladden the old woman again with the delights of sofly."

[St. Augustine Gazette.]

Florida. A correspondent of the Baltimore Repository, writes on Sunday May 19. As I predicted, when the volunteers were ordered to the Indians would break through the line formed in front of the settlement by the regular troops, and get up in the settlements on the Georgia line—to our surprise this has happened. On the 14th inst. a party of about 15 Indians were discovered on a Braided branch, a fork of the St. Mary's river, and killed in that settlement two citizens, Mr. Brown and Mr. Green. From there, this party passed eastwardly to the settlement on the south prong of the St. Mary, and killed a Mr. Barn and his child. The citizens are up in this neighborhood, and trying to obtain arms to intercept this daring party, but unfortunately there are few to be obtained, the United States officers having within a short time, on discharging the militia, took all our guns away, leaving us defenceless and at the mercy of our merciless foe."

THE NAVY.

The apprentice. This, (says the Boston Journal), is the name of a little vessel on our coast, and is the Charleston navy yard—and which will soon be launched. She will not be a great deal larger than the launch of a line-of-battle ship, but of greater proportionate beam, and a more elegant model—consequently deeper and rigidly constructed like a full rigged brig—with all the various spars, ropes, sails and other appurtenances usually found on board vessels of that class, of which the apprentice will be but a miniature edition.

This vessel is intended to be used as a sort of nautical seminary, for the lads who enter the navy as apprentices, and who are attached to the Columbian, receiving ship, on that station. She will be a good looking, strong, comfortable and what is more, safe vessel—and the advantages in sailing skill and knowledge, which the apprentices must derive from cruising in such a craft, and performing all the various manœuvres, practised on board a man-of-war, must be too obvious to require enumeration.

Death of our Captain. Valparaiso papers to the 16th of March have been received, brought by the ship Natchez, capt. Hays, at New York.

The following extract is from one dated March 14th:—"On Sunday, 7th instant, at Talcahuana, departed this life, divisor Charles H. Adams, commander-in-chief of the United States navy from the Pacific. Yesterday morning (the 13th), the most respectable portion of the inhabitants of this town, citizens and strangers, officers of the vessels of war anchored in the bay, and the authorities of the place, formed the brilliant procession which paid him the last honors.

It was headed by the band and marine corps of the frigate Constitution, and closed by the crew of the vessel and the musicians of the British frigate President. His death is lamented by numerous friends and acquaintances. He has left a disconsolate wife and child."

General naval order. Navy department, May 31, 1841. A notice of respect to the memory of our comrade Alexander Christie, late of the navy of the United States, who died on board the frigate Constitution in the port of Concepcion on the 8th of March last, while in command of the United States naval forces in the Pacific ocean, the flag of the United States station and vessel of the United States navy are to be hoisted half-mast and thirteen minute guns fired at noon on the day after the receipt of this order.

Officers of the navy and marine corps are directed to wear crepe on the left arm thirty days.

GEO. E. BADGER.

Naval surgeons. The secretary of the navy has appointed the following gentlemen a board of naval surgeons to convene at Philadelphia on the 1st inst. for the examination of assistant surgeons, candidates for promotion, and of persons desirous of being appointed assistants in the navy—

W. P. C. Barton, M. D. president, of Philadelphia; Bailey Washington, M. D. of Washington; W. C. C. Barton, M. D. of New York; Benjamin F. Baché, M. D. of Ohio; G. R. B. Hoener, M. D. of Philadelphia. Dr. Thomas Harris was appointed a member of the board, but declined serving in consequence of indisposition.

We learn from the Norfolk Herald that an agent (B. Homan, esq.) has been appointed by the navy department, and has arrived at the navy yard opposite to Norfolk, (Va.) for the purpose of taking testimony in reference to charges which have been made against the existence of abuses in the civil departments of that yard.

The Philadelphia North American says—"The United States ship of the line Delaware is nearly ready for sea at Norfolk. She will sail immediately for the Mediterranean to supply the place of the Brandenburg and the other ships comprising the squadron soon on their way home. This precipitate return of American ships and the exposed position of our merchantmen in the quarter from whence the retreat was made, is manifest of common loss. The ship of the line, arrived at Valparaiso on the 20th of March.

The United States exploring expedition. From a Honolulu paper of December 5, 1840. The exploring squadron has now left our harbor to cruise in various directions. The Porpoise has sailed, (so it is said), for the southern groups, to return here in four months. The Peacock and Flying Fish to Ascension, King's Mill Group, and the Caroline Archipelago, thence to the Columbia river, in spring, when a store ship will sail from here for that place, with all necessary supplies, which will probably obviate the necessity of their returning here. The Financier has gone to Hawaii, for the purpose of making a thorough survey of the volcano, and Mount Lu, and all the interesting points in that vicinity. She will also go to the Columbia in a few months. Much has been done during the stay of the squadron, and we have no doubt but that the history of the expedition will give the most faithful account of the islands which has ever appeared, particularly in all departments of science. The artists, too, have been busy, and have taken many views of scenery, costumes and the portraits of chiefs and other persons of note. The salubrious climate has heretofore been supposed to be connected with the sea, and affected by tides, and the salt the product of evaporation, has been ascertained to be of mineral formation, and disconnected with the ocean. Salt is found 180 feet above the surface of the land, its depth, which was considered fathomless, (and rightly so), proved to be sixteen inches. The harbor at Ewa, or Pearl river, was surveyed, and found commodious for shipping, with a good entrance between the reefs with the assistance of water the best of the Honolulu harbor and adjacent bays were also thoroughly surveyed. Astronomical, meteorological, and magnetic observations and experiments have been daily and nightly made at the observatory with all the instruments with which the expedition is most liberally provided. The medium for determining the figure of the earth is the first that has ever been carried on a voyage of this kind, and promises the most interesting results. In many other respects the stay of the squadron has been most beneficial to the island. Business has revived, and much money distributed among the natives. The impression created on the mind of the chiefs by the department of the officers is of the most favorable nature, and will add much to the already high reputation gained by American officers for their government and country. It is needless to speak of the unmingled satisfaction and pleasure which the visit has produced among the natives. The natives manifested at their departure in the best evidence of this. May their future labors be as successful as their past, and as honorable to themselves and their country? [The Polynesian.]

STATES OF THE UNION.

PRODUCE OF NEW ENGLAND. The statistics of our country, collected by the marshals, at the last census, are among your proudest records. They display the boldness resulting from the new world's intrinsic wealth, which is entirely independent of circumstances, and of other nations, and foreshadow the rank we are destined to hold when the discoveries of science shall have been as fully applied to agriculture as to other branches of industry. The amount of produce raised in New England is worthy of special notice. Maine is put down as raising 848,166 bushels of wheat, 2,330,966 bushels of other grain, and 10,392,830 bushels of potatoes. This, with a population of 600,800—Massachusetts, with a population of 727,786 raised about 135,923 bushels of wheat, 3,604,854 of other grain, and 8,354,662 of potatoes. Vermont, considering her population, for outstrips the others, though it should not be remembered that she is purely an agricultural state, with the least distinguished for commerce as well as for agriculture. In that enterprising state, the farmers raise 642,963 bushels of wheat, 4,051,518 bushels of other grain, and 2,506,784 bushels of potatoes. Rhode Island raises but 2,828 bushels of wheat, 69,498 of other grain, and 904,773 of potatoes. Connecticut raises 85,958 bushels of wheat, 3,990,175 of other grain and 3,214,227 of potatoes. New Hampshire raises 442,754 bushels of wheat, 3,084,854 of other grain, and 6,224,001 of potatoes. [Tribune.]

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The governor and executive council were in session last week for the purpose of counting the returns of votes for members of congress and state senators. This duty having been accomplished, they adjourned on the 17th.

Votes for members of congress—Official.

MARSHALLS.

The mansion house of lieut. Gov. Winthrop, on Beacon street, Boston, was sold at auction on the 20th ult. for $12,800.

CONNECTICUT.

State prison. The annual report of the directors of this institution shows the number of convicts to have been 205, 74 of whom were received during this year. There are 147 males and 58 females, 7 white females and 5 black. Of the number, 143 were born in Connecticut. The income during the year has been $22,861 20; the expenses during the same time, $14,778 30, leaving the profits $8,083 90. From 1827 to 1841, the large sum of 72,205 dollars had been earned, of which $20,651 have been paid into the state treasury, and $14,627 expended on the prison buildings. During the past year, $1,000 has been paid to the Prison Discipline society, and the appropriation of $5,000, ($1,000 to each county), to aid in erecting new county prisons has been paid. The property which is now on hand amounts to $16,131, and there is due on notes and book account about $14,500. The warden recommends that the surplus earnings of the prison be appropriated to the erection and support of a hospital for the insane poor in this state.

New Haven and Northampton canal. We intend before this to have taken some notice of this canal. At the present time we can say but a few words. Hereafter we may give some further account of this great public work which has already cost a million and a half of dollars. This canal runs from New Haven through Nainden, Cheshire, Southington, Farmington, Avon, Simsbury, Granby, Southwick, Westfield, Southampton to Northampton, where it enters the Connecticut river. It affords a cheap, easy and safe communication to all that part of the country with a market. It is now in complete order, as will be seen by an advertisement in our paper of this date. We are informed that the present stockholders have divided to the company large sums of money to repair the breaches made by the flood last winter, and they have opened the canal as early as the frost would permit, and if we are correctly informed, as early as any canal in this state or in New England. The canal affords great public improvement but has already been neglected for several years past, and owing to the peculiar situation in which its stock was placed, was at one time in great danger of being abandoned, but the stock is now in different hands and differently situated, and if the public will, it will be a portion of its business to be done upon this canal, which can be better done there than elsewhere, it will be well supported, and that is all the company ask.

A model state. Old Connecticut, as exhibited by her governor in his late message, is an example to his sister states. Yankees abroad are proverbial for their industry, enterprise, indomitable energy and shrewdness. These are qualifications not picked up by travel, but are peculiar, and belong to their natural birthright. Hence, whenever we see a Yankee, we are sure to find a man that is able to take care of himself—to push his way through the world, often friendless and unaided, and by the exercise of his own energy not infrequently arriving at the very pinnacle of eminence. The education and experience of every one of us can point out many such an example. Now, how does all this happen? It is explained in a word—education. No sooner can we articulate than a spelling book is put in the hands of the child, to read and write becomes a part of his "bringing up," as much as eating, drinking and sleeping; and this is a duty not promptly by parental affection, but imposed by statute provision of the state. It is the policy of the state, the fundamental and primary principle of all her institutions, to give an education to all her citizens; and as this has been her chief care, the results have been, as they ever must be, a general diffusion of knowledge among every class of her citizens, qualifying them indiscriminately for every station, and making every office of honor or profit accessible to them.

Let it be borne in mind that the population of Connecticut is about 300,000, and that of this population, in the late census, but one man who was a citizen was found who could not read and write. Are we not justified, then, in holding up Connecticut as a model state? What a glorious monument of her greatness, are perennius, has she in her common school fund! Well may her children, scattered over the broad face of the earth, be proud of the place of their nativity, and yearn to her with the affection of a child towards a parent; for she has not only given them life, but what makes life alone valuable—education. [Masson (Ga.) Messenger.]

The legislature closed their session on Tuesday the 25th ultimo.

The legislature have passed the appropriation bill by an overwhelming majority. The bill appropriates $2,150,000 for the Erie canal and $550,000 for the Black River canal and $550,000 for the Genesee Valley canal—total, $3,250,000. The vote for the passage of the bill stood 77, and against it 33. Eighteen Van Buren members polled their votes for the passage of the bill.

State stock. Nine hundred thousand dollars of state stock has been issued to the New York and Erie rail road company since the 1st of October last, and $700,000 since the 1st of January. These stocks are at 54 per cent. and payable in 1841.

The Troy Watch. The locks on the enlarged canal in the vicinity of this city are double, and are constructed of stone in the most durable manner.—The cost of each lock will be eighty thousand dollars. Breach in the Erie canal. We learn from the Argus that there is a breach in the canal near the nine locks.

Trials of Genesee. This question, which has agitated Genesee county and occupied the legislature for several years, was disposed of on Wednesday so far as the action of the house is involved, by the passage of the bill to erect a new court from parts of Genesee, to be called Wyandott. The vote on the final passage of the bill was 69 to 24.

Female convicts. By an act which passed the legislature on Thursday, it is provided that "hereafter all female convicts sentenced in any county of this state to imprisonment in a state prison shall be sentenced to and imprisoned in the female convict prison at Mount Pleasant."

PENNSYLVANIA. Governor Porter has signed the bill providing for the election of county treasurers by the people.—The present county treasurers are retained until an election.

Election. The special election for congress, in the Fayette and Green counties district, has resulted in the election of Benson, (V. B.) His majority in Fayette county is 279.

A new loan. The secretary of the commonwealth has issued proposals for a loan of nine hundred and thirty thousand dollars, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable yearly, to be made at the state treasury, or the Bank of Pennsylvania. The principal to be reimbursed within five years; certificates of stock for the said loan will be issued in the usual form, bearing interest and reimbursable as any other county treasury.

The relief bill. The following are the yeas and nays on the passage of the revenue bill by the constitutional majority of two-thirds. Those in affirmative are the Van Buren members who voted for the bill, Yeas—Messrs. Andrews, Banks, Barst, Bell, Bond, Brewster, Clatsop, Clark, Clark, Correy, Cortright, Cox, Cunningham, Darris, Dilworth, Douglas, Dunlap, Eyrer, Faus, Foeman, Funk, Fulton, Gansley, Gillet, Gratz, Hanna, Higgins, Hinchman, Hokeness, Horton, Johnson, (Atkins) Kennedy, Kerr, Kieffer, Law, Letherman, Livingston, Luck, May, McClure, McCurdy, Middlewirth, Miles, Montgomery, Musser, Myer, Pearson, Penell, Purnoy, Rush, Skinner, Smith, Smyser, Snavely, Snyder, Spout, Steel, Titts, Van Noida, Weaver, West, and Wilson.

Nays—Messrs. Anderson, Apple, Barr, Benn, Bonelli, Broadhead, (North), Cronisall, Ebaugh, Felton, Flannery, Flenniken, Fitch, Fogel, Garretson, Hahn, Hall, Johnston, (Westmont), Kutz, Leidy, McCully, McKimney, Moore, Painter, Penniman, Pollock, Scott, Wilkinson—28.

Address to the people of Pennsylvania. The undersigned, your senators and representatives, being obliged to separate after the discharge of their arduous duty, deem it to be their duty to present a view of the public affairs of the commonwealth with reference to their past and present administration, and the hopes which every good citizen has a right to entertain of a change for the future. During the session of the legislature which has just terminated, they have labored with a zealous purpose of meeting the expectations of the people and the responsibilities imposed upon them by a state of things unparalleled in the history of our country. As the expression of the wishes of the people reached them, as petitions for relief in a season of unequalled distress were presented to them, they sought to meet these wishes, and by one measure of relief after another, such as have passed both houses to do for the people what the people had a right to unhappily for those who sought relief, and for the legislature who desired to afford it, the executive authority has been coarsened upon an individual, who, exercising it with no view but for the relief of the people, has been obliged to have resorted to indicate his measures of either relief or reform, or been willing to unite with us in ours. There is a course of official duty which the constitution contemplates on the part of the executive, derived from his position of confidence and a mysterious reserve, which, had it been pursued by the present executive, would have abridged our session, simplified our labors and enabled us to return home with the happy assurance that the government, by the exercise of his action in its various departments, had relieved the distress and perplexity of its constituency. That course is the same which the patriot Harrison intended to pursue, to which his successor is pledged, and the reverse of the dark and sinister policy of action in which the present governor has pursued. It seems to us that the legislature is late to the legislature, who coming more recently from the people best know their wants, but in the letter of the constitution it is "from time to time to give to the general assembly, information of the state of the commonwealth, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall deem expedient," and in its spirit it is by those (representatives) to acquire in the action of the immediate representatives of the people what it violates either the constitution or some essential principle of good government.

The middle course between obtrusive interference and stubborn reserve, the present executive of Pennsylvania seems unable to discern, and the legislature has been compelled with no other consolation than the honest effort to do duty always, to wait for weeks and months unable to attain a glimpse of executive criticism except when they were made manifest in reform frequently couched in disrespectful language, or as they could be gathered from the intimations of accredited partisans in and out of the legislature acted, and in some instances have been called to leave us to act. We wish a suffering people to understand this and to listen to the proof.

The session of the legislature commenced on the first Tuesday of January, 1841. The state of things throughout the country was such that it was almost certain. The banks were in a state of general suspension. The currency consisted mainly of the notes of the United States, and for the settlement of the small accounts which form so large a proportion of our business, the use of the bank currency was accessible but the illegal and discredited state note currency from abroad. A promised resumption of specie payments was at hand and every good citizen looked forward with the hope if not the expectation that it might be permanent. The community might not have been called to witness a scene of universal discredit. There were many who believed that no permanent resumption could be effected without the beneficial intervention of the general government, and on that interpretation of the wisdom and patriotism of a president chosen by Pennsylvania itself we confidently relied. But the governor was not one of these. He relied on the efficacy of state legislation directed by mere party impulse, he showed in none of our expectations of action at Washington, he never expressed and probably never felt any state of confidence which the reason and good feeling of the people reposed in the wisdom and patriotism of the lamented Harrison. Now we ask you to mark the course of his administration. When the banks resumed specie payments—on the first of February the governor negotiated a loan of nearly $800,000 dollars with the banks and majority with the Bank of the United States—on the 4th of February he bank again suspended and in a season of almost hopeless prostration have they remained estranged.

On the 5th day of February, the intelligence of the calamity reached the seat of government through private channels. The legislature, after pausing to give the executive an opportunity of presenting his views at this crisis proceeded without further delay to do its duty, and legislate for the crying necessities of the people. To enable the executive to suggest his remedy for the evil then impending, was the duty of the legislature. We waited, but we waited in vain. The executive functions were paralytic. No word fell from the lips of the governor, and so far as we or the public are apprised of his views as voluntarily expressed, we were left in the dark. The state of the currency, hopelessly irredeemable for the suffering people, he wrapped himself in mysterious silence, and made no effort, gave no sign that promised relief.

Not so your representatives. Unaided—uncounselled by the executive, they assumed the responsibility, and measures of relief were originated, matured and enacted. Mixed, however, with the prayer for relief, there was an emphatic demand for reform. The executive, who had been the agent of administration of relief and reform, that our measures were prepared.

It was not long before the measure of bank reform and not popular relief was enacted by both houses. It was right in its character and its effect, and it was generous and beneficial for the people. It limited the powers of bank officers and directors, it checked inordinate banking operations. It was not the extravagant privilege of disregarding law. It was the privilege which necessity created, and it was a measure of relief that privilege, and connected vital measures of reform, which the people had long demanded. So far as the legislature was concerned, their duty was promptly and faithfully performed.

Not so still the legislature has thus acted, that any executive intimation was made. It came, as usual, in the form of a peremptory refusal to acquiesce in the views of the representatives of the people, and it left the legislature to mature its measures again, and guessing at the varying opinions of the executive to try to enact laws which might conform to them, and at the same time be consonant with public policy and constitutional requisition.

With what an anxious desire to regulate our course by wise and disinterested views, to do what a just exigency requires and no more, to conciliate our political adversaries, and for once to unite with them, or persuade them to unite with us, in a common effort to relieve the suffering community, those who were immediate spectators of the scene but can tell. One of the undersigned, expressing the feelings of us all, in the senate, explicitly tendered to the friends of the executive the assurance of an earnest desire to bury mere party feeling, and co-operate cordially in measures at which no party cavil could be uttered. But it was in vain. The only answer was the declaration that the undersigned denied the existence of all distress among our constituents.

Not discouraged by the failure of all these efforts, the undersigned again matured a measure of relief, designed to effect the great object in the attainment of which we believe, the hopes of the people themselves—and above all it specially appropriated the money to be raised to certain objects and made it an offence against the law for its officers to infringe upon the appropriations. There was to be no transfer of money from this fund to any other; no drawings from one pocket to pay into another; no concealing deficiencies of defalcations by ingenious transfers—no puzzling the public mind by intricate accounts; but every cent of revenue raised by its appropriate officer judicially to be accounted for by the executive nor his agents, could without detection misapply it. This constitutional "coercion" we thought we had a right to apply, and yet it is of this restraint, which the constitution itself enjoins, and which we were bound to prescribe, that the executive complains as a dangerous encroachment on his prerogative. From this complaint we again appeal to the popular judgment to sanction a measure which would deserve approval if it contained no other provision than this. We trust that no legislature will ever be so deterred from imposing this wholesome restraint on the power of the executive on the treasury.

So far as the relief bill affected the banking institutions of the state, to the great surprise of the undersigned, it was found that the views of the people on one point suddenly become consonant with theirs. At the beginning of the session he denounced small notes as an evil which was on every account to be avoided and strenuously urged the prohibition of notes under ten dollars. At that time the people were suffering for the want of this currency, but the executive prejudices were obdurate. At the beginning of this session his views were unchanged. So late as the 8th of April, when he avowed the reform bank bill he still professed hostility to small notes even to a limited amount, and made this one of his objections to that measure of salutary regulation. By his recent veto it however appears that within a short time the executive on this subject has changed his ground, and that influential considerations which he has heretofore had in relation to which in charity we will not pretend to speculate, he too is in favor of this mode of relief to the community. We apprehend that the people will appreciate the sincerity of his past professions and the due gratitude for his acquiescence in their wishes.

Not discouraged yet but anxious to preserve the public credit at all hazards, in order to save the executive from the stain which must rest on him, and on him alone, if by the course he has thought to pursue the legislature were forced to consider without definite action, still perplexed by obscure intimations of his will, and sympathizing deeply with the suffering people, the undersigned determined to act on their own responsibility, and accordingly to propose a measure of relief by a counter-bill of propriety. If public gratitude be due, no share of it is due to the executive.

It is a measure of compromise to which we ask the cordial and generous consideration of the people. It is a measure of expediency and not of principle. It is a measure which gives relief and deserves the popular approval.

Such has been our general course of action on the great measure of relief and reform—and is to that action we now intend to adhere. We are confidently invite your candid and generous consideration. Could the governor have been induced to depart from his oracular reserve, and appealing to the impartial judgment of the people, a reliever which never fails, frankly have indicated his views or expressed his willingness to take counsel, free and honest counsel with the legislature on such subjects, much time and expense might have been spared, and long ago might we have returned to those who sent us hither and told them that councils of patriotism had prevailed, popular necessities been relieved, and wholesome reform enforced. If the result had been different, the responsibility would not be with us. If we had left the people without relief, we should have left them in the hands of the executive.

But this subject is not the only one for which legislation was needed. Nor is it the only one in which the wishes of the people have been frustrated by the unstable and perverse will of the executive.

At least ten executive vetoes disgraced the journals of this session, and in but one of them has the governor pretended to indicate other than considerations of local expediency of which the representatives of the people believed they were the best judges. And in this single exception, strange as it may seem to our fellow citizens, so few of whom are ignorant of the provisions of the constitution under which we live, the governor founded his objections on a clause in an obsolete constitution which more than two years ago was abrogated by a vote of the people. Notwithstanding the carelessness either to admit the error, if error it was, or assign the true cause of the misrepresentation until it had been discovered and rebuked by the vigilant action of his representatives of the people. For proof of this assertion, none will be required but from a sense of justice, the undersigned referred to the journals, where it will be seen that in a message on the 10th February last, the governor quoted as in force the old constitution as justifying his negative to an important bill, and that on the 12th, not however, until after the mis-quotation had been detected in the house of representatives, he acknowledged it in a supplemental communication and attributed it to a mistake in transcribing. No one can read the passage with the greatest care, but he believes it was an accidental error. We ask the people to examine the journals and then judge for themselves.

This is the solitary instance in which the governor has from his legislation on account even of pretended constitutional considerations, evaded the plain and simple facts of the constitution. It will show the plain and simple facts of the constitution as conferred on him are fresh in our recollection. They will show to the people how the public time has been wasted by the constant and frivolous executive interference.

It became necessary to supply the omission of a prothonotary in Huntingdon county to note the record of a deed bearing an entailed estate—a petition was presented, referred and examined, and a bill to the effect required was passed into a law. No remonstrance was presented though ample time was afforded. No public policy was affected. The bill passed in connexion with an important public bill extending to all religious societies without distinction, the right to have lands for churches and burial grounds. Notwithstanding the public expediency, and for no adequate reason, the executive returned the measure with his unexplained objections. The stain of religious intolerance was left on our statute book, and the public time was wasted by the needless re-asserting that which was confessedly unexceptionable.

If the people of Lancaster county desire to abolish an useless court prostituted to party uses, the executive differing in opinion, but suggesting no constitutional objection, they may suggest the reference of the question to the votes of a portion of the people of the county.

If according to his suggestion, the question is referred to the decision of all who contribute to the support of the county, a right to decide on its constitutionality, the obduracy of executive will is softened, and he vetoes the bill again, because he thinks on the question differently from the representatives whom the people of the very county has elected.

But worse than all—the governor will not permit the legislature even to regulate the discipline of a county prison—a bill providing for a change in the mode of appointment of inspectors, warden and door keepers of a prison in Chester county was passed by both houses, and has been vetoed by the governor for no other pretext than that which differing views of expediency afforded. The people must judge of this abuse of power.

If then he tolerated—if on all questions of local interest he had been guided by the common sense of the choice of representatives, then through their representatives, and the legislature has exercised its true and honest discretion, the executive is to interfere and thus defy the popular will, far better would it be to dispute with this complicated system of popular representation, its expense and its

The debts due for repairs alone, amounted to two hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars, due generally to poor men who have contributed their labor to keep the public works in such condition that they may render revenue to the commonwealth. Cases of individual hardship have been brought before us to view at which any heart would sicken, except the cold and callous hearts of those, who, elevated above the sympathies of ordinary humanity, can see the benefit of labor, and yet deny to it its just reward. There may be many such debts too, that the undersigned have anxiously labored.

The other public creditors, to those by whose pecuniary contributions the internal improvement system has been constructed, there was due at least an effort on the part of the state to discharge its obligations. Relying too confident on the people, the legislature of the executive, that by no act of his the state credit would be impaired or the public faith violated, we assume the hazardous responsibility of exacting from the people new contributions to the system.

The ruthless and disgraceful system of borrowing to pay interest on the loans, has been thought and still think ought to be arrested. They have endeavored to do so, and if they had failed, the responsibility would not be theirs. The state credit must and ought to be at all hazards and at any cost to be sustained. The state debt is the aggregate of every man's promise, and if dissonant rest on the delays, and give to the government that unity of design which appears in the view of the executive would seem to be its perfection.

At any other point of view, the undersigned are free to admit that he believes a different course would have been pursued by the governor. A wanton abuse of power without object, they are disposed to attribute to no public functionary. But on the eve of an election, the incumbent of the executive office is a candidate for re-election, the infirmity of human nature, always developed in the tenaciousness of office, is only overcome by a spirit of independence, such as even by his friends is not claimed for the present incumbent. To retain the possession of patronage and power, to cultivate factions of party influence, however minute—whether among the tip slaves of a mayor's court, or the turnkeys of a county goal, to secure all doubtful friends—to dispose with the execution of the laws—to pardon admitted libellers before trial, and give a plenary indulgence to them to violate all law hereafter, are some of the fruits of the privilege of re-election operating on unscrupulous partisans. The undersigned had no reason to regard the present possessor of power to be exceptions to the rule.

Sensible to this exposure to temptation and yielding to the expression of public opinion on this point, the undersigned, at an early period of the session procured the passage of an amendment to the constitution limiting the executive to a single term. If on any one point the public voice has spoken, it is on this. The promoter of the amendment, Harrison, a promise, the integrity of which even political animosity did not question that in no event would he be a candidate for re-election, and his opinion that such an amendment to the federal constitution was desirable, and that it was the great principle in the affections of the people of Pennsylvania, and each day's experience tends to ripen that sentiment into deliberate judgment. Does any one doubt that had the present governor of Pennsylvania been elected a second term, he would not have more faithfully discharged his high duties and would have raised himself beyond the sphere of party movement to which he seems to be confined? Unfavorable as is the judgment which the undersigned has concluded to take in favor of the present executive, they have no hesitation in saying that his conduct and policy would have been different had the temptation to do wrong been withheld.

Before the 4th of March last, when the present governor was re-nominated, the amendment to the constitution had passed the senate where it was resisted by the friends of the administration, and was under consideration in the house of representatives. It afterwards passed the house of representatives by an overwhelming majority, but eight members voting in the minority, and they all credited friends of the executive.

It must next indirectly be submitted to the people, always the last and surest resort, and by them at the next general election it must be decided. We submit it to you as part of our acts. Having weighed it well, having looked at it in all its relations to the interests of the people which we were sent here to guard, we submit it to you and to your decision now as ever shall we submit. The next legislature must revise this act of ours and we appeal to you to make this the test hereafter.

There was one other great public interest to which the attention of the undersigned was early called. They refer to the condition of the public works, and to the abuses which were supposed to exist there. There was a prevalent opinion among the people that the canal commissioners, dependent immediately on the executive, had prostituted their high functions, and had bestowed on personal and political favorites a large share of the patronage which unlawfully fell to the people, they are authorized to disavow. The public has been startled by its confidence by the astonishing disclosure that the public works during the last two years under the care of the present canal board have cost for management and repair the sum of two millions one hundred and fifty-five dollars, on an average of one million and seventy-five thousand and forty dollars for each year of governor Porter's administration, whilst during the late administration the average even at periods of extraordinary accident never exceeded eight hundred and six thousand six hundred and ninety six dollars. Unable to account for this by any theory but that which is founded on conviction of the want of integrity of the public agents, and earnestly desiring to restore public confidence to the magnificent system of improvements for which so much has been expended and in the success of which the best hopes of the people are centered, the house of representatives soon after its organization instituted a thorough investigation into the conduct of the canal board. Its results will soon be before the world and to those results we direct your early attention. They justify suspicion—they authorize and demand the strongest examination—they are the results of calm and deliberate inquiry in which justice was fairly done, ample opportunity of excruciation afforded, witnesses were publicly examined and cross-examined, and the canal commissioners were stand before the public, convicted on unquestioned evidence of gross and palpable abuse of power. Who can wonder at the increasing expenditure on our public works, when they read and hear of such instances as one or two, which taken alone, would do more to retard the progress of the enterprise, are but specimens of worse and more startling developments hereafter.

It became necessary to purchase ropes for the inclined planes. The best article was offered by manufacturers of unquestioned merit and could have been procured for the aggregate amount of $7,577. A political partisan offered it to the disposers of the public bounty for $9,049. The competition was no longer equal, the partisan obtained the contract, and on this one article the commonwealth lost eleven hundred and seventy-one dollars.

It became necessary to relay eleven miles of rail road near the city of Philadelphia. It was in unquestioned proof that this work might have been done at a less cost, if it had been done for thirty-five thousand five hundred and eighty-six dollars, causing a loss of more than eighteen thousand dollars, for reasons so obvious as patriotic as those which regulated the purchase of ropes.

Among the largest and most important work on our canal line is the construction of the reservoir near Hottel's Landing. For this work three offers were made, and the contract given to a political friend—at what cost, to you fellow citizens, will thus appear.

For grubbing and clearing, two contractors offered to do it for $350; John Mitchell charged $700, and he was the successful bidder.

For rock excavation, two contractors offered thirty-nine cents, and Mr. Mitchell has it for forty-eight cents.

For common excavation between thirty-two and thirty-four cents, and one hundred four cents, but Mr. Mitchell offered thirty-two cents, and he has the contract too.

For good earth embankment one contractor offered seventeen cents and one fifteen cents, but Mr. Mitchell has it for twenty cents.

For coarse silt embankment one contractor offered nineteen cents, another seventeen cents, and Mr. Mitchell has it for thirty cents, and so it will appear throughout it is demonstrable that the loss to the commonwealth in this one work will be less than twenty thousand dollars.

On the western reservoir it was ascertained that it cost the state upwards of twenty-two thousand dollars to clear from timber about four hundred acres.

Had no other inducement existed, there would have been in these disclosures enough to justify immediate action and a change in the tenure of these canal commissioners. A bill was immediately introduced to that effect, with the design of changing the tenure and giving to the legislature and the government a concurrent power of appointment. But the tenaciousness with which power holds on to patronage, was too strong to be relaxed, and the measure abandoned to the wishes of the people, and their necessities tell before the veto power. The executive suggested a reference to a veto of the people, to that suggestion we have acceded, and there is now in his hands a veto to exercise at his discretion. If we do not pretend to conjecture. Let the people wait on the executive decision.

We are now about in separate and to mingle with our constituents. We shall find them oppressed by difficulty and embarrassment, such as we have labored anxiously to alleviate and remove. The period will soon come when the popular will is to be again expressed, and the question is to be again determined into whose hands the executive power of the state is to be entrusted for the next three years. What that decision will be, we do not doubt. The events of the winter have added to the necessity of the change—and to that change alone must the people look for relief.

DELAWARE.

Levee. The Journal says: "We have just seen the volume of laws passed at the late session of our legislature. It is quite a large volume, and shows that the legislature was not idle during their brief session. We regard the Delaware assembly as a model for the imitation of other states. It is the smallest legislative body in the union, has the shortest sitting, and contains the least number of those expensive animals, talkers. The cost incurred for legislation by this state is a mere trifle. True, we are not blessed with the veto system, which costs the law maker, Syphilis-like, to roll their cumbersome labors to the top of the hill only to be rolled back again. For the perfect working of this system, see Pennsylvania."

VIRGINIA.

The conversion of the Protestant Episcopal church of Virginia, closed its session on Saturday at Alexandria. The Gazette states that the right rev. bishop Meade, for the benefit of his health, which has been infirm for some time past, will be absent from his charge for the next three or four months, and will embark in the next steam packet from Boston for Liverpool.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Episcopal convention. The annual convention of the Protestant Episcopal church of the diocese of N. Carolina, opened at St. Paul's church, in that town on Wednesday last. The bishop of the diocese was present, as were nineteen of the clergy of the same; being the whole number but three. The rev. Dr. May, of Philadelphia, and the rev. Mr. Lyman, of the diocese of Maryland, were also present at visitors. [Wilmington, (N. C.) Chron.]

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Yellow fever. Observations made in Charleston, at various periods, in reference to the yellow fever, go to establish the fact that the disease is not equally fatal to all classes of the inhabitants. According to a paragraph in the Alexandria Gazette on this subject, the deaths of the blacks, who form, at least, one-third of the population, have only been at the rate of a half per cent, while the French and the Americans have lost, at the rate of one and a half, the Dutch two, the Americans three and the English four per cent. Generally speaking, persons of a sanguine temperament have been most in danger, for the mortality among them has amounted to a tenth, while among bilious people it has been only a fifteenth. Females have suffered much less than males.

Mr. Cuthoun. This gentleman has been on a visit to his son residing in Marengo county, Ala. The Montgomery Advertiser gives the following abstract of a speech made by him in that city on the 6th inst.

The abstract of his speech says: "Of the establishment of a national bank, as the most prominent of these measures—he spoke more fully—of the original attempt to insert the power of chartering such an institution in the constitution, the plain, positive and decided negative put upon that attempt, the manner in which that negative, followed as it was by an express act of congress as to the collection of the revenue in gold and silver, was evaded by Mr. Hamilton, and finally set at naught by the establishment of a national bank."

By the side of this, says the Baltimore American, we may place the following short extract from one of Mr. Cuthoun's speeches in the senate, not long prior to 1837:

"I might say with truth, that the bank o' us as much to me as to any individual in the country; and I might even add, that had it not been for my efforts, it would not have been chartered."

Mr. Senator Preston addressed a large meeting of the friends of the administration in Charleston on the 22nd.

GEORGIA.

The edifice of the LeGrange high school, in Troup county, was destroyed by fire on the night of Tuesday, the 11th instant, together with all the books and apparatus, both chemical and philosophical, belonging to the institution. Loss, from 6,000 to 97,000.

Singular state of affairs in Georgia. The last Montgomery Journal discloses a singular state of affairs in Barbour county, in that state. The proslavery party have resisted the authority of a Federal magistrate, and refused to recognize a writ of "habeas corpus" issued by judge Pickens. The history of the case is given briefly as follows:

George W. Lore, was arrested some months since on suspicion of highway robbery, accompanied by a most foul and horrid murder, was admitted to bail by judge Booth after a trial had been made, on questionable security, as was supposed by many of the citizens of Barbour. Suspicion in the matter led to an examination, when no bond could be found in the clerk's office, and as the gentleman who have Lore in charge, state in their answer to the requisition of judge Pickens, there was no evidence that he had ever been executed. Under these circumstances they state in substance, that entertaining no doubt of the guilt of Lore, they arrested him as he was about to escape from the country, and are determined to retain him till the production of a sufficient bond, or he be brought to trial. They have, say the "Star," consequently notified the jail at Greenville, in which Lore is confined, from a determination to resist his surrender at all hazards.

This is certainly a curious and extraordinary state of things, and may well, as it does, excite anxiety as to its result. The persons who detain the prisoner, contrary to the writ of "habeas corpus," state their reasons in very respectful language, and the affair as it now stands, presents the singular spectacle of the people in no manner with their judiciary, and resisting the officers of justice to obtain the ends of justice.

MISSISSIPPI.

The season. The latest information from Mississippi, brings accounts of great damage to the young crops by rain and hail storms which occurred there the first week in the last month. Previous to those, drought had prevented the growth of the cotton plants, and there was a general complaint of "bad lands." A letter to the New Orleans Bulletin says:

"On the hills, the soil and the cotton are both washed off to a great extent; and on the low lands the crops are mostly either drowned out or covered with mud. Such a rain I have never before witnessed. It has extended over the whole country, and materially affected the prospects of the planters." Another writer says—"I have lost $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 of my crops."

KENTUCKY.

The people of Mercer met pursuant to adjournment, on the 3d May, at the court house when general Mr. McAfra was called to the chair, and John Adams appointed secretary. The meeting entered into several resolutions of a general character, and adjourned over to the 1st Monday in June. It was a large and crowded meeting, and bore marks evident of old Mercer's determination to embark in the celebration of the 66th anniversary of the settlement of Kentucky, with characteristic spirit and liberality. Every exertion and effort are being made by the citizens of our county, in preparation for the celebration, and you may expect a fair exhibition of her wonted hospitality. Preparations will be made for the accommodation of fifteen thousand people, and many more, if necessary. There will, doubtless, be that many persons present. The hon. Benjamin Hardin has accepted the invitation to deliver the address on the occasion, and the rev. Mr. Styles, or the rev. Mr. Bancroft, is expected to preach a sermon then and officiate as minister during the celebration.

"That this celebration will be every thing 'Harrod' anticipates, is calculated not a doubt. Why should it not be a 'celebration of the people of Kentucky'?" The rancor and bitterness of party spirit which prevailed at the time of the celebration at Boonsborough, was such that all semblance of whatever nature or character, were presumed to be "meetings for political purposes;" and although no such spirit prevailed at Boonsborough, we have no doubt it prevented many from attending, who would otherwise have been present. There can be no fear of such an object at Harrodsburg; the narrow lines of party are merged; literally forgotten in the great object the good people of old Mercer, have in contemplation. It will be a meeting of no ordinary character;—the people will be there to their majesty—a mighty assembly of freemen, to bow down before an almighty and supreme Father, and offer their united and heartfelt thanks for His watchfulness and guidance to our fathers, in their 'straitened' and tried men souls. The day of which the Indiana Statesman has so nobly and so judiciously raised the first "log cabin" in the "fairly land called Kan-ack-ee," is, indeed, one in commemoration of which, all lovers of that "fairly land" should most cordially unite. From that day, we may date the commencement of those sanguinary struggles between the daring hunter and the savage, in which it is truly said, "that hecatombs of white men were offered by the Indian, to the God of battles, in their desperate and ruthless contention for Kentucky." Let the "daughters of the mighty west," forget that unbounded generosity of James Harrod and his venerable relic, who yet lives, have descended upon "old Mercer." "There will be ample room for all; come ye all in and make merry. Let not the 'daughters of the mighty west,' forget that they too, should be present; let them remember that their mothers were actors in the scenes in the "dark and bloody ground"—that though they had no jewels whereby to purchase ammunition for patriots, they were free to give their "petticoats for patching."

OHIO.

Heavy hogs. Warren county is as hoggin' a portion of the state as any other. No part of Ohio affords better farming stock than the Warren county stock. Messrs. Price and Enten of Springfield, Warren county, cut up during the past season 119 hogs, good sized pigs two. One weighed 814 lbs. net, one 810 lbs.; 982 averaged 300 lbs., 384 averaged 324 lbs. and 25 weighed over 400 lbs. each. The 800 lb. pig was half blood Berkshire. The Warren boys can go to the head!

POLITICAL—PRESIDENTIAL.
OLD IRONIDES CLUB—COMMODORE STEWART.
Philadelphia, May 24th. 1841. Pursuant to public notice a special meeting of the club, was held at the Head Quarters, corner of Sixth and Carpenter streets. The meeting was large, spirited and enthusiastic; the spectators room in which it was held, was filled to overflowing. The committee appointed to address a letter to commodore Stewart, informing him of the nature and object of the club, and asking an expression of his political sentiments, submitted the annexed correspondence. The letter of the gallant commodore, was received with reiterated bursts of applause. The following resolutions were then unanimously adopted and ordered to be published in all the democratic papers.

Resolved, That this association has received with the highest satisfaction and pride, the able and patriotic letter of commodore Stewart, and that we find in all its sentiments and principles, the fullest assurance of his devoted attachment to the principles, party and candidates of the people.

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the correspondence be published in pamphlet form by this club, and offered to the people of the union, as containing the sound principles of the democratic party since the days of Washington.

Resolved, That the president appoint a committee of sixty, to be composed of twenty members from each congressional district, to make arrangements for a suitable celebration of the approaching anniversary of the national independence.

Resolved, That this meeting adjourn to meet on Saturday evening next, at 8 o'clock, at the same place, where all democratic citizens of the city and county, favorable to the object of the club, are respectively invited to attend.

GEORGE SMITH, president.

ROBERT K. SCOTT, secretary.
ROBERT P. DESHVER, clerk.

Commodore Charles Stewart. Sir: The undersigned have been convened together, on behalf of the Old Ironsides club of the city and county of Philadelphia, to enclose to you the following preamble and resolutions unanimously adopted at a stated meeting held on the 15th inst.

Whereas, The Old Ironsides club of the city and county of Philadelphia, having fairly placed the name of commodore Charles Stewart, of Pennsylvania, before the people for the highest office in their gift; and,

Whereas, The Old Ironsides club having the most full and entire confidence in his patriotism and devotion to those democratic principles, which were first promulgated by Jefferson, and which have since been recognized as sound in doctrine and practice in their fullest extent by Madison, Monroe, Jackson and Van Buren; and,

Whereas, The Old Ironsides club deeming it proper that com. Stewart should be officially informed of the organization and the end and purpose of the club, therefore be it

Resolved, That the president be requested to appoint a committee of five to address commodore Stewart on behalf of this association, informing him of its organization, and of the end and purpose of its formation.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to address such a letter to com. Stewart, enclosing this preamble and resolutions, as they shall think expedient to the occasion, in order that he may acknowledge the club and the people of the union shall receive from him in reply, an expression of his political opinions.

From these proceedings you will perceive, that the association, we have the honor to represent, composed as it is of the number of the democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, entertaining the fullest confidence in your patriotism and high mental endowments, your honest and consistent attachment to those pure fundamental principles of the democratic faith which were first promulgated by Jefferson and perpetuated by Jackson—and remembering your brilliant and brave achievements on the ocean in defence of the rights, honor, interests and liberties of the people of this union, we have no doubt that you will acknowledge and glory of your country, have placed your name before the nation as a candidate for the noble position within the reach of human ambition—that of the chief magistracy of a great and a free people.

It is not the province of the undersigned here to discuss your civil qualifications for the important post for which you have thus been nominated under every duty that it enjoins, or your claim to the title or the first naval statesman and hero of the age; in proof of the former we refer with confidence to the pages of our nation's history, and of the latter to our country's enemies. Ours, sir, is the duty of informing you of the movement thus made by your political and personal friends in the country of your nativity, and to inquire of you whether you will allow them, in conjunction with your democratic fellow citizens throughout the union, to prevent your name on behalf of the people you have periled your life in defending, to a democratic national convention for its adoption.

The undersigned have also been instructed to obtain an expression of your opinion of those democratic principles which have distinguished the party of the people since the days of the great apostle of democracy, in order that the people of the union may be satisfied that you are, as you ever have been, the firm, devoted and consistent friend of civil rights, equal legislation, religious, civil and political liberty.

Philadelphia, May 22d, 1841.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to receive your communication as a committee of the "Old Ironsides club of the city and county of Philadelphia," accompanied by their resolutions passed at their stated meeting held on the 13th inst. In your communication you remark that "the association being composed of a large number of the democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, entertaining the fullest confidence in my patriotism and mental endowments, as well as my honest and consistent attachment to the pure fundamental principles of the democratic faith, as promulgated by the great disciple of liberty, Thomas Jefferson, and perpetuated by Andrew Jackson, have placed my name before the nation as a candidate for the chief magistracy of a free and a great people," and you ask whether I will "allow them in conjunction with my democratic fellow citizens throughout the union, to present my name to the people for their adoption at the democratic national convention," and further that "you are instructed to obtain my views of the great democratic principles which have distinguished the party of the people since the days of 'the great spirit of democracy,'" in order that I may be able to furnish a statement that I am as I ever have been, the firm, consistent and devoted friend of equal laws, equal rights, political, civil and religious liberty."

For this distinguished preference of my fellow citizens of the city and county of my nativity, I beg leave to return, through you, their committee, my sincere and grateful thanks, and to express to them a hope that before the period shall arrive for the assembling of a democratic national convention, our fellow citizens may be enabled to present a name more worthy of this high distinction, which may so readily be found in the great and patriotic democratic family of our union.

That the resolutions of the club which you represent may be fully complied with, I have no hesitation frankly to state that should our fellow citizens deem it proper to present my name in the manner they propose, though I neither seek nor desire it, I have no right to withhold it, nor although I am filled with the most profound sense of my own deficiencies for the exalted station which has been adorned by names so illustrious, I also conceive that it is not the part of patriotism to shun any duty which may be required by my fellow citizens.

The circumstanced position of a naval commander affords but few occasions for the development of his political principles or sentiments. Born in the city of Philadelphia during the height of the arduous struggle for independence, contemporaneously with in many glorious events, I could not but, with the first dawning of life, inhale those principles of republicanism, which are so well calculated to render the largest share of happiness on the greatest number of those who live under their auspices. I early imbibed an ardent attachment to the doctrines taught by the sage of Monticello, which has been confirmed by the experience of each succeeding year: and from my first exercise of the elective franchise, down to the present hour, I have unwaveringly contributed my humble aid to promote and maintain the ascendancy of the democratic party, its principles and candidates.

In the constitution of the United States, will be found every essential rule for the guidance of those who may be designated by the people to carry out its principles, for their protection and welfare. A careful, nay, even a strict construction of that instrument is indispensable to our well-being. Such a construction as would be equally applicable to every other not palpably necessary and proper, to affect the execution of its various articles. If this fundamental principle be deviated from, each part of the constitution may be successively invaded, until the latest of its features will gradually disappear, and every original landmark be forever obscured in the dark and bewildering mazes of a latitudinarian construction.

The people, in confiding to the general government the pursuit of the sacred, beloved, and efficient hands, they were placing them in the most safe and efficient hands. This surrender of the whole means of public defence, makes the superintendence of it, in all its ramifications, a primary duty of the national functionaries. Altho' the immediate control over this subject has been justly lodged in legislative hands, yet, the influence of the executive in recommending defensive measures, in the first instance, and his control over them, under the sanction of laws, afterwards, render him highly responsible for maintaining the rights, interests and honor of the country. Under this responsibility, it will become imperative, to keep in view the efficiency of the national defenses, for we are admonished by high authority, that, "to be unprepared to punish itself, is to court it," and that, "in defensive preparations are to be found the best means of preserving peace."

In a government of checks and balances, the accumulation of power in the hands of any one man, or set of men, should be narrowly watched, as dangerous to liberty. In the influence of executive patronage may be found a fruitful source of alarm, and its dissipation cannot be guarded with too jealous an eye, lest merit and capacity be proscribed, the bitterness of party spirit encouraged, and successful efforts be made, to control the freedom of opinion, or of the press, or to corrupt the people, or to plant may be retained or perverted.

Economy forms one of the prominent virtues and duties of a republican government. It does not consist, however, in withholding from faithful public services a just compensation; neither does it consist in too parsimoniously withholding the means of promoting the public defence. But it consists in closing every unnecessary drain on the public treasury; and also for the same purpose, there is strenuously required a judicious application of the appropriations to their objects with a vigorous execution of the laws regarding them.

Agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts are the great sources of our national wealth. These, when sustained by a well-regulated system, which system I should hold, for the most part, to be best, when least shackled, constitute the greater portion of the wealth and power of the country. In cherishing them, we cherish those who enable our fathers to rise superior to colonial dependence, and disregarding the numberless difficulties and dangers which surrounded them, to establish upon a sure and solid foundation the greatest republic among the nations of the earth.

To cherish a liberal commercial intercourse with all nations, without entangling ourselves in entangling alliances with any," to do justice to other and rigidly exact it in turn, are also among the prominent obligations of the federal government.

It is a fixed principle in our government which cannot be too faithfully adhered to in practice, nor too often repeated, that it was instituted to promote the welfare of the people; that those who make, and those who carry into effect the laws, are but agents; and that to generate any distinct interest between the people and the government is incompatible with this principle, and was never contemplated by the framers of the constitution.

A perfect tolerance of political opinion, and freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise, are indispensable for a government based on public opinion becomes impaired when intolerance and a lawless control of the right of suffrage withdraw from it that support; and we should bear in mind, that while under the imperative democratic principle, the will of the majority is to prevail in all cases, yet, that "the minority possess rights, to violate which would be oppression."

Opposition to political measures should rather be considered a duty, for, in proportion as the truth there may be found security from error; nor should it be forgotten, that "every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle," and that, as citizens of the same republic, we are all equally interested in honor, welfare and happiness of our common country.

It may be affirmed as an incontestable truth, that the tendency of corporate bodies and associated wealth is inimical to the liberty, as it is destructive of the equality of the people; and the authority to control the same wisely withheld from the general government by the states. Should this view be considered as too forcibly stated, my answer is plain and direct: the doctrine has been proved sound by experience, and has received the assent of the democratic party. If it be crowded the responsibility of its maintenance is shared by a Jefferson and a Madison, with a Snyder and a Jackson.

Since the adoption of our present form of government, questions of importance have arisen, upon which different portions of our fellow citizens have taken issue. Some of them, I trust, will probably never be revived. Should occasion arise when important ones may be presented, which would turn on a doubtful construction of the constitution, you may rest assured that my convictions of truth would be based upon the only true and safe foundation—that of the Jeffersonian school.

If the views here set forth of the principles of democracy, under our constitution, and which embrace, perhaps the largest portion of our national policy, prove satisfactory to you, I cannot but feel proud that they have undergone in me no change or diminution; but, on the contrary, they have been confirmed and strengthened by the many opportunities I have had of observing foreign rulers under different forms of government, as well as the happy position of our country under the doctrines of our Declaration of Independence, which have as fully proved to us that man is not incapable of self-government.

For the flattering manner in which you have been pleased to express yourselves, in relation to any of my public services, I pray you to accept my thanks. In giving assurance that I never I may have done for my country, by fighting her battles or otherwise, has not been unobserved, you convey to me the most grateful reward I could receive—the approbation of my fellow citizens.

Accept, gentlemen, for yourselves and the association you represent, the assurance of my respectful esteem with which I have the honor to be your obliged servant and fellow citizen.

CHS. STEWART.

TREATY WITH PORTUGAL.

From the National Intelligencer of the 28th April. Treaty between the United States of America and the Queen of Portugal and of the Algarves—Concluded April 28, 1840; ratified April 28, 1841. By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States of America and her most faithful majesty, the queen of Portugal and of the Algarves, was concluded and signed by their plenipotentiaries, at Lisbon, on the 26th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty, which treaty, being in the English and Portuguese languages, it was for the better understanding of the United States and her most faithful majesty the queen of Portugal and of the Algarves, equally animated with the desire of maintaining the relations of amity and good neighborhood which have hitherto so happily subsisted between their respective states; of extending, also, and consolidating the commercial intercourse between them; and convinced that this object cannot better be accomplished than by adopting the system of a entire freedom of navigation, and a perfect reciprocity based upon principles of equity equally beneficial to both countries; have, in consequence, agreed to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty of commerce and navigation; and they have appointed as their plenipotentiaries for that purpose, to wit: the president of the United States of America, Edward Keveridge, their charge d'affaires at the court of her most faithful majesty, and her most faithful majesty, the queen of Portugal, by her excellent John Baptiste de Almeida Garrett, first historiographer to her said majesty, of her council, member of the cortes, knight of the ancient and most noble order of the tower and sword, knight of the order of St. James, and grand officer of the order of Leopold in Belgium, judge of the superior court of commerce, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to her Catholic majesty; who, after having exchanged their respective ratifications, and after the ratifications have been agreed upon, and concluded, the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

There shall be, between the territories of the high contracting parties, a reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation. The vessels of each party at the respective ports shall, mutually, have liberty to enter the ports, places, and rivers of the territories of each party, wherever foreign commerce is, or shall be, permitted. They shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts of said territories, in order to attend to their affairs; and they shall enjoy, to that effect, the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances there prevailing, and particularly to the regulations in force concerning commerce.

ARTICLE II.

Vessels of the United States of America arriving, either laden or in ballast, in the ports of the kingdom and possessions of Portugal; and, reciprocally, Portuguese vessels arriving in the ports of the United States of America, shall be treated, on their entrance, during their ship, and at their departure, upon the same loading as original vessels coming from the same place, with respect to the duties of tonnage, light-house duties, pilotage, port charges, as well as to the fees and perquisites of public officers, and all other duties and charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied upon vessels of commerce, in the name or to the profit of the government, the local authorities, or of any public or private establishment whatsoever.

ARTICLE III.

No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation, into the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America; and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation, into the United States of America, of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, than such as are, or shall be, payable on the like article, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country.

Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the importation or exportation of any article, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America, or of the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, in or from the ports of the said kingdom and possessions of Portugal, or of the said states, which shall not equally extend to the said nations. Nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed, in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States of America, or to the kingdom of Portugal, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country.

Provided, however, that nothing contained in this article shall be understood or intended to interfere with the stipulations entered into by the United States of America, for a special equivalent, in regard to French wines, in the convention made by the said states and France, on the fourth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one; which stipulation will expire, and cease to have effect, in the month of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-two.

ARTICLE IV.

The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties, deductions, or privileges allowed, on the importation, into the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the said states, or in Portuguese vessels; and, reciprocally, the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties, deductions, or privileges allowed, on the importation, into the United States of America, of any article, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, whether such importation shall be in Portuguese vessels, or in vessels of the said states.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, whenever there may be lawfully imported into all or any of the ports of the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, in vessels of any foreign country, articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of a country other than that to which the importing vessels shall belong, the same privilege shall immediately become common to vessels of the U. States of America, with all the same rights and favors as may, in that respect, be granted to the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, in consideration thereof, Portuguese vessels shall thereafter enjoy, in the same respect, privileges, rights, and favors to a corresponding extent, in the ports of the United States of America.

ARTICLE V.

All kinds of merchandise and articles of commerce, which may be lawfully exported or re-exported from the ports of either of the high contracting parties to any foreign country, in national vessels, may also be exported or re-exported therefrom on vessels of the other party, respectively, without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, than if the same merchandise or articles of commerce were exported or re-exported in national vessels.

And the same bounties and drawbacks shall be allowed, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the one party or the other.

ARTICLE VI.

It is expressly understood that nothing contained in this treaty shall be applicable to the coastwise navigation of either of the two countries, which each of the two high contracting parties reserves exclusively to itself.

ARTICLE VII.

It is mutually understood that the foregoing stipulations do not apply to ports and territories, in the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, where foreign commerce and navigation are not admitted; and that the commerce and navigation of Portugal, directly to and from the United States of America and the said ports and territories, are also prohibited.

But the most faithful majesty agrees that, as soon as the said ports and territories, or any of them, shall be open to the commerce or navigation of any foreign nation, they shall, from that moment, be also opened to the commerce and navigation of the United States of America, with the same privilege and rights, in favor of the said nation, as the most favored nation; gratuitously, if the concession was gratuitously made, or on allowing the same compensation, or an equivalent, if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE IX.

Whenever the citizens or subjects of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in any of the rivers, bays, ports, or territories of the other, with their vessels, whether merchant or of war, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, giving to them, in the most favorable manner, facilities for repairing their ships, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage, without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE X.

The two contracting parties shall have the liberty of having, each in the ports of the other, consuls, vice-consuls, agents and commissaries, of their own appointment, who shall enjoy the same privileges and powers as those of the most favored nation. But before any consul, vice-consul, agent, or commissary shall act as such, he or she, in the usual form, be approved and admitted by the government to which he is sent.

But, if any such consuls shall exercise commerce, they shall be submitted to the same laws and usages to which the private individuals of their nation are submitted, in the same place, in respect of their commercial transactions.

And it is hereby declared that, in case of offence against the laws, such consul, vice-consul, agent, or commissary, may either be punished according to law, or be sent back to the offended government as a delinquent, for the other reasons for the same.

The archives and papers of the consulates shall be respected inviolably; and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize, or in any way interfere with them.

The consular vice-consuls, and commercial agents shall have the right, as such, to sit as judges and arbitrators, in such differences as may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels belonging to the nation whose interests are committed to their charge, without the interference of the local authorities, unless the conduct of the crews, or of the captains, should disturb the order or the tranquillity, or offend the laws of the country; or the said consuls, vice-consuls, or commercial agents, should require their assistance to cause their decisions to be carried into effect or supported.

It is, however, understood that this species of judgment, or arbitration, shall not deprive the contending parties of the right they have to resort, on their return, to the judicial authorities of their country.

ARTICLE XI.

The said consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents are authorized to require the assistance of the local authorities, for the search, arrest, detention, and imprisonment of the deserters from the ships of war and merchant vessels of their country. For this purpose, they shall apply to the competent tribunals, judges, and officers, and shall, in writing, demand the said deserters, proving, by the exhibition of the registers of the vessels, the rolls of the crews, or by any other official documents, the guilt of the deserters, and the nature of their offence, and their claim, and the request of those who shall claim them, in order to be detained until the time when they shall be restored to the vessels to which they belonged, or sent back to their own country, by a vessel of the same nation, or any other vessel whatsoever.

Such deserters, when arrested, shall be placed at the disposal of the said consuls, vice-consuls, or commercial agents, and may be confined in the public prisons, at the request of those who shall claim them, in order to be detained until the time when they shall be restored to the vessels to which they belonged, or sent back to their own country, by a vessel of the same nation, or any other vessel whatsoever.

But, if not sent back within four months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause. However, if the deserter shall be found to have committed any crime or offence, the surrender may be delayed until the tribunal, before which his case shall be pending, shall have pronounced his sentence, and such sentence shall have been carried into effect.

ARTICLE XII.

The citizens and subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods, within the jurisdiction of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise; and their representatives shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or otherwise, and may take possession thereof, either by themselves, or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same, at will, paying to the profit of the respective governments such dues only as the inhabitants of the country, where the said goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases.

And, where, on the death of any person holding real estate within the territories of one of the high contracting parties, such real estate would, by the laws of the law, descend on a citizen or subject of the other party, who, by reason of absence, may be incapable of holding it, he shall be allowed the time fixed by the laws of the country; and, in case the laws of the country actually in force may not have fixed any such time, he then shall be allowed a reasonable time, to be fixed by the laws of the country, to take possession of such real estate, and to withdraw and export the proceeds without molestation, and without paying in the profit of the respective governments any other dues than those to which the inhabitants of the country, where the said real estate is situated, shall be subject to pay in like cases.

ARTICLE XIII.

If either party shall, hereafter, grant to any other nation any particular favor in navigation or commerce, it shall not, desirably be extended to the other party, freely, where it is freely granted to such other nation, or on yielding the same compensation, or an equivalent, upon promise, where the grant is conditional.

ARTICLE XIV.

The United States of America and the most faithful majesty, desiring to make an durable and circumstances will permit, the relations which are to be established between the two parties, by virtue of this treaty, of general conduct, and of reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation, have declared solemnly, and do agree to the following point:

1st. The present treaty shall be in force for six years from the date hereof, and further until the end of one year after either of the contracting parties shall have received notice from the other of its intention to terminate the same: each of the contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other, at any time after the expiration of the said term of six years; and it is hereby agreed between them that, on the expiration of one year after such notice shall have been received by either from the other party, this treaty shall altogether cease and terminate.

2d. If any one or more of the citizens or subjects of either party shall infringe any of the articles of the treaty, such citizen or subject shall be held personally responsible for the same; and the harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby; each party engaging in no way to protect the offender, or sanction such violation.

3d. If, (which indeed cannot be expected), unfortunately, any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed, in any way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any act of retaliation, or declare or declare against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proof, and demanded redress and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unsatisfactorily delayed.

4th. The present treaty shall be approved and ratified by the president of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the senate of the said states, and by the most faithful majesty, with the previous consent of the general councils of the nation, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington within eight months from the date hereof, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Done in triplicate, in the city of Lisbon, the twenty-sixth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty.

(Signed)

EDWARD KATYAGACH.

JOAO BAPTISTA DE ALMEIDA GARRETT.

And whereas the said treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same have been exchanged, in the city of Washington, on the twenty-third day of April, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, by DANIEL WEBSTER, secretary of state of the United States, and the commander JOAQUIN CESAR DE FIGUEROA, knight commander of the order of Christ, and minister resident of her said majesty, near the government of the United States, on the part of their respective governments:

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, JOHN TYLER, president of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, and of the independence of the United States the sixty-fifth.

JOHN TYLER.

By the president:

DANIEL WEBSTER, secretary of state.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

May 21. Pursuant to the proclamation of the late president of the United States, the senate met this day at 12 o'clock.

At 12 o'clock the hon. Samuel L. Soule, president of the senate, took the chair, and, having called the senate to order, the following members appeared to be in attendance, viz:

From Maine—Mr. Evans and Mr. Williams.
New Hampshire—Mr. Pierce and Mr. Woodbury.
Massachusetts—Mr. Bates and Mr. Choate.
Connecticut—Mr. Huntington and Mr. Smith.
Rhode Island—Mr. Dix and Mr. Simmons.
Vermont—Mr. Wood.
New York—Mr. Wright and Mr. Tallmadge.
New Jersey—Mr. Miller and Mr. Southard.
Pennsylvania—Mr. Sturgeon.
Delaware—Mr. Bayard and Mr. Clayton.
Maryland—Mr. Keen and Mr. Merrick.
Virginia—Mr. Archer and Mr. Rives.
North Carolina—Mr. Graham and Mr. Mangum.
South Carolina—Mr. Preslon.
Georgia—Mr. Berrien.
Alabama—Mr. King.
Mississippi—Mr. Henderson and Mr. Walker.
Louisiana—Mr. Barrow.
Tennessee—Mr. Nicholson.
Kentucky—Mr. Clay and Mr. Morehead.
Ohio—Mr. Allen and Mr. Tappan.
Indiana—Mr. Smith and Mr. White.
Illinois—Mr. McRoberts and Mr. Young.
Missouri—Mr. Benton and Mr. Linn.
Arkansas—Mr. Fulton and Mr. Sevier.
Michigan—Mr. Porter and Mr. Woodbridge.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, it was ordered that the secretary of the senate acquaint the house of representatives that a quorum of the senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. Waite, the usual number of newspapers were ordered for the use of the senators.

On motion of Mr. Preslon, the senate took a recess until 2 o'clock.

Two o'clock P. M.—The senate was called to order, when Mr. Clay said the object for which the recess was taken was to enable the organization of the other house, so that a joint committee might be appointed to wait upon the president and inform him that the two houses were organized and ready to receive his communication; but as that did not appear likely to take place, at least in time to expedite the matter, he would move that the senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock A. M. which motion having been seconded, the senate adjourned.

June 1. Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Calhoun appeared in their seats.

A message was received from the house of representatives, through its clerk, (Matthew S. Clark, esq.) informing the senate that a resolution had been passed by that house appointing a committee of two on the part of that body to join such committee as might be appointed by the senate to wait upon the president of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two houses had assembled, and that congress was ready to proceed to business; and asking the concurrence of the senate to said resolution.

Mr. Huntington moved that the senate concur in the resolution.

Mr. Allen, of Ohio, moved to amend it by striking out the words "president of the United States," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the vice president, on whom, by the death of the late president, the powers and duties of the office of president have devolved."

In support of this motion Mr. A. read the provisions of the constitution, in the following words:

"In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the office, the same shall devolve on the vice president, and the congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation or inability, both of the president and vice president, declaring what officer shall then act as president, and such officer shall accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected."

The first clause in this portion of the constitution classified all the contingencies under which the vice president, shall discharge the duties and exercise the powers of president, and it made no distinction whatever between removal by death and removal by a temporary inability to discharge the functions of the presidential office. If, therefore, the late president had been afflicted with a disarranging, for a time, a state of mental alienation, he would on his recovery have been reinstated in all the powers of that high office to which the people had elected him. But a contingency of this kind was provided for in the constitution in the very same words as the case of the president's death. It might, perhaps, be said that the question was an unimportant one, inasmuch as it had reference mainly to the office to be applied to a single officer. Now Mr. A. had not raised it with the remotest desire to withhold the dignity of the title of president from the present incumbent of the chair. His anxiety to remove from consideration this office of president was indeed now held by the vice president that fact recognized the existence of a case where the highest office in the republic may be held otherwise than by an election of the people. The contingency thus presented, a presidential officer, the hereafter becomes very serious; but if the powers and duties of the presidential office attached, in consequence of the death of the president, to the vice president, he still remaining vice president, then he continued to hold only the office of vice president, the people had elected him, and thus the beautiful symmetry of our system of free and popular government was preserved.

Having wisely only to call the attention of the senate to the question, it might make an office of expression of its views of the case, Mr. A. would be content with expressing his own opinion in regard to it, however it might differ from that of other gentlemen.

Mr. Tappan observed that the view just taken of the interpretation of the constitution was much strengthened by reference to the 35th clause of the 3d section of the 1st article:

"The senate shall choose their other officers, and also a president pro tem, in the absence of the vice president, or who he shall exercise the office of president of the United States."

Mr. T. proceeded to illustrate by assimilating the case to that of the absence of a chief justice in one of our courts or the court of king's bench, and in that of a case of a colonel of a regiment shot in battle, when the next officer succeeds to command but does not become a colonel. He maintained that there was, then, nothing in the constitution or in analogical cases to warrant the position that JOHN TYLER is now the president of the United States. If, might, indeed, be justly entitled to the salary of the president of the United States, inasmuch as he was in the discharge of all its duties. Mr. T. had nothing against that. But when the senate officially addressed him, it ought to give him his true constitutional title. In personal conversation he might be addressed as vice president, but when officially addressed by a department of the government, or their official language none but the proper legal title should be applied to the individual exercising the powers of the presidential office.

Mr. Buchanan of Conn. said that though he was opposed to the adoption of the amendment, he should not enter upon any discussion of its merits, if it had any. It was now June, and the senate were in expectation of receiving an executive commission from the president, and he was not prepared on the question raised by the amendment proposed by the senator from Ohio; if it must be discussed, it could better be brought up at a future time, when the senate should be more at leisure for such an argument.

The subject had been more fully discussed, and he had no doubt the minds of all the members of the senate were made up in regard to it. The body had now been enlightened by the views of Mr. Allen, and he was in Ohio and he was therefore happy the question would be taken without further delay.

Mr. Allen demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Walker, of Miss. said that, as the yeas and nays had been ordered, and the vote of every actor would be placed on record, he would very briefly present the grounds on which his own vote would be given. The only material argument which had been urged in support of the amendment was drawn from the above quoted clause of the constitution.

Now, here there were two separate and distinct contingencies, viz the death of a president, and, secondly, the death of the vice president. In the first case, the constitution declared that the office of president devolved on the vice president; to the other case, it provided that there should be an acting president designated by law. The congress was required to appoint by law some person "to act as president," until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected. In the last case, there was to be an acting president, not for the unexpired term of the president deceased, but until an actual president should be chosen. But, in the case of the death of a president, the office itself—"the said office"—shall devolve on the vice president. The language used was, "THE SAME shall then devolve on the vice president." The immediate antecedent was, "the said office," and it was, as he had said, a sound rule of grammatical construction, as well as a plain dictate of common sense, that the immediate antecedent was to be connected with the office to be designated. It was, therefore, the office itself of president that devolved on the vice president. He was not the vice president acting as president, but he ceased to be vice president, the office of president having devolved upon him. Was he not an actual president? He was, and he acted as president, discharging additional duties in consequence of the death of the president! If so, why was he not in the senate, discharging the duties of its presiding officer? Could he come to this hall, and sit at the legislative table, as president of the senate? Surely not; he was the president under the constitution, and would so remain during the residue of the entire term for which the president had been chosen. This was the language and the true intent and meaning of the constitution. As in the case of a colonel acting as general in case of the death of the general in battle, the colonel acting as general only during the temporary emergency; another person might be appointed general, and the colonel would return to his former station, the emergency having ceased.

Mr. Allen replied. His friend from Mississippi had asked, if Mr. Tyler was still vice president, and he had answered in the affirmative. He would answer the question. Mr. Tyler was not here, because the constitution had assigned to him duties which required his presence elsewhere, viz the duties of the presidential office. He was now an executive, not a legislative officer.

Mr. A. proceeded further to illustrate his own views, and in argue the difficulties of a question of succession, which might here and often lead to the old world involved a struggle between contending parties for the supreme power.

Mr. Calhoun would prefer that a little more time should be allowed for the consideration of so momentous a subject; but as the question involved, the language of the constitution, so far as the case of a president's death was concerned, was so very plain, that, but for the case of presidential disability, there could occur no possible difficulty. In that case, there would be a serious question, viz: who should succeed? It could be settled by common consent, but it could not be done by congress; and it was easy to see that if the president and vice president should be of opposite politics, very serious consequences might ensue. At present, he hoped the amendment could be withdrawn by common consent. Let us wait till the case of inability should occur, before we attempted to decide any thing in the matter. In the case of death, it was too plain for doubt that the office of president devolved upon the vice president. He trusted the senator from Ohio would consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Allen declining to do so—

The question was put, and decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Allen, Benton, Henderson, Linn,

McRoberts, Tappan, Williams Wright—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Barr, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Clark, Keen, Clayton, Daniel, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, Keen, King, Mangum, Miller, Merrick, Morehead, Nicholson, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Young—33.

So the amendment was rejected. The resolution was then agreed to, and Mr. Huntington and Mr. Archer were appointed on the part of the senate.

power it which required the sanction of the two houses of congress, but the president of the United States exercised its veto power, and the measure was defeated. A measure to regulate the currency, which the president was fully sanctioned in the course he had taken by the popular vote. His successor to the chair of state unqualifiedly pronounced the measure as a new charter of a similar institution; and not only the popular election which brought him into power, but the elections through which he had been elected clearly to indicate a concurrence with him in securing the measure to the people. After the public moneys were withdrawn from the United States bank, they were placed in deposit with the state banks, and the president was before the people. To say nothing as to the question whether that experiment was made under propitious or adverse circumstances, it may safely be asserted that it did require the commendation of most of its early advocates, and it is believed was also commended by the popular sentiments. The existing sub-treasury system does not seem to have been in higher favor with the people, but has recently been condemned in a manner too plainly indicated to admit of a doubt. Thus in the short period of eight years, the popular voice may be regarded as having twice severely condemned each of the three schemes of finance to which I have alluded. As to the first, it was introduced at a time (1816) when the state banks, then comparatively few in number, were endeavoring to suspend specie payments by reason of the war which had previously prevailed with Great Britain. Whether, if in 1816, had been introduced in any other season, it would have been enabled to continue specie payments, during the war, and the disastrous period to the commerce of the country, I cannot say. It is probable, to say the least, problematical; and, whether the United States bank of 1816 produced a restoration of specie payments, or the same was accomplished through the intervention of other means, was a matter of some difficulty at that time to determine. Certain it is, that for the first years of the operation of that bank, its course was as disastrous to the great part of our states and western career, it became extremely successful. As to the second, the experiment was tried with a redundant treasury, which continued to increase until it seemed that the part of the country in which it was introduced, were among the states which, operating at the same time with the specie circular, and the causes before adverted to, caused them to suspend specie payments, and involved the country in the greatest embarrassment. And as to the third, if carried through all the stages of a transmission, from paper and specie, to currency, but the present state of the country, and the insecurity of the public moneys, its injurious effects have been anticipated by the country, in its unqualified condemnation. What is now to be regarded as an adjunct of the treasury, and a subject of the subject, I have no accurate means of determining but by appealing to their more immediate representatives. The late contest, which terminated in the election of General Harrison to the presidency, was decided on principles well known and openly declared; and while the sub-treasury received in the result the most decided condemnation, yet a large number of members of finance seemed to have been concurred in. To those of them who have more directly from the body of our common constituents, I submit the entire question, as being qualified to give a full exposition of their wishes and opinions. I shall be ready to concur with you in the adoption of such system as you may propose, reserving to myself the ultimate power of rejecting any measure which may, in my view of it conflict with the constitution, or otherwise jeopardize the power of the country—a power which I could not part with even if I would, but which I will not believe any act of yours will call into question.

I beg leave particularly to call your attention to the accompanying report from the secretary of war. Besides the present state of the war, which has so long afflicted the territory of the United States, the numerous matters of interest therein referred to, you will learn from it that the secretary has instituted an inquiry into the abuses, which promises to develop gross enormities in connection with the Indian trade, which have been neglected, as well as in the expenditures for the removal and subsistence of the Indians. He represents also other irregularities in the war between the Indians, which will require the appropriation of upwards of $200,000 to correct, and which claim the immediate attention of congress.

In reflecting on the proper means of defending the country, we cannot shut our eyes to the consequences, which the introduction and use of the power of ocean upon the ocean are likely to produce, and which we may have to face. We cannot yet see the extent to which this power may be applied in belligerent operations, concerning which it is done with recent improvements in the science of gunnery and projectiles, but we need have no fear of being left, in regard to these things, behind the most active and skillful of other nations. It is generally admitted that the delivery of a conservative proper encouragement and direction from government.

True wisdom would, nevertheless, seem to dictate the necessity of placing in perfect order the military institutions which are designed for the protection of our principal cities and roadways. For the defence of our extensive maritime coast, our chief reliance should be placed on our navy, and, by those institutions which are destined to recommend themselves to public adoption—but no time should be lost in placing our principal cities on the seaboard and the lakes, in a state of entire security from foreign assault. Separated as we are from the countries of the old world, and in much unafflicted by their policy, we are happily relieved from the necessity of maintaining large standing armies in times of peace. The policy which was adopted by Mr. Monroe, shortly after the conclusion of the late war, and the policy which is now in vogue, are equally sufficient for the command of a large military force, should the necessity of one arise, is founded as well in economy as in true wisdom. Provided the government will fill the ranks with the best men, which can readily be done on any emergency, for the introduction of a system of discipline, both promptly and efficiently. All that is required in time of peace is to maintain sufficient number of men to grant our fortifications, to meet any sudden contingency, and to encounter the first shock of war. Our chief reliance must be placed on the sailors, who constitute the grand body of national guard, and, inspired by an ardent love of country, will be ready at all times, and at all seasons, to report with alacrity to its defence. It will be regarded by congress, I doubt not, as a suitable time, as one of its highest duties to attend to their complete organization and discipline.

I cannot avoid recurring, in connection with this subject, to the necessity which exists for adopting some suitable measure, whereby the circulation of banks by the states may be corrected in future. Such result can be most readily achieved by the Congress, which will be expected to be the subject of a report among themselves, which they can only enter into with the consent and approbation of this government. A measure which might, in the present emergency, demand, just demands, that the Congress in advance of any action by the states as an inducement to such action upon terms well defined by act of Congress. Such a measure would be the subject of the action of the states would find in the experience of the past, and the condition of the present, most to sustain it—and it is greatly to be doubted whether the states, in the future, will be able to lengthen of time successfully, while the states shall continue in the unrestrained power of creating banking corporations. This power can only be limited by their Congress.

With the adoption of a financial agency of a satisfactory character, the hope may be indulged that the treasury will be able to raise a permanent fund, to meet the auxiliary needs, and some measure inseparably connected with its success, will doubtless claim the sanction of congress. Among such a distribution of the needs of the government, it is provided such distribution does not force upon congress the necessity of imposing upon commerce heavier burdens than those contemplated by the act of 1833, would be the subject of the action of the states would find in the experience of the past, and the condition of the present, most to sustain it—and it is greatly to be doubted whether the states, in the future, will be able to lengthen of time successfully, while the states shall continue in the unrestrained power of creating banking corporations. This power can only be limited by their Congress.

fore unjust legislation would be substituted by one dispensing equality to all the members of this confederacy. Whether the duties which should be made directly to the states in the proceeds of the sales, or in the form of profits by virtue of the operations of any fiscal agency having the proceeds of the sales, would well deserve its consideration. Nor would such disposition of the proceeds of the sales, in any manner, prevent congress from requiring the states to contribute to the maintenance of laws for the benefit of the actual settlers, or from making any new arrangement as to the price of the public lands which might in future be extended desirable.

The state of the navy pension fund requires the immediate attention of congress. By the operation of the act of the 3d of March 1837, an "act for the better regulation of the administration of the navy pension fund"—that fund has been exhausted. It will be seen, from the accompanying report of the commissioner of pensions, that there will be required, for the payment of navy pensions, on the first of July next, $24,006,061, and on the first of January, 1842, in sum of $60,000. In addition to these sums, about $6,000 will be required to pay arrears of pensions which will probably be allowed between the first of July and the first of January, 1842, making in the whole $150,006,061. To meet these payments, there is, in the treasury, a deficiency of $121,969,061. The public truth requires that immediate provision should be made for the payment of these sums.

In order to introduce into the navy a desirable efficiency, a new system of accountability may be found to be indispensably necessary. To mature a plan having the positive character has been presented to me, competent, and to meet the just expectations of the country, requires more time than has yet been allowed to the secretary at the head of that department. The hope is indulged that the navy will be able to meet the demands of importance, in connection with this branch of the public service, may be matured for your consideration.

Although the laws regulating the post office department only require from the officer charged with its direction to report at the annual annual session of congress, the postmaster general has presented to me some facts connected with the financial condition of the department, which are deemed worthy the attention of congress. By the accompanying report of that officer, it appears that the annual income of that department, beyond the means of payment at its command, cannot be less than $500,000. As the laws organizing that branch of the public service, have been so defective as to incur the expense of the department, and the necessity of its maintenance, it is not, therefore, left to congress to determine whether the department shall continue to be paid from the public treasury, or whether that department shall continue under its present embarrassments. It will be seen by the report of the postmaster general, that the department has incurred, in several of the states, have been made at such reduced rates of compensation, as to encourage the belief that if the department was relieved from causing difficulties, its future operations could be conducted without any further call upon the general treasury.

The power of appointing to office is one of a character the most delicate and responsible. The appointing power is even more exposed to be led into error. With anxious solicitude to select the most trustworthy for official station, I cannot be supposed to possess a personal knowledge of the qualifications of every applicant. I deem it therefore proper in this public meeting, to invite on the part of the senate a just scrutiny into the character and pretensions of every person I may bring to their notice in the regular form of a nomination for office. Unless persons every way trustworthy are employed in the public service, corruption and irregularity will inevitably follow. I shall with the greatest cheerfulness, and with the most anxious solicitude, regarding it as wisely constituted to aid the executive department in the performance of this delicate duty. I shall look to "consent and advice" as given only in the most judicious manner, and I shall, on every occasion, also, at the earliest proper occasion, invite the attention of congress to such measures as, in my judgment, will be best calculated to regulate the service of the executive department in reference to its public meetings.

I shall also, at the proper season, invite your attention to the wretchedness of the suppression of the slave trade, and the necessity of its being more efficient in their provisions. There is a strong belief that the traffic is on the increase. Whether such increase is to be ascribed to the abolition of slave labor in the British colonies, or to the increase of the demand for slaves in the general consumption of the world, thereby augmenting the demand from other quarters, and thus creating an additional labor market, I cannot say. The highest considerations of public honor, as well as the strongest promptings of humanity, require a resort to the most vigorous efforts to suppress the trade.

In conclusion, I beg to invite your particular attention to the interests of this District; nor do I doubt but that the interests of the District will be promoted by its advancement in commercial as well as its local interests. Should congress deem it to be its duty to repeal the existing sub-treasury law, the necessity of providing a suitable place of deposit for the public moneys which less than the last congress, and on which they were divided in the vote.

A clerk having announced the fact of the attendance of a quorum, Mr.

Mr. Hunt moved a resolution that the members present vote upon the organization of the house by election of speaker.

Mr. Feltner was understood to inquire whether the resolution should not express the manner of the election?

Mr. Hunt was understood to say he would insert viva voce.

Mr. Lewis Williams moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "viva voce," and inserting the words "by ballot." He said, in support of this motion, that the choice by ballot was the good old mode which had prevailed ever since the foundation of the government, and within a few years since, when the "viva voce" was established for what purpose it was not necessary now to say. He was in favor of restoring the ancient custom, or custom, which had prevailed so long, and not of introducing the new rule. He hoped, therefore, the house would adopt the amendment he proposed.

The question on the amendment was then taken; an affirmative vote having been given, the clerk declared himself unable to decide by the sound.

Mr. Weller asked for tellers; and the house having signified its assent thereto—Mr. Weller and Mr. W. C. Johnson were appointed tellers by the clerk.

Mr. Hopkins inquired of the clerk if it was in order to call for the yeas and nays.

The clerk said the gentleman had that right.

And the house having ordered the yeas and nays, the question on the amendment was taken and decided in the negative. Yeas 66, nays 134. So the amendment was rejected.

And the question recurring on the resolution—Mr. W. C. Johnson moved to amend it by inserting after the word "speaker" the words "and clerk."

Mr. Everett was understood to say that the house must go into the election of speaker before organization, but that it was not necessary to make any provision or to do any thing but that before organization.

Mr. Hunt said that, for the purpose of organizing the house, we must have a speaker. The speaker's first duty was to swear in the members, and he, (Mr. H.) was not aware that the house, at this stage of its existence, had ever adopted any resolution other than for the election of speaker. That being done and the members bring sworn in, then a resolution to proceed to the election of clerk would be introduced as a distinct, independent proposition, to be acted on by them as sworn members of the house.

Mr. W. C. Johnson did not see, he said, any difficulty in acting upon the proposition in this way. He would, however, withdraw the motion.

Mr. Wier renewed it. The effect of it, he said, was simply this: that the house would proceed to the election of clerk to-day as well as to the election of speaker. That was the whole sum and substance.

Mr. Fillmore inquired whether it had not been usual immediately after the election of speaker for that officer to administer the oath to the members? The clerk replied that it had been usual.

Mr. Fillmore hoped, then, that the custom would be departed from.

Mr. Wier said that the election of speaker would, as a matter of course, take precedence. The speaker being elected under the resolution, he would administer the oath to the members, and then the house would proceed to the election of clerk. That was the whole operation.

Mr. Hunt said he was as much in favor of going into the election of clerk to-day as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wier) was; but it seemed to him (Mr. H.) that the house had better organize first. He moved the question would be taken on his resolution.

Mr. Randolph objected to the amendment, on the ground that it was not in order before a speaker had been elected.

Mr. Barnard objected to the amendment on a constitutional principle. He thought it wrong. He thought it bad, as it was, could now do nothing but elect a speaker. When a speaker had been elected, and the members were sworn in, which they could not be till then, a motion might then be made and proceed to the election of clerk.

Mr. Wier, to meet this objection, said he would so modify his motion as to say that the house would proceed to the election of speaker, and thereafter, and after the speaker had sworn in the members of this house, to the election of clerk in like manner.

Mr. Barnard. That does not obviate my objection.

Mr. Wier said that the house could take time to go into the election of clerk as well as speaker, and might make the order for the election of both in the same resolution as well as to proceed under a different resolution to each case.

Mr. W. then read the following note to rule 18 of last congress:

"There is no law, resolution, rule or order directing the appointment of the clerk of the house. On the 1st April, 1789, being the first day that a quorum of the house assembled under the new constitution, the house immediately elected a clerk by ballot, without a previous order having been passed for that purpose, although, in the case of the speaker, who was chosen on the same day, an order was previously adopted."

Now, (continued Mr. W.) although this was the first time, yet he thought that the order should be taken for clerk as well as speaker. The election of the one need not interfere with the election of the other; and the election of both was necessary to the speedy organization of the house. It was a question simply whether the house would take them separately as to one, or conjointly as to both. He preferred the latter mode, so that the house might proceed immediately to business. He would not detain the house by dwelling on the difference between twaddle-dun and twiddle-dee.

Mr. Tinkling was understood to object to the amendment—arguing that what was necessary to be done before the members were sworn in must be done, and that what was not necessary ought not to be done.

And the question being taken, the amendment of Mr. Wier was rejected.

And the question then recurring on the resolution of Mr. H. and his friends, it was decided in the affirmative without a division.

So the house determined to proceed at this time to the election of speaker viva voce.

The clerk appointed Messrs. Underwood, of Kentucky, clerk of the house of New Hampshire, and John C. Clark, of New York, tellers to superintend the roll. The house then proceeded to vote, and the following was the result:

The whole number of votes polled	221
Necessary to a choice	111
Of which Joseph Lawrence, of Pa. received	5
Henry A. Wise, of Virginia	8
John White, of Kentucky	121
J. W. Jones, of Virginia	84
Scattering	1

So, on the first vote, the hon. JOHN WHITE, having received a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared to be duly elected speaker of the house of representatives of the 27th congress. Mr. Underwood, of Kentucky, and Mr. Clark, of Pennsylvania, were requested by the clerk to wait upon the speaker, to inform that gentlemen of his election, and to conduct him to the chair.

Accordingly, in a few moments, the speaker appeared, and, standing in the chair; whereupon, he addressed the house as follows:

GENTLEMEN: I cannot sufficiently express the obligations I feel for the distinguished honor conferred upon me. I undertake the discharge of a duty in this position with profound distrust of my qualifications. I am sensible of the magnitude and difficulty of the task, of its arduous duties, of its high responsibilities. Six years' service in this body has taught me that this chair is not bed of down, especially in a time of great political excitement. Nothing but a conviction that the same generous confidence which placed me here would continue to support me in the faithful and impartial discharge of my duty could have induced me to accept this trust, where the duties of the chair were more important, its responsibilities greater, its intrinsic difficulties more embarrassing. Independent of that exalted feeling—feeling—the result, in all five governments, of pro-railroad rivalry—the consideration and discussion of those great questions which have caused the convention of this special congress will no doubt give rise to high political excitement. Under those circumstances, I dare not hope I will be able to give any satisfactory answer to the question whether I shall be impartial. I may be. I shall, however, be my constant purpose to discharge the functions of this station with a singleness of purpose and a full-tilt intention that will secure to me the approbation, I trust, of all the friends of our country.

Candor, gentlemen, compels me to say I have never made the rules of this house or parliamentary law my particular study. Experience in discharge of the duties of this chair, I may say I have none.

The qualifications necessary to a prompt and able discharge of the duties of speaker are multifarious; some of them difficult. I will not detain you by enumerating them all; the mention of one, however, which I consider paramount to all others, I cannot omit. I need scarcely say I allude to that of impartiality—a rigid and uncompromising impartiality towards every member; to the exercise of this qualification I pledge myself. The occupant of this chair should neither lend the influence of his position to make this house subservient to executive dictation, nor, on the other hand, to encourage a factious opposition to executive recommendations. Passive obedience to executive will is not less fatal to liberty than anarchy itself. The true spirit of a house of representatives is to meet faithfully and fearlessly. If it be true, as I hope and believe it is, that this house is the citadel of American freedom—the great shield and anchor of the constitution—the great inquest of the nation—should not all its deliberations be characterized with order, with decorum, with dignity? I invoke you, gentlemen, let all our proceedings be marked with forbearance, moderation, courtesy and patriotism. If, by any means, this body has impaired its high character as a dignified deliberative organ, gentlemen, accept my grateful thanks for this high mark of confidence and regard. And I entreat you, let all our proceedings be such as to sustain the dignity of this house, maintain the honor of the country, promote the public good, and preserve, unimpaired, the integrity of this glorious institution.

The oath of office was thereupon administered to the speaker by Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, the gentleman holding the oldest commission as a member of this house. The members were then called in the order of the states, and were qualified in the usual form by the speaker.

Mr. Wier rose and moved that the house now proceed to the election of clerk viva voce, taking that, he said, to be the sense of the house, as they had already elected a speaker in that way.

Mr. Barnard moved to amend the motion by striking out the words "viva voce," and inserting the words "by ballot."

Mr. Wier inquired of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Barnard) whether the house had not already voted to prefer the viva voce mode of election?

Mr. Barnard. In relation to the speaker, yes. Mr. Wier would like, he said, to hear some good reason assigned, if there was any, why a change should be made in the case of clerk.

Mr. Barnard. I do not propose to debate the question. I prefer to vote.

Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and nays on the amendment.

[Several voices: Old no—no—vote it down at once.]

Mr. Clifford said: Well, if the house was willing to vote it down, he would withdraw his motion for the yeas and nays. And the motion was accordingly withdrawn.

And the question on the amendment of Mr. Barnard was then taken, and decided in the negative without a division. So the amendment was rejected.

And the question then recurring and was taken on agreeing to the motion of Mr. Wier; and was decided in the affirmative without a division.

So the house decided that it would now proceed to the election of clerk.

A message was received from the senate, informing the house that a quorum of that body had assembled, and that the senate was ready to proceed to business.

The following gentlemen were then nominated for clerk:

Matthew S. C. Clarke, of Washington, by Mr. Wigfall.
F. O. J. Smith, of Maine, by Mr. Randall.
Hugh A. Garland, of Va. by Mr. Goodell.
Richard C. Mason, of Va. by Mr. Powell.
The speaker appointed Messrs. Wier, of Va. as Randolph, of Maine, and Goodell, of Va. to act as tellers.

The house then proceeded to vote, and we present below the results of the respective ballots:

	1st vote	2d vote	3d vote	4th vote
Whole number of votes	223	219	216	224
Necessary to a choice	112	110	108	112
M. S. C. Clarke rec'd	83	81	91	128
F. O. J. Smith	90	90	80	67
H. A. Garland	81	61	15	6
Richard C. Mason	13	17	32	19

So Mr. Clark moved to adjourn, on the 4th day, a majority of the yeas being declared to be duly elected.

Whereupon Mr. Clarke appeared and took the oath of office.

[After the announcement of the result of the second vote, Mr. Proffitt moved an adjournment.

Mr. Wise asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. Proffitt withdrew the motion. Mr. Dawson introduced his colleague, the hon. R. L. Gamble, representative-elect from the state of Georgia, who was qualified and took his seat.

After the announcement of the result of the third vote, Mr. J. C. Clark moved an adjournment.

Mr. Kim called for the yeas and nays, but withdrew the motion.

And the question having been taken, the house refused to adjourn.]

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, introduced his colleague, the honorable James Rogers, representative-elect from that state, who was qualified and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the usual message to the senate, informing that the house had organized by the election of a speaker, was adopted.

Mr. Wise offered the usual resolution, for the appointment of a committee on the part of this house to join such committee as might be appointed by the senate, to wait on the president of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two houses had assembled, and that congress was ready to proceed to business, &c.

Mr. McKen moved to amend the resolution by striking out the word "president" of the U. States, and inserting the words "vice president," now occupying the office [as the reporter understood] of president of the United States.

Mr. McKen supported this motion in a constitutional argument. He did not know, he said, whether the house was disposed to entertain any discussion on the question. For the first time in the history of our country the question arose whether the vice president became president by the death of that officer. He (Mr. McK.) believed that the individual at the head of the government was not president of the United States. He spoke from no invidious feeling. No man had a higher regard for that gentleman than himself; but he believed he was only vice president exercising the office of president of the United States.

Mr. McK. then read the two following passages from the constitution of the United States:

"The senate shall choose their other officers, and also a president pro tempore, in the absence of the president, when he is disabled, to exercise the office of president of the United States."

"In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the senate shall devolve on the vice president, and the congress may by law provide for the ease of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the president and vice president, declaring what officer shall then act as president, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected."

Mr. McK. enforced his position by an examination of the intent and meaning of these passages, and by reference to the debates in the convention that framed the constitution. He contended for these authorities that Mr. Tyler was not actually president of the U. States, but merely vice president, executing the powers and duties of the former office. He expressed his intention, however, to vote for the regular salary of $25,000 attached to the presidential office; and concluded by urging the house not to mingle this matter with the political discussions of the day, but to regard it as a grave constitutional question, which should set the point at rest for all future time.

Mr. Wise said the point had been raised, because the vote on the amendment would settle the relation in which we stood to the president of the United States. And he must be permitted to say that he knew the fact that the present incumbent would claim the position that was by the constitution, by election and by the act of God, vice president of the United States. That gentleman had with sentiments of deep sorrow regretted that office had devolved upon him. But so it was. The constitution of the United States held this language:

"In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice president; and congress may, by law, provide for the ease of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the president and vice president, declaring what officer shall then act as president," &c.

The office of president devolved on the vice president, and as the house had no rules as yet, and the reformer no previous question, and that the house of the U. States, and John Tyler, president of the U. States.

Mr. McKen asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were refused.

Mr. Lillmore moved an adjournment.

Mr. Fillmore inquired if the senate had adjourned? The answer from several quarters was, yes.

And the question being taken, the house, (by yeas 80, yeas not counted), refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken on Mr. McKen's amendment and it was rejected. And the resolution was adopted.

And the question being taken, the report should have been disposed of. And Mr. U. submitted a motion to that effect.

Mr. Wis moved that the standing rules and orders of the last congress be adopted for ten days, and that a committee be appointed to revise them and report, &c.

Mr. Underwood insisted on the necessity of a radical change of the rules—and suggested to Mr. Wis to modify his motion so as to make the rules of the last congress the rules of this, until a committee should be reported and the report should have been disposed of. And Mr. U. submitted a motion to that effect.

Mr. Adams moved to amend the amendment by inserting the words "except the 21st rule, which is hereby repealed."

Pending these motions—the house, at half past five o'clock, on motion of Mr. Briggs, adjourned.

Tuesday, June 1. The question relative to the 21st rule, was resumed. The following is the said rule, now moved to be rescinded:

Art. 21. "No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia or any state or territory, or the slave trade between the states or territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this house, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. Wis suggested that, in order that the house might receive the message of the president of the United States, action upon this resolution and proposed amendments be postponed by general consent.

Mr. Pickens had no objection to this course, but he had a resolution to offer which he regarded as almost, if not entirely, a question of privilege, since it was for the rights of members to seats. He was desirous that the resolution should be acted on to-day, but did not wish to interfere with the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. (Mr. Wis.)

Mr. Wis said he did not see the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) in his seat, a thing which was unusual. He (Mr. W.) had no desire to debate the amendment proposed by that gentleman; and if it was the understanding of the house that there should be no debate, he hoped the question would be taken now.

It was here suggested that the absence of Mr. Adams was a good reason why the question should not now be put.

Mr. Pickens said it was clear that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) could not be acted upon without debate. He (Mr. P.) did not know what the temper of the house might be in relation to it, as he had heard no remarks made. But, he repeated. It seemed impossible that the question could be acted upon without debate. He would, therefore, suggest that the course indicated by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wis.) should be pursued, and that the further consideration of the subject should be postponed. He [Mr. P.] merely made the suggestion. He was not himself disposed to debate.

Mr. Wis said it did not seem to him that there was any manifestation of a desire on the part of the house to go into a debate. If there was, he should press his motion to postpone.

Mr. McKen asked the yeas and nays on the amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. Adams now being at the moment in his place, some conversation ensued as to the probability of the subject inducing a debate, and the propriety of deferring it until the president's message should be received and read.

Mr. Sibly suggested that as an act of courtesy to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams), the amendment should not be acted on in his absence.

Mr. Adams appeared, and addressed the house for nearly three quarters of an hour in favor of his amendment.

Mr. Wis said he did not intend to enter into this debate, much less into the spirit of this debate. And, with a view to enable the house to receive the message, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table for the present.

Mr. Adams then being agreed to, the subject of Mr. Adams' motion on the table, for the present.

The house was then engaged in the following action: a proposition to the manner in which members should obtain a clearance or clearance on seats, and on a proposition to have the desks removed from the floor of the hall. A motion to lay the whole subject on the table was negatived by yeas and nays, yeas 82, yeas 120.

Mr. Briggs then rose and obtained leave to make a report from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president of the United States. Mr. S. reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and that the president had requested them to say that he would make a communication to each house immediately.

A message in writing was received from the president of the United States, through Robert Tyler, esq. his private secretary, for which, see account preceding of this day, page 218.

Mr. Barnard moved that the message and accompanying documents be laid on the table, and that they be printed; and that 10,000 extra copies be printed for the use of the house, of which 5,000 should be printed with the accompanying documents.

Mr. Briggs. Let the whole number be printed with the documents.

Mr. Barnard said he had no objection, and he modified his motion, so that the motion should be:

Mr. Bolin asked Mr. Barnard to accept twenty thousand as a modification. For his own part, he would rather say fifty thousand than twenty thousand. There had been no period in the history of our country when the people were looking with so much anxiety for the message of the president as at this time; and, under these circumstances, he hoped that twenty thousand at least would be printed.

A brief debate ensued, and several amendments to the resolution were suggested, but failed by decided majorities—and the resolution was adopted, the house refusing to order the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. Adams offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of one member from each state in the union be appointed on the part of this house, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the senate, to consider and report by what token of respect and address may be properly the Congress of the U. States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of their late president, William Henry Harrison; and that so much of the message of the president as relates to that melancholy event be referred to the said committee.

Which was adopted unanimously.

[In accordance with the above resolution the speaker, on the 21st inst. announced the following members to constitute said committee: Messrs. J. Q. Adams, of Massachusetts; Wm. P. Fessenden, of Maine; Albertson, of N. Hampshire; Tillamuth, of Rhode Island; T. W. Williams, of New York; Horace Everett, of Vermont; Greig, of New York; Ayer, of New Jersey; Sergeant, of Pennsylvania; Rodney, of Delaware; W. C. Johnson, of Maryland; Talaford, of Virginia; L. Williams, of N. Carolina; John Campbell, of S. Carolina; W. C. Dawson, of Georgia; Pope, of Kentucky; A. V. Brown, of Tennessee; S. Mason, of Ohio; E. D. White, of Louisiana; Wallace, of Indiana; Miller, of Missouri; Cross, of Arkansas; J. M. Howard, of Michigan.]

Mr. Barnard offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That so many only of the standing committees named in the rules of the last house of representatives shall be appointed at the present session as shall be necessary to transact the business of the house, and take charge of and consider the several subjects presented in the message of the president just read, and requiring, in the opinion of the house, the action of congress at the present session; except that the committee of elections and the committee on accounts may also be appointed.

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members shall be appointed to take charge of and consider so much of the president's message as relates to the currency of the country and a fiscal agent for the government.

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members shall be appointed to take charge of and consider so much of the president's message as relates to the disposition of the public lands and of the proceeds of mines thereon.

These resolutions were read for information, and then laid over.

The house then resumed the consideration of the subject relative to seats—after a few minutes, Mr. W. C. Johnson moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was agreed to, yeas 105, yeas 108.

Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, gave notice that on to-morrow, or so soon as the rules and business of the house would permit, he would present a bill to repeal the sub-treasury law. The house then adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

"ATLANTA," is the title of a new tragedy, written by Judge Comd, in which Perce is personating the hero with decided effect at New York. The incident is of the "Jack Cade" era. The poet says: "It abounds in the noblest language; and if we mistake not there are many passages in this play which will be quoted hereafter as familiarly as some of the finest epigrams of the golden age."

REV. DR. BETHEUNE and lady sailed from Philadelphia on the 24th ult. for the Mediterranean. The health of Mrs. B. has been considerably improved, and since the funeral obsequies to the memory of Gen. Harrison, Dr. Bethune's health has been feeble.

CATHOLIC BISHOPS. We understand that the rev. P. R. Kenrick, has been appointed a bishop of the Roman Catholic church, and will be consecrated at St. Louis. Mr. Kenrick is of Philadelphia, and brother of bishop Kenrick of this city. [Pha. U. S. Gaz.]

The right rev. bishop England, departed on his way to the Catholic church, London, on last day, and on Saturday morning, previous to embarking on board the Britannia, for Liverpool.

BANKS. The draft of a memorial to congress from the chamber of commerce at New York in behalf of a national bank was adopted ayes 36 to nays 20. The memorial is to be printed under the direction of a committee having charge of the subject, and the same committee are requested to call on the various chambers of commerce bodies of the union, to aid in the great work of establishing a national currency.

The directors of the Frederick County bank have requested the holders of the notes to send them in or to notify them of their numbers and description without delay. No discovery of the robbers yet.

CORN LAWS. A writer in the Glasgow Argus, who signs himself "The Clearing," writes in a letter to a "New land," asserts that "it is no exaggeration to say, because it can be demonstrated, that the corn law here is a pretentious game at least 200,000 persons annually in Great Britain." Well, then, the writer says, "What punishment the Almighty may have in store for the producers of so much misery, it is not for fallible men to attempt to scrutinize."

ROBERT F. CRYST, who was cast in Virginia last year, for selling stolen goods, has been convicted of burglary at Lynch, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment at Auburn.

CATTLE. Mr. Wolcott's sale of fine cattle at Franklin, N. H., went off with spirit. There were 27 animals sold, the highest at $550 and the lowest, a calf, at $23. "Kate," eight years old, sold for $305; "Cleopatra," four years old, sold for $300, and "Isabel," five years old, sold for $250. There were also several milkers, and were every way worthy the prices paid. "Prince Albert," a nice imported Berkshire pig, was sold for $110. He does credit, it is said, to the English breed. [New York Times and New American.]

COTTON. The Charleston Mercury says the last cotton crop was about 1,600,000 bales.

New Orleans, May 19. The sales for the last three days embrace 11,903 bales, at full prices. The market has been unaffected by the war in Mexico. Liverpool classification—Louisiana and Mississippi, ordinary 9 1/2; good fair 10 1/2; middling fair 10 1/2; fine 11 1/2; good fair 12 1/2; good and fine 13 1/2.

COPPER. The Michigan state geologist states in his report that there is a rock near the Ontonagon river in that state, weighing three or four tons, called the copper rock, a part of which has been analyzed and yielded 98 per cent. of pure metal.

COPY-RIGHT OF TWO YEARS AFTER THE MAST. The Newburyport Herald states that the Harpers have Mr. Dana only $200 for the copy-right of this work. They have sold, it says, already 30,000 copies, on which they have made $5,000, and expect to realize $5,000 more from it.

CURENCY. The Detroit Daily Advertiser of the 21st says there is no change for the better. "Bank of Michigan sells at fifty cents for the dollar for specie, and is received by many merchants at from five to six millings on the dollar. Farmers and mechanics and Northern Insurance, in great demand, but very little in circulation. State scrip will probably be issued next week."

CUBA. Prince Angoula, ex-governor of Cuba, sailed in the Silve de Gray, for Havre.

DEED. Judge Richard Winn died at his residence, near Alexander, La., on the 5th ult. from an attack of congestive fever. He was for several years a member of the senate and a member of the state and national conventions was a candidate on the Van Buren ticket for congress. He is said to have been much admired and beloved by his friends, and the members of the bar in his neighborhood paid a just tribute to his memory.

DEATHS. From the beginning of the reign of George III. up to this time, that is, during his reign and those of George IV, William IV, and Victoria, there have been about 300 deaths in England. Out of these, in three cases about the parties were killed; of the balance, 90 were killed, 160 were wounded desperately, 60 slightly, and the remainder escaped unhurt. It is estimated that during the last thirty years, one-fifth of those engaged are killed and about one-half are injured.

loss severely injured. Out of all these 200 deaths, in which were engaged 400 principals and 400 seconds, 800 in all, there have grown out 20 prosecutions at law; which twenty prosecutions have resulted in 10 acquittals, 6 convictions of manslaughter, and 4 convictions in the first degree. Of the 4 persons convicted, 2 were hanged and 2 imprisoned. Some of the names standing highest in English history have been engaged in the case, such as the Duke of Wellington, Lord Byron, Lord and Richmond, Lord Sturges, Macarty, Exmouth, Townsend, Talbot, Lauderdale, Londonderry, Malins, Sir John, Sir Charles, Sir George, London, the Duke of Wellington, Pitt, Fox, Sheridan, Canina, Tennyson, Sir Francis Bardon, and many others. The English take a good deal about the loss of life and property in the country, they would look at home they would see ten deaths, in which members of the house of lords or commons were engaged, to one in this country, in which a common man was a party. [New York Journal.]

DR. ELDRIDGE. A third jury is now empanelled at Philadelphia, endeavoring to come to an unanimous opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

EXCHANGE. New York on England 8 1/2; on Boston 1 1/2; Philadelphia and Baltimore 4 1/2; Washington 4 1/2; New Orleans 3 1/2; St. Louis 3 1/2; Savannah 3 1/2; Mobile 1 1/2; New Orleans 7 1/2; St. Louis 9 1/2; Louisville 9 1/2; Cincinnati 9 1/2; Nashville 12.

FOUR has advanced in the New York Philadelphia market to $4 1/2. The imports in Baltimore last week were 5,907 bbls. 439 lbs.

FIRE. The "National theatre" lately erected at New York, was set fire to in eight or nine places on Friday evening last. The cause was discovered, and it was supposed, exhausted, but before day next morning, flames burst from the building, and it was soon again a pile of ruins—having been built upon the site of a theatre that was burnt down a few years since. A person has been arrested on suspicion of being the incendiary. A trial scene was burned under the roof of an adjoining building.

THE GREAT FORTRESS. A person supposed to be the English spy, who was a forger, who had stolen half a dozen of the banks no longer since out of some fifty or eighty thousand dollars, was pursued from Hingham, Penn., to St. Louis, Mo., and there arrested. He had been by several different names, viz. Williams, Shaw, &c. and was sporting freely. His person attracted the description in the advertisement, and his hand-writing was said to resemble that of John Brown. Being brought before Judge Brown under habeas corpus, he was discharged, "because evidence" not being deemed sufficient proof to detain him.

LOCKPORT. The population of the village of Lockport, N. Y., the census just taken, is 6,953 about the same as last year.

PRIZE EXTERMINATION. About 1,200 square miles real estate, 360,000 persons, 225,000 sheep, producing 400,000 pounds of wool per annum. No wonder can be afforded to wear command on his vest.

ST. PETERSBURG, at the close of 1840, according to official returns contained 70,302 inhabitants, 8,651 houses, and 168 churches, of which all were of the Greek rite, except 21 of various other persuasions.

ROTS. The disturbances on the Croton water works, New York, have been renewed, and rows between the Cockburn and Fenderson sections, are of frequent occurrence. The laborers assembled nightly, and commit all kind of outrages, such as burning stables and out-houses, tearing down fences, and things of a like nature; and on the night of the 23d, they assembled in a gang and tore down the house of a contractor named McGinnis. The mob was about three hundred strong, and proceeded with their work, although they were repeatedly fired upon by the officers of the police and others.

SCHOOLS. There are now 250,900 children in the common schools of Pennsylvania. That's the way to make good republicans.

SUMMARY. The brig Minstrel, well known as a passenger vessel between Ireland and Quebec, left America on the 21st April, with 141 emigrant passengers, and had a fair passage until the 1st May, morning, when they were overtaken by a heavy sea running at the time the boats were launched and made fast to the fore chains. Upwards of one hundred passengers embarked in the boat, but their hands were equally unfortunate companion on board the ship, except four of the crew and four passengers, who alone of upward of the 150 souls remained to tell the tale. They were during the night in a heavy sea, which was towing across, and fortunately for them the rope which attached it to the vessel broke when they were down. They succeeded in pulling to White Point, where they were rescued by the Minstrel, which was towing across, and brought to Grimsby. Captain Osterhouse, of the Minstrel, behaved bravely, and saved the lives of all the passengers, except one who perished with the rest. He declared that he would not leave the vessel until his passengers were saved, and he was the last person seen by those who were in the tug.

A NEW APPLICATION OF STEAM POWER TO BOATS. The Norfolk Herald of Thursday says: The new steamboat built expressly to test the utility of the plan, has been sent out of propelling vessels by the steam engine, made an excursion on the canal on Tuesday, with general Scott, the president and directors of the Canal company, and other gentlemen. The result was a complete success, and the conviction of the complete success of the plan, and of its capacity for supplying all the deficiencies of the steamboats heretofore in use. It can be used in ships of war, in the navy, and in the coast guard, and in fact, indeed, for harbor and coast defence, less so than they now are, as it dispenses with spars and rigging; and in canal boats, it is said, without causing any wasting away of the timber, and without what is done by the ordinary tow-boat. Of the speed there is, as yet, no opportunity of forming a correct idea, for the fact being a mere experiment; it is believed that some improvements which have been suggested by its operations, would surpass her in that particular. We can say, however, that upon all disadvantages, she has made from 20 to 25 miles an hour. We but very soon to be able to furnish a fuller specification of this most important improvement in steam navigation.

THE STEAMER BRITANNIA, on entering the harbor at Halifax 30 hours from Boston, struck on a cluster of rocks off Sambro's point, in a dense fog, and was wrecked immediately; it was thought advisable to proceed to St. Johns, where the tide would admit of examining, and if necessary, repairing her bottom without her embarking, and without alarm to those that will be looking for her in England.

SPECTER. Her Britannic majesty's ship Electra, left Valparaiso, Chile, in February last, for England, with over a million of dollars in specie, 700,000 of which she got on her way to England, and the balance in specie. The Natchez at New York brings $102,000 in specie.

SUGAR. Two hundred years ago, sugar could only be had of the apothecary. Now, the annual consumption of the drug in the United States alone, is estimated at eighty millions of pounds! "Want sweet foods!"

TEMPERANCE REFORM. The Washington Temperance society of Boston, composed, it is said, exclusively of men who were hard drinkers, already numbers upwards of twelve hundred. It was called into existence by the efforts of a powerful and influential committee by the committee of the Washington Temperance society of Baltimore, during their recent visit to that city. The members of the German Reformed church state that they had been looking for a "Natchez" at Philadelphia. "He held in Montgomery county, it was resolved, that "no rum seller" shall hereafter be admitted to church membership.

Tobacco. At Baltimore prices declined about 25 cents in the hundred pound—prime Virginia 10 1/2; middling 10 1/2; good 10 1/2; and fine 10 1/2. Kentucky of fair quality sold for export, at 85. Ohio not much inquired for, holders are not willing to sell. Maryland 150 bbls. Virginia 43 bbls. Kentucky and 10 bbls. Virginia—total 1,692 bbls.

The St. Louis papers say: "The Oceana brought down in St. Louis last week 30 bbls. of tobacco, the product of the Platte country—a section of the state scarcely inhabited two years ago. Preparations are making for the extensive cultivation of tobacco in that fine region of Missouri."

THE THUNDERBOLT. British exploring brig, is at anchor in the Delaware—from whence she will sail in a few days for England.

WESTERN LAW. The Cleveland Palladium reports a case of which the following are the main facts: It appears that the trustees of A. T. Brooks and others in Clinton county, Ohio, for abduction of negroes and getting up a riot; the jury understood the judge to charge that they must bring in three guilty or not; but not being able to make up their minds, they brought in a verdict that all were guilty, and left the court to select the offenders. Three of these were not proved to have been present, nor were their names mentioned by any witness, yet the court pronounced them guilty, and that although it was evident there was no evidence against them, still it had not been proved that they were not present, and guilty and the rest. Thirteen individuals were made to elect their punishment, and one of them and water for five days; five of the thirteen to pay a fine of $20 each, and eight others a fine of $5 each. The judge said that during the trial, he was in consideration of poor health imprisoned but a few hours.

WATER. A young woman employed in the Albion cotton factory, Troy, N. Y., wore in the month of March 2 7/8 dollars. No. 221—wages for the month, $22.50.

WHEAT. Prices have advanced in the Baltimore market from $1.00 to 1.02 for Maryland red, $1.13 for white, and $1.09 for Pennsylvania red.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

Recall of the corn laws. All England is occupied with this great question. The scheme of ministers is to adopt a fixed duty on imported corn, viz: 4s. 6d. per quarter of 8 bushels, equal to 22 casks per bushel of 70 lbs.; 5s. sterling on rye; 4s. 6d. on barley, and 3s. 4d. on oats.

Connected with this scheme is another to lower duties on foreign sugars, and by increasing the duties on timber from Canada in effect to lower that upon timber from the Baltic.

These measures all make up one scheme, and the consequence is that it has carried the agriculturalists, the ship owners, the East and West India proprietors, and not least, the anti-slavery interest to combine against ministers. The leading Tory aristocracy, as the chief landed proprietors, are opposed to a change in the laws that will bring foreign corn from cheap countries into competition with that raised on a soil which like the land of England, has to bear such a weight of taxation. The ship owners object to the increase of duty on Canada timber, and the anti-slavery people, and the colonial slave owners, unite in declaring that the admission of foreign sugars will ruin the free sugar colonies.

Against this formidable array, ministers have the free trade people, and stronger than these, the hundreds of thousands of operatives in the great cities and manufacturing towns, whose first want is cheap bread.

On occasion of a petition presented in the house of lords, by Earl Fitzwilliam, signed by 35,000 persons from Leeds, in favor of repealing the corn laws, the duke of Wellington made a speech against any change.

The main question upon the alteration of the corn laws will not come on till some time this month; but in the incidental discussion upon altering the duties on sugar, the whole range of the subject is run through, and the leading minds of the nation are at work.

This is undoubtedly "the word of fear" which ministers pronounced, when, as is freely charged, not from any love for the measure, but for the sake of keeping their own places, they threw before the nation the proposition to repeal or essentially modify the corn laws.

If defeated in parliament, it is said they have the permission of the queen to go to the people, and by dissolving the house of commons, take the chances of a new election under the banner of free trade in corn, and cheap bread. [N. Y. Amer.]

The Philadelphia United States Gazette publishes the following letter, said to be written by a gentleman in London, whose official station gives him an opportunity to see and judge, from which it would appear that ministerial action is not to be seconded, though, ere long, the duties must fall:

London, May 17. We are in great agitation here. Ministers have proposed an alteration of the corn laws, and sugar and timber duties. And, although the first debate (which is on sugar) is not through, they know they will be beaten by twenty-five to forty votes, and wish to resign; but the queen, who has an absolute antipathy to the Tories, objects, and has refused to accept their resignations. If they go out now, they will come in again in six short time, considerably strengthened. But if they pass the poor law, and then dissolve, their enemies, who vote for the law in the house of commons, and oppose it at the hustings, will beat them in a new parliament. But still the corn laws are doomed to a change before long.

SOUTH AMERICA.

Islands of the Pacific. Population in the Sandwich Islands. What is the amount of the population at this time? Is it known with any degree of exactness? We suppose not. According to the census of 1836 it amounts to 108,750. The census of 1838 gave 130,218, as follows, viz:

	1832.	1836.	Decr. in 4 yrs.
Hawaii,	43,792	39,364	6,428
Maui,	35,062	24,199	10,863
Molokai,	6,000	6,000
Lanai,	1,600	1,200	400
Kahoolawe,	80	18
Oahu,	29,755	26,809	1,946
Kauai,	10,977	9,934	2,043
Niihau,	1,047	993	54

If these data are correct, they exhibit a decrease of 21,734, in the short space of four years.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

EXPRESS. The rapidity of the express conveying the president's message east, we believe, without a parallel. The following is a statement of the time at which the express arrived at and left the principal points on the route, leaving Washington at 8 minutes before 12 o'clock, M. on Tuesday, 1st instant.

Arrived at Baltimore	1 06.	Left do.	1 30
"	Hovre de Grace 2 23
"	Winnington 4 00
"	Philadelphia 5 15
"	N. Brunswick 8 00
"	Jersey City 9 01
"	New York 9 30
"	Boston	9 36,	having been delayed three hours by a dense fog.

The message was taken from Washington to Frederick, on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, a distance of 84 miles, in exactly three hours. The last twenty miles, from Mount Airy to Frederick, was run in 30 minutes, the last 6 miles in 7 minutes, and the last 3 miles in 3 minutes, (this last at the rate of 60 miles an hour!)

On being received in Frederick, Messrs. Stockton & Falls sent an express with it to the west, to overtake the fast mail.

CONSULAR. The president has recognized James Winthrop Andrews, esq. as consul of the republic of Venezuela for the port of Boston, and Duncan Robertson, of Norfolk, as vice consul of Sweden and Norway for the state of Virginia.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN THE U. STATES AND TEXAS. It is reported that by the line now being run by the two governments, seventeen townships will be sliced off the Red River district, Louisiana, and added to Texas.

NORTHEAST BOUNDARY. Brig Mollo, captain Forbes, employed to survey and explore the northeastern boundary, cleared at New York on Friday, for the river St. Lawrence. She carries out as passengers, hon. Albert Smith, of Portland, commissary; O. Goodrich, assistant commissary; Messrs. Richard A. Gilpin, William A. Waller, Edward R. Brill, Edward Anthony and John A. Munroe, esq. letters.

LETTER FROM THE MINISTER OF THE U. STATES AT LONDON TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

London, of the U. S. London, May 3, 1841.
 Sir: The arrival of the British Queen last week brought the painful intelligence of the death of the president of the United States, at the seat of government on the 4th of April. I deemed it proper to communicate immediately to Lord Palmerston the melancholy event, and have the honor of forwarding to you copies of my note and his lordship's reply. You will see that the manner in which the intelligence was received, and the feeling expressed on the part of the queen and her government.

As the representative of my government and an American citizen, I also deemed it proper to assemble such of my countrymen as were in London at my house for the purpose of paying respect to the memory of the chief magistrate, and expressing their sympathy under such an unexpected calamity. A copy of their proceedings I now transmit. They were published, as you will see in the English papers. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 A. STEVENSON.

DANIEL WEBSTER, esq. secretary of state.
 Mr. Stevenson to Lord Palmerston.
 22 Upper Grosvenor St. April 29, 1841.

My Lord: It is with deep concern that I hasten to communicate to your lordship the painful intelligence I have just received of the death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, the late president of the United States, which took place at the city of Washington on the morning of the 4th inst.

In communicating this melancholy event, I feel persuaded that your lordship and the British nation will fail to participate in the general grief into which this sudden calamity has plunged the whole body of the American people. I pray your lordship to accept assurance of my distinguished consideration and respect.
 A. STEVENSON.

Lord Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson.

Foreign Office—April 30, 1841.
 Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which you addressed to me on the 29th instant, announcing to me the melancholy intelligence of the death of general Harrison, the president of the United States.

I have not failed to lay this communication before the queen; and I have received her majesty's commands to express to you the deep and unfeigned regret with which her majesty has received the painful tidings of the sudden decease of the distinguished individual who has been so recently elevated by his fellow citizens to the honorable and important post of their chief magistrate.

I beg that you will have the goodness to communicate these her majesty's sentiments to the new president and to his government, and to assure them that the British government fully participates in the grief which this unexpected calamity has caused to the American people.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to you the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,
 PALMERSTON.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

To the editors of the state of Pennsylvania.
 Sleeping into the capitol a few days since in order to see our members, they appeared to be a very respectable body of men. Looking a little more minutely I came to the conclusion that every member of both houses was dressed in English broad-cloth or foreign fabrics—if this is the fact, how much did it take to equip each member? Say on an average $100, both houses consists of 135 members making $13,500, however what e'er the precise amount may be, the gentlemen members sent it to foreign countries, instead of encouraging Pennsylvania and her factories—members who thus decorate themselves at the expense of the state—does the act render them more economical more fit or competent to make pure wholesome domestic Pennsylvania law?

What a contrast between our members and queen Victoria's mother respecting national integrity; the making a present of a erudite quilt to her granddaughter, it must be exclusive of English manufacturing—our members, their clothing must be of foreign manufacturing.

Therefore for the honor and benefit of the state and the integrity of the people, it is to be hoped, that no member will ever appear in the legislative halls dressed in English broad-cloth or foreign fabrics.

These remarks do not only apply to the members of the legislature but they apply to at least nine-tenths of the people of the state, all encouraging foreign countries by wearing their fabrics in preference to our own.

When standing before the glass adjusting these foreign fabrics upon our person, if we only had Pennsylvania blood in our bodies, we should we should shrink back with indignation at the injury we have done, and are inflicting on the country which we are bound by every tie of honor and gratitude to support. In order, therefore, to retrace our steps and to come out clean and hand for our country, let us form ourselves into a grand society, that is, every man and woman, boy and girl within the pale of the state, to be a society within themselves for the promotion of domestic industry of every description.

The imports of clothes amounts to about 8 millions yearly—this is truly deplorable, lamentable, that we, men, citizens of the United States should so far forget our love of country as to pay 8 millions yearly for our clothing instead of adding our own factories which are languishing for want of our assistance. As the last 50 years of our government ended with December, 1840, let us commence the present 50 years as real friends to the country by using domestic clothing instead of foreign, and to live within our income.

The imports of silks on an average amounts to about 16 millions yearly—the ladies are patriotic, possess too much love of country, not to retrace their steps and lend their aid which is very powerful in lowering the imports and furthering domestic industry—the day is not far distant when our ladies will be more engaging and more attracting in their domestic calicoes, than those in their costly French, Italian or English silks. Why should it not be so, the former supporting the country, the latter supporting foreign countries—and it is to be hoped the day is not far distant when our ladies will dress themselves in domestic silks, and appear more engaging and lovely than they ever did in foreign productions.

Agreeable to the late census, Pennsylvania contains 1,700,560 human beings; now supposing each cost only $10 for foreign fabrics which would amount to 17 millions yearly—were we only faithful to our own state, and keep this amount entirely among ourselves by employing our own people in place of foreign, in a few years it would not be poor Pennsylvania but it would be Pennsylvania against the world.

The two candidates for the highest office in the state, which ever succeeds, will for the honor of the state and his integrity, take the oath office in a domestic suit of clothes manufactured in some of his neighboring wares.

Never was there in any age, more union of agricultural more concert of action in that of we citizens of Pennsylvania in favor of foreign factories and machineries—from the highest citizen to the lowest from the richest to the poorest, from the father to the sons, from the mother to the daughters, all as it were vying with each other who can wear the finest foreign fabrics, and send the most money to the subjects of the kings and queens of Europe.

These kings and queens, especially queen Victoria, must laugh in their sleeves, and would even try to out load us with their interest to do so, at our credulity. No general ever had his army better trained than they have or in their favor, and against our particular interests.

Let us then my fellow citizens throw off the foreign yoke, and come out boldly Pennsylvanians, each of us determined to buy no more foreign goods, listen not to others but do your own duty, consequently our factories would come into existence, as by the power of magic.

This communication has to contend against a powerful opposition, but it is nothing, we will stick to the ship Pennsylvania as long as we are able to buy, pay and wear domestic clothing.

W. McKINIGHT.

The above communication was first inserted in the Harrisburg Keynote, with the remark—

"The sentiments expressed in the following communication have a smack of primitiveness" about them which perhaps do little to recommend them to the favor of modern political economists. But there are no doubt a number of our readers who will cheerfully respond to the doctrines of the writer and not less readily because of their resemblance to those of the wise and venerated Franklin."

[Keynote, May 1st, 1841.]

THE OREIDAS. These red men, observes the Buffalo Journal, entered into an arrangement for the charter of the Fairport, at $850, to carry them to Kettle Creek, their place of destination, and left on Thursday last. Among those who have gone with this detachment, are the kindred of many that have "done this same service" in bygone days.

*Primitive means—state of being, original, antiquity, conformity to antiquity.

Moses Schuyler, who had his 900 men under Winfield Scott, during the last war, was not the least conspicuous of the brave and the good granddaughters of the famous chief, Skeneado, spoken of by col. Stone, in his sketch of Brant. One of these girls, and she has just attained that age where the female form assumes its exquisite contour, symmetry and classic action, is allowed to be decidedly the noblest specimen of the uncivilized Indian, now existing among the remnant of the Six Nations. She is represented to be the admiration of all the young chiefs, and the envy of all her female associates. She is a daughter of a young law.

The agent also pointed out to us a chief whose age has been authenticated at 103 years. His name is Peter Somers, or, as he is familiarly called, "Good Peter." This old man is in full possession of his faculties, and quite eloquent. On the day on which the boat arrived, Peter got out at Black Rock and walked to the city, beating the tardy gaited canal craft half a mile. His eagerness, he said, was to walk over and behold once more his old hounding ground and the little town of Tebrosoroo.

THE SENECA. Our Buffalo namesake is in error as to the number of Indians in the service upon the Niagara frontier during the last war. There were never more than five hundred upon the warful in the conflict, and the majority of these were Senecas. They were moreover attached to the command of general Peter B. Porter, not to that of general Scott. Schuyler, by the way, is a very interesting man, has a fine head, and ought to have been painted, before he commenced his journey toward the setting sun. There is yet another Schuyler, of the Ooridas, who refuses, we believe, to emigrate. He is one of the most interesting looking men we ever saw. His head is a noble study for an artist, and if W. H. W. who has painted the Indian, yet exhibited to New York, will go up to the old castle "in the leafy month of June," he may add another laurel sprig to the wreath of his name. We should like a copy.

Persons, that whose descendants are mentioned among the emigrants, was not only a great but a good man. He died in 1816, at the advanced age of about 110 years, and, agreeably to his own request, was buried in Clinton, by the side of his friend the revolutionary war, Samuel H. Johnson, who was once intemperate. One night, about sixty-five years before his death, being in attendance upon an Indian council with sir William Johnson, in Albany, he became so intoxicated as to fall in a gutter, whence he was taken up to the morning. Stung with mortification, he vowed never to taste the "fire water again," and he kept his pledge. Under the preaching of Mr. Kirkland he became an exemplary Christian, and died in the faith and triumph of Christianity. His funeral services were preached by the late rev. Dr. Backus, president of Hamilton college. We have a very eloquent and touching speech of Skeneado in manuscript, for future use.

Another interesting Indian mentioned as being among the emigrants, is Peter Somers, or "Good Peter," or "Domino Peter," as he has been called. This worthy man has long been a historical personage. His name appears in our revolutionary history. In the appendix to Dr. Will Clinton's Historical Collections on the Six Nations, is the report of a speech of Good Peter, delivered at a council held in Albany, in 1789, which is one of the best specimens of Indian eloquence extant. The council was held by governor George Clinton, and the speech was reported by young De Witt.

The late censorious councillor, Sumner, to whom, as a profound legislator, the state of New York was more indebted than to any other man, in the communication to the New York Historical society, spoke highly of Good Peter. In regard to the young chief, De Witt Clinton, Mr. J. Jones thought it not so good as one which he (Mr. J.) heard him deliver the preceding year at Fort Stanwix. Mr. J. preserved an outline of the last mentioned speech, though not the language. In the evening, at Good Peter's request, we witnessed the passage of the white people for land, and the thirst of the Indians for the fire-water, were equally insatiable; that the white men had zero and fixed their eyes on the Indians' good land, and the Indians had zero and fixed their eyes on the white men's keg of rum,—and that nothing could divert either from their desired object; and therefore there was no remedy—but the white man must have the land, and the Indian the keg of rum.

The evening into a volume of president Dwight's travels in that evening, we witnessed the following passage respecting "Good Peter," which is alike interesting and beautiful:

"While Mr. Kirkland was a missionary to the Orendas, being answell, he was unable to preach on a certain Sabbath, and told Good Peter, one of the heads of the Orendas, that he must address the congregation. He modestly but reluctantly assented. After a few words of introduction he began a discourse on the character of the Saviour. "What, my brethren," said he, "are the views which you form of the character of Jesus? You will answer, perhaps, that he was a man of singular benevolence. You will tell me that he proved this by his character by the nature of the miracles which he wrought. All these, you will say, were kind in the extreme. He created bread for thousands who were ready to perish. He raised to life the son of a poor woman, who was a widow, and to whom his labors were necessary for support in old age. Are these, then, your only views of the Saviour? I tell you they are lame. When Jesus came into our world he threw his blanket around him, but the God was within!"

Doctor Dwight states that he received the anecdotes from Mr. Kirkland's own lips; and we will testify the whole American pulpit to excel this little illustration of the Saviour's character, either in force, simplicity or beauty. How little did president Dwight imagine, when penning this incident, that a quarter of a century after his own decease, this same "Good Peter" would be on the march with the fragments of his nation for a new country as the great west!

UNION. We find in the Winechester Republican the concluding paragraphs of an address delivered by the rev. Spencer H. Cone, during the sitting of the Baptist Convention in Baltimore. The Bible cause was before the body, and Mr. Cone was urging the importance of union in all works of benevolence designed for the diffusion of Christian knowledge and the amelioration of the human family:

"The successful prosecution of this enterprise union is indispensable. Do soldiers, and politicians and men of the world, appreciate duly the importance of this principle, to their various sphere of action? God forbid that they should continue to be warring in their generation, then the children of light are in their hearts, in coming to this meeting, our heart was deeply affected while I learned upon the arm of a brother and gazed upon the Calvert street monument, erected to the memory of the brave men who fell at the battle of North Point, September 12, 1814. The first names which were inscribed upon the monument were McComas and Wells; and as in instant, the scenes of that memorable day were present. We belonged to the battalion of Sharp Shooters, and were stationed in the edge of a wood, within three miles from the point; when one of the videts riding furiously to his quarters, delivered the stirring news that the British were landing below us. The general immediately sent one of his aids along the line for two hundred volunteers, including thirty Sharp Shooters, to feel the pulse of the enemy. As they stepped out, one after another, Wells said to me, I am this day 21 years old—just out of my apprenticeship; I know I shall be shot, but I'll go with you—live or die. We advanced rapidly to ascertain the position of the invaders, and were soon upon them; swift flew the leaders messengers, and one of the first was sent to poor Wells; it passed through his head, and he faintly exclaimed, I am a dead man. Oh, never shall I forget the sound of his voice as he uttered the words, I am a dead man. He turned his eyes to me, he looked up in my face—till across my feet, and expired.

"My brethren, shall men thus devote themselves to their country, and follow their leader, whether to live or die, and shall we not manifest equal devotion to the cause of the great Captain of our salvation? Do we talk of union?"

"Baltimoreans! participants in the scenes of Sept. 1814, preach to American Baptists, I beseech you, on the nature and necessity of union. Remember the bombardment of Fort McHenry, as from the opposite hill top we watched the range of red and white flames, and the smoke of the enemy's guns, as they poured in their shot and shells, as they were so warmly as though it were the death knell of some brother in arms; remember, that full ten thousand men were at the same moment pressing with feeble feet our native soil, and already within a few miles of the city of Washington; and as we were prepared to meet them here, every avenue but miles around was crowded with women and children, flying for safety; then, when we saw the troops from Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania coming to our aid, did we ask—from what states do they come? Did we pause to consider the following questions or local prejudices! No! the stars and stripes upon their floating banner bespoke a common country and a common cause; and to preserve the old American Eagle from the British lion's paw, we the ardent, the common purpose of every patriotic heart. We heard the immortal Washington, the father of his country, though dead, still speaking—united we stand, divided we fall; and shoulder to shoulder we breathe the storm of war. And still we not much farther be united in winking the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God; in obeying the commandment of Him who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them?"

We register the foregoing extract not only on account of its wholesome spirit, but also in justice to the memory of the brave young soldier whose fate was deplored at the time his death was announced. From his boyhood he had marked his intrepidity. He was a native of Annapolis, which city has contributed as many, if not more martyrs to the cause of the country in both of the wars we have had with Great Britain, than any community of the same number in the nation. It was from Annapolis that SMALLWOOD's regiment marched to the front rank of Washington's army and so gallantly sustained the brunt of the battle upon Long Island, establishing a reputation for the "Maryland line" which never was afterwards questioned during the revolutionary war. In 1814 Mackinnon and Miller, two of the very handsomest and most promising young men of Annapolis, forming part of a detachment of volunteers, were sent to the front, where the capital was threatened, mustered and marched without orders to join general Winder's army at the Long-old Finks, were killed—both shot in the face, whilst posted at the right of the regulars and waiting for orders to fire upon the enemy as they approached over the bridge at Bladensburg. One of a third member of that little detachment, died after the battle, of actual fatigue. He had a frame incapable of the effort required, but a spirit which did not allow him to calculate the danger. He mentioned the above extract was one of the small squad whose fire was fatal to general Ross, the enemy's commander-in-chief on the approach upon Baltimore. His father was commander of an artillery company and in battery at Annapolis, when the fate of his son was communicated to him by the one who penes this paragraph.

"I hope he behaved himself like a man," was the first inquiry. "There is reason to suppose that it was a ball from his rifle that killed general Ross," was the reply. It was consolation to the general, to learn that his son had so distinguished himself, and he yielded him up to his country like a true patriot. Tears trickled from his manly face as he turned and beheld the widow of his son, and, seeing to his mind, that he was only the more willing to encounter the coming foe; it was then supposed that the British were talking back upon Annapolis.

THE ARMY.

At Fort King, Florida, at the last date, 106 men were sick, out of 135 in the garrison. A letter to the Savannah Georgian, dated Gopher Hill, Florida, May 22d, says: "We have received the painful intelligence that the Indians have committed a number of murders in the neighborhood of 'Ocean Pond.' Upwards of an hundred head of cattle have been driven off from Fort Walker. Their trail leads south."

"I presume are indebted to Alluck-tuck-tuck-gee for this last suit. Three days since, four Indians made their appearance at Fort King, and asked for a wagon to bring their families in. This is favorable, and if not, with success in finding Hopkies, we will send the coming winter."

THE NAVY.

National courtesy. Lieut. John S. Payne, of the U. S. schooner Gampus, in a letter to the navy department, under date of Port Paja, March 12, 1841, speaks in the highest terms of the courtesy extended towards him and his sick crew upon their arrival at the Cape de Verda. The sick were admitted to the hospital and barracks without delay. The matter is noticed officially in this National Intelligencer.

Official. Navy department, June 2, 1841. Intelligence has reached the navy department of the arrival of the U. S. sloop of war Yorktown, commander Autick, at Valparaiso, on the 20th of March, in about forty-three days from Rio de Janeiro, all well.

The Daie was expected to arrive at Valparaiso in a day or two, having parted company with the Yorktown on the 26th February off Staten Island.

The U. S. sloop Delaware, captain McCauley, destined for the Mediterranean, was turned down to Hampton Roads on Friday, by the U. S. steamer Poinsett.

We learn, that com. Morris, will shortly leave the navy board, and hoist his broad pennant on board the Delaware.

Tribute of respect. Mianle guns were fired from the U. S. brig Ironsides on this station, and her colors displayed half mast, on Wednesday at noon, as a mark of respect to the memory of commodore Austin, late commander-in-chief of the U. S. naval forces in the Pacific. (Bell. Amer.)

The Norfolk Herald states that lieut. Hunter's experimental steamboat on the plan of the horizontal submerged wheel, has been taken by him to Washington, by order from the secretary of the war, to the Old Point Comfort on Monday morning, having gone down the evening before, purposely during a strong easterly breeze and a heavy sea in the roads, to test the new plan in rough weather.

MARYLAND COLONIZATION CONVENTION.

During the late session of the legislature of Maryland, a meeting of the friends of colonization took place at the seat of government, at which a resolution was adopted calling a convention of delegates to be chosen from the various parts of the state, to convene at the city of Baltimore on the 3d of June, in compliance with which a large number of delegates assembled on that day in the Methodist Episcopal church, Light street. On motion of J. H. B. LANE, of the city of Baltimore, and J. G. CHAPMAN, of Annapolis, was called to the chair and BLAINE MAYER, esq. of the city of Baltimore, was named as secretary, for the purpose of organizing the convention.

After the delegates elected, the reverend clergy of the state were invited to attend and participate in the deliberations of the convention; and the following gentlemen handed in their names to the secretary:

Bishop Waugh; rev. Dr. Henshaw; Geo. D. Purviance; E. Heimer; Mr. Minge; S. C. Jennings; Mr. Guitiere; R. Emory; David Steele; Chas. B. Tipton; Mr. Shepherd; Mr. Burnap; Mr. Guest; Mr. Hamner; Mr. Peck; Mr. Beckus.

LAKE, of Md.; Thos. C. of P. George's, a committee of one member from each county and from the city of Baltimore was appointed to recommend officers for the permanent organization of the convention, who reported the following names, and the convention was organized.

President—JOHN NELSON, of Baltimore city. Vice presidents—Rev. John Mines, of Montgomery; Ohio Scott, of Harford; John G. Chapman, of Custer; Dr. A. C. Thompson, of Dorchester; genl Thos. Emory, of Queen Anne's; genl T. H. Tipton, of Talbot; James B. Fagan, of Allegany; W. H. Tuck, of Prince George's. Secretaries—Blaine Mayer, H. Davy Evans, of Baltimore city.

After appropriate remarks from the president upon taking the chair, and a very interesting address from J. H. B. LANE, esq., president of the Maryland State Colonization society, who presented as from that body a printed communication to the members of the convention, which was read—and on motion of Mr. CHAPMAN was referred to a committee to consist of one for each county and one for the city of Baltimore to report what measures be necessary to be adopted.

A resolution introduced by Mr. Yellot of Harford county for encouraging the Maryland Colonization Journal, and another appropriating the galleries to the ladies was adopted. After which the convention adjourned until next morning, when Mr. Chapman from the committee, which had been meantime in session, reported as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the communication of the board of managers of the State Colonization society, beg leave to report—that they have had the same under consideration, and have weighed the several matters therein suggested with the attention and care that their profound interest demands. As the board of managers justly regard the subject of colonization in Maryland has possessed too long the sanction of the public, expressed abroad among the people, and recorded on the statute books—to render it necessary now to argue its merits or its expediency. These being fully admitted,—and the prosperous condition of the colony, re-established under the auspicious of the state, being proved beyond cavil—it only remains to determine the best mode to be adopted to enable Maryland to avail herself of the advantages which this plan of colonization presents—our care your committee doubt, that this can best be done, by awakening the people of the state to a proper sense of the importance of the subject by keeping their attention constantly fixed upon it. As the board of managers have recommended that commercial intercourse with the colony of Maryland in Liberia, more than any thing else, it is believed, tend to remove prejudice where it now exists, and bring about, at last, that voluntary emigration which, of itself, it is hoped, may be sufficient to accomplish the purposes of colonization.

With these views, your committee present herewith, several resolutions for the action of the convention.

Before concluding their report, your committee would express particularly, their satisfaction with the system of independent state action pursued by the society. Whatever doubts may have originally existed as to the ability of a single slave-holding state, and one too poor, as Maryland, to establish a colony sufficient for all the extent of the colonization within her borders—these have been removed by the success that has attended the colony at Cape Palmas—and it has been clearly proven that there is no necessity whatever for that extraneous interference with subjects connected with the colored population of a slaveholding state, which, no matter what may be its character or object, should, if possible, be always repudiated and prevented. All which is respectfully submitted,

J. G. CHAPMAN, chairman for the committee.

1. Resolved, That this convention look to the removal of the free colored people and manumitted slaves of Maryland with their own consent to Africa, as the legitimate object of the colonization system.

Resolved, That the idea that the colored people will ever obtain social and political equality in this state is wild and mischievous; and by creating among them hopes that can never be realized is at war with their happiness and improvement.

Resolved, That the society would greatly to be hoped that the free colored people of Maryland may see that their best and most permanent interests will be consulted by their emigration from this state; and while the emigration would deprecate any departure from the principle which makes colonization dependent upon the voluntary action of the free colored people themselves,—yet, if regardless of what has been done to provide them with an asylum, they continue to persist in remaining in Maryland, in the hope of enjoying here an equality of social and political rights—they ought to be solemnly warned that in the opinion of this convention they must arrive, when circumstances that cannot be controlled, and which are now maturing—will deprive them of the freedom of choice, and leave them no alternative but removal.

Resolved, That the progress of the colonization enterprise under the direction of the state society has been so far advanced, that it is probable that the present condition of the colony at Cape Palmas affords a happy earnest of the future prosperity of the African American commonwealth on the western coast of Africa, and that the same now offers a home for the free colored people of this state as desirable than any other place in this country or abroad.

Resolved, That the obligations of the people of Maryland, to sustain and cherish the colony, planted by their authority on the western coast of Africa, are sacred and binding nature, and that this convention recognize the same in their full extent.

Resolved, That the plan of independent state action with regard to colonization adopted by the state society, pre-eminently recommends itself to all the slaveholding states of this Union; and dignity alike require them to repudiate and prevent all extraneous interference with any matters connected with the subject of their colored population.

Resolved, That the establishment of direct commercial intercourse between Baltimore and the colony at Cape Palmas is a matter of great importance, and that the delegates to this convention from the different parts of the state, pledge themselves to aid the efforts that may be made in their respective counties, to secure a regular packet to run between the two points.

Resolved, That for the purpose of diffusing intelligence, raising funds, promoting emigration, and generally, keeping alive that interest and active effort in the efforts to distribute and educate the colored masses, it will be essential to the public welfare, it is recommended to the people of the state to form, for these purposes, associations auxiliary to the state society, in every town, village and neighborhood.

Resolved, That the delegates to this convention will use their best exertions, to promote the formation of the auxiliary associations above mentioned, and to procure in each county at least one hundred members to subscribe five dollars annually for the purposes of the society.

Resolved, That the board of managers be requested to aid forthwith, through their agents in the formation of the auxiliary associations in question, and to take measures to distribute Bibles through the state, as early as practicable, the information that has been laid before this convention.

A very interesting debate ensued, in which Mr. Chapman, of Charles county, rev. Mr. R. Emory, Mr. Carey, of Baltimore, Mr. Mines, of Montgomery, Mr. Casin, of St. Mary's, Mr. Knorr, of Baltimore, Mr. Pignas, of Alleghany, Mr. Estrope, of Baltimore, Mr. Gantt, of Anne Arundel, Mr. Tuck, of Prince George's, Mr. Stewart, of Montgomery, Mr. Giles, of Baltimore, the Rev. Dr. Hershaw, and bishop Waugh, of Baltimore, were the principal speakers. The convention adjourned for dinner. In the afternoon the discussion was renewed. Some modification of the resolutions was proposed and acceded to for the sake of unanimity, after which the whole were adopted. Resolutions were then adopted to carry out the views thus expressed, by instituting agents to visit the auxiliary societies—by employing missionaries from amongst the emigrants already established in the colony—by subscribing for the purchase of a regular packet ship to trade between the city of Baltimore and the colony—and by invoking the aid of the clergy of all denominations in the state, in behalf of the philanthropic and Christian aim of this most important undertaking. Thanks were returned to the proprietors of the house in which the convention had been accommodated, and to the officers, &c.; after which the convention adjourned au revoir.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

THE TALLMADGE FESTIVAL IN NEW YORK.

From the New York Express, May 27.

The meeting last evening was not only largely attended, but a unity of feeling and interest continued to the end. In all respects it was a gathering of political friends, and precisely such an assemblage will displace the opponents of the administration as much as it gives gratification to its friends.

The elegant saloon of the gardens was thrown open soon after seven o'clock. When all were seated, the number was about five hundred, good men and true, to all of whom the meeting was one of the most pleasant political gatherings they ever participated in to the city.

The following were the officers of the meeting: President—Alderman Bruen, of the Fifteenth ward.

Vice presidents—Henry W. Hicks, Adoniah Chandler, Peter B. Tivus, M. A. Noah, Redwood Fisher, David Graham, Charles B. Tappan, Thomas A. Power, Jacob S. Baker, Robert Smith, Daniel Ullman, R. H. Winslow, J. Phillips Phoenix, Shepherd Knapp, Edward Sanford, Levi Cook, George W. Bruce, George S. Doughty, Charles O'Connor, Benjamin Drake, Barr Walkeman, Wm. L. Stone, Frederick A. Gay.

Committee of reception—Lewis Eaton, Edward Joskins, Mortimer de Mott, C. Crolius, jr, William L. Morris, James D. Oliver, John J. Cisco, John Falconer.

REGULAR TOASTS.

1. The constitution of the United States—formed by American wisdom, sustained by republican laws, and defended by American valor.

2. The memory of William Henry Harrison—drank standing and in silence, the band playing a death march.

3. John Tyler in his elevation to the presidency—much as we lament the event which has produced it, the wisdom of the Harrison convention has been signally illustrated. 3 cheers.

4. Nathaniel P. Tallmadge—The man who dared to be honest in the worst of times. He has his reward in the affection of his friends and the confidence of the people. Received with six cheers.

5. The country—May all its business relations be improved, its wants reduced, and its comforts multiplied.

6. The ship of state—shattered by the tempests of the last twelve years, yet we doubt not the ability of the present crew to bring her safe into port.

7. The national administration—its objects the welfare of the people and the stability of the government.

8. Our foreign relations—Peace at every sacrifice but that of honor.

9. The army and navy—always able and always ready to respond to the calls of their country.

10. The judiciary—The ark of our political safety; poised by the arm that would strike down its constitutional independence.

11. The states—their sovereignty and their union not incompatible.

12. Agriculture, commerce and manufactures—The elements of national prosperity, equally entitled to the fostering care of the government.

13. Our country—may the only tyrants Americans are not authorized to resist.

At the close of the toast in honor of Mr. Tallmadge, which was received with deafening applause, the honored guest rose to speak. His presence called forth a new welcome, and rarely, if ever, has a public man been received with warmer demonstrations of welcome and applause. I rise, Mr. President and gentlemen, (said the speaker), to tender my grateful thanks for the sentiment just given—I do not flatter myself that I have done any thing to call forth such a demonstration as that which I have received, but I do feel that I have deserved to deserve your approbation. I have been assembled upon the present occasion to congratulate one another for the results of a victory growing out of a war waged upon the one side by the executive in behalf of executive usurpation, and the opposition offered by the people in resistance of usurpation.

I was one who aided in the elevation of the late executive, who was permitted to retire to private life. I was prepared to support him if he adhered to those measures which I was supposed would have governed him. I had seen in his illustrious predecessor what I believed to be some aberration of mind, and I was not prepared to see Mr. Van Buren follow in the footsteps of his predecessor. I had seen some of these aberrations. I had been to the Union.

We all saw towards the close of general Jackson's administration some of those usurpations which grew up with the specie circular introduced before the close of the administration, by the senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton). That measure had been rejected by the senate, and yet it was persevered in by the executive. It was twice rejected, and twice adhered to, even when sustained by the solitary vote of the senator from Missouri himself, as James Monroe did, almost without the show of opposition. I say without the show of opposition—and here I pay a deserved compliment to the whig party. They are a party who go for good laws, by whomsoever administered, and they do a little by whomsoever administered. [Great applause.]

The extra session of 1837 was also alluded to. Mr. Van Buren then, the speaker, brought forward a proposition condemned by general Jackson, and approved by congress, and passed by a party before him, as a measure pronounced officially to be destructive to the fundamental principles of liberty, and subversive of its practices from its establishment down to that time—a measure proposed to one which exposed the treasure of the nation to the control of one hundred hands, when but one before controlled it.

I have no fault to find with Mr. Van Buren for changing his opinion. The complaint I make against him is, that he would not tolerate a consistency of opinion, on the part of his friends—that he would not allow them to think as they had always thought before. He went to the people and the administration after the regular session was defeated. Regardless of this, when congress re-assembled at its regular session, the rejected measure was persisted in, and again recommended. The administration was again defeated, and again, in the exercise of party discipline, the measure was adhered to. In 1838 the administration party was again defeated, and though the great and almost the only measure of the party was thus signally opposed three times by the popular voice, the executive measure was clung to, the executive himself being determined not to bow to the popular voice, and to be compelled to be compelled to retire to private life. Had a public message been so treated by any monarch in Europe, he would have been driven from his throne. Charles the tenth, with his ministers, headed by Polignac, lost their country for a less offense. Were any king of England to attempt to force such a measure upon the people, after having been three times or once rejected by parliament, the insult would not have been borne; and yet by our democratic president it was three times attempted in defiance of the will of the people.

Mr. Tallmadge here left the past administration for the events connected with the late national triumph. We entered upon the campaign, said he, with a man for our chief, renowned for his military labors, and we were rewarded for his civil labors. The revolution was more important to us than the revolution of 1800. It was a pacific revolution, and one of the most important ever accomplished. With a gallant old chief to lead us on, we triumphed, and the address which came from him, illustrating the principles of government, will last as long as the government itself shall last. The good man has gone to his post, and he is gallant in every respect, and immortality is his. In his death there has been an experiment made on our government. A new man has been called to preside over the councils of the nation. I know him personally, and can speak of him by personal observation. I was in the senate with him, and I know him to be a man of a high order of intellect, of great purity and independence of character, and one who intends to assume the responsibilities which the constitution has placed upon him. He is determined to say no and for him in regard to appointments to office, that when they belong to the executive department he does not interfere, but when they come from the executive he alone is responsible. [Applause.] The blame, if there is any, must fall upon him and nobody else. Mr. T. dwelt at some length upon this topic, and alluded to the controversy in the convention which framed the constitution upon this same topic. In regard to removals from office, he said there must be more or less upon all occasions, when a new administration commences.

The administration brought the people to the verge of ruin, and changes were demanded. I complain not of the applicants for office, said Mr. T. My only regret is that so many worthy men are doomed to disappear from the scene of action, and to be in their action. Mr. Tyler, in his remarks to me, to which I have alluded, said that errors might be committed. But whether there are faults to be found or not, let us indulge no illiberal feelings or private grays by which we shall put in jeopardy the great measures which should be carried out for the good of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. T. next alluded to what would probably form the subjects of consideration at the extra session of congress. As I understood them, said he, and I speak for no one but myself, they will be first, by way of example, and as a warning to all persons who may offend in like manner hereafter, the repeal of the sub-treasury bill. [Deafening applause.] I will not discuss Mr. Benton's measure in any serious and disgusting to all. The matter in which the bill had been brought forth and only was alluded to, not omitting, of course, the agency of one branch of congress in disfranchising a state. You have seen the bill, and you know the nature of the proposition in your city. My old friend, Stephen Allen, a very honest man, as receiver general, put his money in the very bowels of the bank in order to procure a divorce of the bank. [Laughter and applause.]

The substitute to the sub-treasury bill was next considered and listened to with intense interest. Mr. T. first alluded to himself. Though not a member of congress when the old bank charter expired, he was apparently the recipient of a canon, for want of time, gave my reasons at length for the past and present opinions I entertain. I want with gen. Jackson for the state banks. The whigs differed from us; but thinking differently they expressed their opinions faintly. They wished us to test our experiment, and gave us fair play; while the president, one of its friends, turned round and denounced the very measure he had endeavored to establish. Mr. Benton said afterwards that he had intended to destroy the United States bank first, and then the state bank system. One reason why I would not go back to this system now is, that the opposition would fasten upon it, agitate it, carry it before the people, make a new currency question. We should have during such a contest no currency, no peace, no property, no security, no confidence, no bank. [Immense and prolonged cheering.] I shall go openly and without any disguise for a national bank, for the best bank we can get. I will not be particular even in my own judgment. I will go with the friends for whom I act, and who have placed me where I am. [Great cheering.]

The next measure which I suppose ought to be adopted in the bill for the distribution of the public lands. This is one of the most important measures which has been proposed, and its effect upon the stocks of the states will be most beneficial; it will improve the condition of the states. The objection to the measure that the present condition of the finances demanded the expenditure for national defence, is not a good one. Five millions will be required to pay the debt, and twenty millions in any other way. Where were we before these improvements, and what are we now? During a war a single campaign would cost more than all our investments in New York. If war comes, lay direct tax upon the personal and real property of the state. One-half mill tax upon New York's real estate would amount to $500,000 dollars. Your improvements have increased the value of this property twenty and a hundred fold; you do more in this way for defects than in any other, for nobody would feel the loss created. Let me, moreover, then, be divided among the states. As a representative intimately connected with this, Mr. Tallmadge spoke of the emancipation bill. I have been, said he, in favor of a permanent pre-emption bill, and always shall be.—(Applause.) But pre-emption distribution of slaves together, and the friends of both measures will be satisfied. Henry Clay was willing to go for the former with the latter. [The mention of Mr. Clay's name called down great applause from the audience.] I am, in general terms, in favor of a pre-emption law, because I wish to take care of the hardy pioneers who dwell in the log cabins of the west. [Mr. Tallmadge spoke eloquently here of some incident in his own domestic life, connected with home and childhood. He spoke of his father a pioneer to the west, and of his father's wish that he should be the first light of the wilderness. The log cabin melodies were not forgotten, and some of the lines were quoted with fine effect.]

"I knew by the smoke that so gracefully curled That the old log cabin was near, I said, if there was peace for one in the world, The heart might find its here."

Another measure likely to come before congress was next considered, the general bankrupt law. Mr. T. said: I give only my own opinions of this measure, and will not discuss it. I have been its friend from the beginning. I believe the law a good one, and that it should be established in every commercial community. I think that the states should make bankrupt laws, and that the laws should be uniform in their character. The effect would be not to increase, but the limitation of the credit system. Congress, in my opinion, does not exercise its duty until it makes this subject the law of the land. (Applause.)

On another measure should be adopted—a resolution to rescind the expurgating resolution. (Immense and prolonged applause.) In regard to this question, the discussion of which excited the most profound attention, Mr. Tallmadge said: In all my conduct before the assembly, I have been its friend, I opposed the mutilation of the journals of the senate. I continued that opposition down to the time I was instructed by the legislature of New York, which followed in the footsteps of Virginia. I had never made my mind to vote for the expurgation, but I was instructed, and having been brought up in the school of instruction, I did not feel at liberty to disobey; but had I known how my friends hated this doctrine, drawing others into it, but never putting in practice, I never should have obeyed. In regard to the doctrine of instruction, I differ with some of the whigs. I would apply the medicine to those who have faith in it. Those who believe in the principle should be made to carry it out. [The position of Mr. Williams on this point, and Messrs. White and Foster, was cited to prove the sincerity of one set of men and the hypocrisy of another in the doctrine.]

Mr. Tallmadge spoke very briefly, only by way of allusion to three other measures. In regard to the late president Harrison's family, he proposed to go into the support of a resolution making a compensation. I hope to hear nothing of precedent, said he, and pray that such precedents may be few and far between. We have a precedent. When De Witt Clinton died, his estate was appropriated by the legislature of New York for his family, and $20,000 was the sum recommended in one branch of the legislature, and it would have passed the other had not a two-thirds vote been raised. A precedent we have, too, in the legislature of congress. When General Brown, a brave officer, died, general Harrison himself brought forward a bill to relieve his family. (Great applause.)

In regard to a revision of a tariff, and the establishment of a tax, if not general, at least to impose duties upon luxuries, Mr. Tallmadge thought there would be no question, at least to an extent to supply the adequate wants of the government.

Ons moment more, said Mr. Tallmadge, in conclusion. With the president that we have at the head of the government, and with a cabinet that will do honor to any party or any government, (immense applause), there is no danger. Let me exhort my friends of all sections, if there be sections of men, to induce in no private grudge. If there should be quarrels, let them be conducted as were family quarrels, to be settled within the domestic circle, and not disturb the general good. The great cause is best preserved by passing them over, let us give the opposition no opportunity to rejoice over us. Let us be disappointed. So far as my little influence and example may go, I pledge myself that nothing shall be wanting to carry out the great principles and measures for which we have been contending.

After I shall have gone through the extra session, for which I enlisted when I enlisted for the campaign, I shall feel myself at liberty to receive an honorable discharge. And whether I remain in the extra session, or whether I leave the house in one of the cabins of the west, I shall never forget the kindness manifested for me by my friends.

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Webster.

Washington, March 12, 1841.

The undersigned, her Britannic majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, is instructed by his government to make the following official communication to the government of the United States:

Her majesty's government has had under their consideration the correspondence which took place at Washington in December last, between the United States secretary of state, Mr. Forsyth, and the undersigned, comprising two official letters from the undersigned to Mr. Forsyth, dated the 13th and 29th of December, and two official letters from Mr. Forsyth to the undersigned, dated the 26th and 30th of the same month, upon the subject of the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Alexander McLeod, of Upper Canada, by the authorities of the state of New York, and the charges now pending against him as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the steamboat "Caroline" on the 26th of December, 1837.

The undersigned is directed in the first place to make known to the government of the United States that her majesty's government entirely approve of the course pursued by the undersigned in that correspondence, and of the language adopted by him in the official letters above mentioned.

The undersigned is now instructed again to demand from the government of the United States, formally, in the name of the British government, the immediate release of Mr. Alexander McLeod.

The grounds upon which the British government makes this demand upon the government of the United States are these: That the transaction upon which Mr. McLeod has been arrested and is to be put upon his trial was a transaction of a public character, planned and executed by persons duly authorized by her majesty's colonial authorities to take any steps and to do any acts which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories, and for the protection of her majesty's subjects; and that consequently those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction were performing an act of public duty for which they cannot be made personally and individually answerable to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country.

The transaction in question may have been, as her majesty's government is of opinion that it was, a justifiable employment of force for the purpose of defending the British territory from the unprovoked attack of a band of British rebels and American pirates who, having been permitted to arm and organize themselves within the territory of the United States, had set out to invade and occupy a portion of the territory of her majesty, or it may have been, as alleged by Mr. Forsyth in his note to the undersigned of the 26th of December, "a most unjustifiable invasion in time of peace of the territory of the United States." But this is a question essentially of a political and international kind, which can be discussed and settled between the two governments, and which the courts of justice of the state of New York cannot by possibility have any means of judging of any right of deciding.

It would be contrary to the universal practice of civilized nations to fix individual responsibility upon persons who, with the sanction or by the orders of the constituted authorities of a state, engaged in military or naval enterprises in their country's service; and it is obvious that the introduction of such principle would aggravate beyond measure the miseries, and would infinitely increase the demoralizing effects of war, by mixing up with national transactions the ferocity of personal passions, and the selfishness of individual revenge.

Her majesty's government cannot believe that the government of the United States can really intend to set an example so fraught with evil to the community of nations, and the direct tendency of which would be to break into the ranks of the nations war atrocities which civilization and Christianity had long since banished.

Nailair can her majesty's government admit for a moment the validity of the doctrine advanced by Mr. Forsyth, that the federal government of the United States has no power to interfere in the matter in question, and that the decision thereof must rest solely and entirely with the state of New York.

With the admission of the federal government's power may exist between the several states that compose the union, foreign powers have nothing to do: the relations of foreign powers are with the aggregate union; that union is to them represented by the federal government; and of that union the federal government is to them the only organ. Therefore, when a foreign power has redress to demand for a wrong done to it by any state of the union, it is to the federal government, and not to the separate state, that such power must look for redress for that wrong. And such foreign power cannot admit the plea that the separate state is an independent body over which the federal government has no control. It is obvious that such a doctrine, if admitted, would at once go to a dissolution of the union as far as its relations with foreign powers are concerned; and that foreign powers, in such case, instead of accrediting diplomatic agents to the federal government, would send such agents not to that government, but to the government of the separate state; and would make their relations of peace and war with each state depend upon the result of their separate intercourse with such state, without reference to the relations they might have with the rest.

Her majesty's government is of opinion that the above is not the conclusion at which the government of the United States intend to arrive; yet such is the conclusion to which the arguments that have been advanced by Mr. Forsyth necessarily lead.

But be that as it may, her majesty's government formally demand, upon the grounds already stated, the immediate release of Mr. McLeod; and her majesty's government entreat the president of the U. States to take into his most deliberate consideration the serious nature of the consequences which must ensue from a rejection of this demand.

The United States government will perceive that, in demanding Mr. McLeod's release, her majesty's government argue upon the assumption that he was one of the persons engaged in the capture of the steamboat "Caroline"; but her majesty's government have the strongest reasons for being convinced that Mr. McLeod was not in fact engaged in that transaction; and the undersigned is therefore instructed to state to the government of the United States that the fact that the capture of the "Caroline" makes no difference in the political and international question at issue; and although her majesty's government do not demand Mr. McLeod's release upon the ground that he was not concerned in the capture of the "Caroline," yet upon the ground that the capture of the "Caroline" was a transaction of public character for which the persons engaged in it cannot incur private and personal responsibility; yet the government of the United States must not disguise from themselves the fact that Mr. McLeod was not engaged in the transaction must necessarily tend greatly to inflame that national resentment which any harm that shall be suffered by Mr. McLeod at the hands of the authorities of the state of New York will infinitely excite throughout the whole of the British empire.

The undersigned, in addressing the present official communication, by order of his government, to Mr. Webster, secretary of state of the United States, has the honor to offer him the assurance of his distinguished services to the British government.

The hon. Daniel Webster, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Webster to Mr. Fox.

Department of state, Washington, April 24, 1841.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has the honor to inform Mr. Fox, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of her Britannic majesty, that his note of the 12th of March was received and laid before the president.

Circumstances well known to Mr. Fox have necessarily delayed, for some days, the consideration of that note.

The undersigned has the honor now to say that it has been fully considered, and that he has been directed by the president to address Mr. Fox the following reply:

Mr. Fox informs the government of the United States that he is instructed to make known to it that the government of her majesty entirely approve the course pursued by the undersigned in correspondence with Mr. Forsyth in December last, and the language adopted by him on that occasion; and that that government have instructed him again to demand from the government of the United States, formally, in the name of the British government, the immediate release of Mr. Alexander McLeod; that "the grounds upon which the British government make this demand upon the government of the United States are these: That the transaction on account of which Mr. McLeod has been arrested and is to be put upon his trial was a transaction of a public character, planned and executed by persons duly empowered by her majesty's colonial authorities to take any steps and to do any acts which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories and for the protection of her majesty's subjects, and that consequently those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction were performing an act of public duty, for which they cannot be made personally and individually responsible to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country."

The president is not certain that he understands precisely the meaning intended by her majesty's government to be conveyed by the foregoing instruction.

The doubt has occasioned with the president some hesitation, but he inclines to take it for granted that the main purpose of the instruction was to cause it to be signified to the government of the United States that the attack on the vessel involved in the act of public force, done by the British colonial authorities, and fully recognized by the queen's government at home, and that consequently no individual concerned in that transaction can, according to the great principle of the law, be held personally answerable in the ordinary courts of law as for a private offense; and that upon this avowal of her majesty's government, Alexander McLeod, now imprisoned on an indictment for murder alleged to have been committed in that attack, ought to be released by such proceedings as are usual and are suitable to the case.

The president adopts the conclusion that nothing more than this could have been intended to be expressed, from the consideration that her majesty's government must be fully aware that in the United States, as in England, persons confined under judicial process can be released from that confinement only by judicial process. In neither country, as the undersigned supposes, can the arm of the executive power interfere, directly or forcibly, to release or deliver the prisoner. His discharge must be sought in a manner conformable to the principles of law and the proceedings of courts of judicature. If an indictment, like that which has been returned against Alexander McLeod, under circumstances like those which belong to his case, were pending against an individual in one of the courts of England, there is no doubt that the law officer of the crown might enter a nolle prosequi in his behalf, and that he might be brought up on habes corpus and discharged, if his ground of discharge should be adjudged sufficient, or that he might prove the same facts, and insist on the same defence or exemption on his trial.

All these are legal modes of proceeding, well known to the laws and practice of both countries. But the undersigned does not suppose that, if such a case were to arise in England, the power of the executive government could be exercised in such a direct manner. Even in the case of ambassadors and other public ministers, whose right to exemption from arrest is personal, requiring no fact to be ascertained but the mere fact of diplomatic character, and to whom it is sometimes made a highly penal offence, if the arrest be actually made, it must be discharged by application to the courts of law.

It is understood that Alexander McLeod is held liable as well as civil as criminal for the acts of the vessel to have been done by him in the attack on the "Caroline," and his defence or ground of acquittal must be the same in both cases. And this strongly illustrates, as the undersigned conceives, the propriety of the foregoing objection to the instruction that the executive government cannot interfere to arrest a civil suit between private parties in any stage of its progress, but that such suit must go on to its regular judicial termination. If, therefore, any course different from that which is here mentioned were in contemplation of her majesty's government, something would seem to have been expected from the government of the United States as little comfortable to the laws and usages of the English government, and to which this government cannot accede.

The government of the United States, therefore, acting upon the presumption which it already adopted, that nothing explanatory or justificatory was expected or requested of it, does, on the reception of Mr. Fox's note, to which we now allude as the occasion and its own duty appeared to require.

In his note to Mr. Fox of the 26th of December last, Mr. Forsyth, the secretary of state of the United States, observes that "the destruction of the 'Caroline' was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities; this fact has not been before made to the government of the United States by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the court which has taken cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged to decide upon its validity when legally established before it," and adds, "the president deems this to be a proper occasion to remind the government of her Britannic majesty that the case of the 'Caroline' has been long since brought to the attention of her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, who, up to this day, has not communicated its decision thereupon. It is hoped that the government of her majesty will perceive the importance of no longer leaving the government of the United States, uninformed of its views and intentions upon a subject which has naturally produced much examination, and which has led to such grave consequences."

The communication of the fact that the destruction of the "Caroline" was an act of public force by the British authorities being formally communicated to the government of the United States, by Mr. Fox's note, the case assumes a decided aspect.

The government of the United States entertains no doubt that, after this avowal of the transaction as a public transaction, authorized and undertaken by the British authorities, individuals, who, in the act, might not, by the principles of public law and the general usage of civilized states, to be held personally responsible in the ordinary tribunals of law for their participation in it. And the president presumes that it would be necessary to say that the American people, not distrustful of their ability to redress public wrongs by public means, cannot desire the punishment of individuals when the act complained of is declared to have been an act of the government.

Soon after the date of Mr. Fox's note, an instruction was given to the attorney general of the United States from this department, by direction of the president, which fully sets forth the opinions of the government on the subjects of Mr. McLeod's imprisonment, a copy of which instruction the undersigned has the honor herewith to enclose.

The indictment against McLeod is pending in a state court; but his rights, whatever they may be, are already secured by the writ of habeas corpus were held to answer in one of the courts of this government.

He demands immunity from personal responsibility by virtue of the law of nations, and that the executive authorities, in the case, should be held to account. None is either so high or so low as to escape from its authority in cases to which its rules and principles apply.

This department has been regularly informed, by the undersigned, of the state of the case, that the chief justice of that state was assigned to preside at the hearing and trial of McLeod's case, but that, owing to some error or mistake in the process of summoning the jury, the hearing was necessary.

The president regrets this occurrence, as he has a desire for a speedy disposition of the subject. The counsel for McLeod have requested authentic evidence of his avowal by the British government of the attack on, and destruction of the "Caroline," as acts done under their authority, and such evidence will be furnished to them by this department.

It is understood that the indictment has been removed into the supreme court of the state by the order of the chief justice, and that the case is now competent for McLeod, by the ordinary process of habeas corpus, to bring his case for hearing before that tribunal.

The undersigned hardly needs to assure Mr. Fox that it does not seem to him extremely desirable for ability and learning as the supreme court of the state of New York may be safely relied upon for the just and impartial administration of the law in this as well as in other cases; and the undersigned repeats with confidence that the desire of this government that no delay may be suffered to take place in these proceedings which can be avoided. Of this desire Mr. Fox will see evidence in the instructions above referred to.

The undersigned has now to signify to Mr. Fox that the government of the U. States has not changed the opinion which it has heretofore expressed to her majesty's government of the character of the act of destroying the "Caroline."

It does not think that the transaction can be justified by any reasonable application or construction of the right of self defence, under the laws of nations. It is admitted that a just right of self defence attaches always to nations, as well as to individuals, and that it is necessary to the preservation of both. But the extent of this right is a question to be judged of by the circumstance of each particular case; and when its alleged exercise has led to the commission of hostile acts within the territory of a power at peace, nothing less than a clear and avowed necessity can afford ground of justification. Not having, up to this time been made acquainted with the views and reasons, at length, which have led her majesty's government to think the destruction of the "Caroline" justifiable as an act of self defence, the undersigned earnestly requests the remembrance of this government against the transaction, abstains, for the present, from any extended discussion of the question. But it is deemed proper, nevertheless, not to omit to take some notice of the general grounds of justification stated by her majesty's government in their instruction to Mr. Fox.

Her majesty's government have instructed Mr. Fox to say that they are of opinion that the transaction which terminated in the destruction of the "Caroline" was a justifiable employment of force, for the purpose of defending the British territory from the unprovoked attack of a band of British rebels and American pirates, who, having been permitted to assemble and organize themselves within the territory of the United States, had actually invaded a portion of the territory of her majesty.

The president cannot suppose that her majesty's government by the use of these terms, meant to be understood that the case then presented was a violation of the laws of the United States, and disturbing the peace of the British territories, were done under any degree of countenance from this government or were regarded by it with indifference, or that, under the circumstances, it was necessary to have been prevented by the ordinary course of proceeding, though he regrets that, by using the term "permitted," a possible inference of that kind might be raised, yet such an inference the president is willing to disavow, and to attribute only to the intentions of the British government.

That on a line of frontier such as separates the United States from her Britannic majesty's North American provinces—a line long enough to divide the action of Europe into halves, heretofore, violence and conflicts should sometimes occur, is a thing against the will of both governments, is certainly easy to be supposed. This may be more possible, perhaps, in regard to the United States, without any reproach to the government of her majesty, but it entirely discourages the keeping up of large standing armies in time of peace, and their situation happily exempts them from the necessity of maintaining such expensive and dangerous establishments. All that the British government has to do in these cases is good faith, a sincere desire to preserve peace and do justice, the use of all proper means of prevention, and that, if officers, cannot, nevertheless, be always prevented, the offenders shall still be justly punished. In all these respects, this government acknowledges no delinquency in the performance of its duties.

Her majesty's government are pleased, also, to speak of those American citizens who took part with persons who were engaged in an insurrection against the British government, as "American pirates." The undersigned does not admit the propriety or justice of this designation. If citizens of the United States fitted out, or were engaged in fitting out, a military expedition, the United States intended to act against the British government in Canada, they were clearly violating the laws of their country, and exposing themselves to the just consequences which must be inflicted on them if taken within the British territories. But, in misunderstanding this, they were, certainly, American pirates, the undersigned thinks that it can advance the purpose of fair and friendly discussion, or hasten the accommodation of national difficulties, so to denounce them. Their offence, whatever it was, had no analogy to that of piracy. Supposing that an alleged against them to be true, they were taking a part in what they regarded as a civil war, and they were taking a part on the side of the rebels. Surely, England and her majesty's government persons thus engaged as deserting the appellation of pirates, her majesty's government bestows on these citizens of the United States.

It is quite notorious that for the greatest part of the last two centuries, subjects of the British crown have been permitted to engage in foreign wars, both national and civil, and in the latter, in every stage of their progress; and yet it has not been imagined that England has at any time allowed her subjects to turn pirates. Indeed, in our own times, not only have individual subjects of that crown gone abroad to engage in civil wars, but we have seen whole regiments openly recruited, embodied, armed and disciplined in England, with the avowed purpose of aiding a rebellion against a nation with which England was at peace; although it is true the avowed, and consequently, an act of parliament was passed to prevent transactions so nearly approaching to public war, without licence from the crown.

It may be said that there is a difference between the case of a civil war, arising from a disputed title, or a protracted revolt of a colony against the mother country, and the case of a fresh outbreak at the commencement of a rebellion. The undersigned does not deny that such distinction may, for certain purposes, be deemed well founded. He admits that a government, called upon to consider its own rights, interests and duties, when civil war breaks out in other countries, may decide on all the circumstances of the particular case, upon its existing situation, on the probable success or failure of its own security requires, and on many other considerations. It may be already bound to assist one party, or it may become bound, if it so chooses, to assist the other, and to meet the consequences of such assistance.

But whether the revolt be recent or long continued, they who join those concerned in it, whatever may be their offence against their own country, or however they be treated, if taken with arms to their hands, in the territory of the government against which the standard of revolt is raised, cannot be denominated private without departing from all ordinary use of language in the definition of offences. A cause which has so long an origin a private claim cannot, in its progress, or by its success, obtain a claim to an entire exemption from the usual consequences of actions; and civil wars, therefore, are not understood to have such a commencement.

It is well known to Mr. Fox that authorities of the highest eminence in England, living and dead, have manifested that the general law of nations does not forbid the citizens or subjects of one government from taking part in the civil commotions of another. There is some reason, indeed, to think that such may be the opinion of her majesty's government at the present moment.

The undersigned has made these remarks from the conviction that it is important to regard established distinctions, and to view the acts and offences of individuals in the exactly proper light. But it is not to be interred that there is, on the part of this government, any purpose of extenuating, in the slightest degree, the crimes of those persons, citizens of the United States, who have joined in military expeditions against the British government in Canada. On the contrary, the president directs the undersigned to say that it is his fixed resolution that all such disturbers of the national peace and violators of the law of their country shall be held to exemplary punishment. Nor will the fact that they are investigated and led on to these excesses by British subjects, refugees from the provinces, be deemed any excuse or palliation; although it is well worthy of being remembered that the prime movers of these disturbances on the borders are subjects of the queen, who come within the territories of the United States, seeking to enlist the sympathies of their citizens by all the motives which they are able to add to those of national enmity, of grievances, real or imaginary. There is no reason to believe that the design of any hostile movement from the United States against Canada has commenced with citizens of the United States. The true origin of such purposes and such enterprises is on the other side of the line. But the president's resolution to prevent these transgressions of the laws, is not, on that account, the less strong. It is taken not only to conform to his duty under the provisions of existing laws, but to conform to the principles and principles and practice of this government.

The government of the United States has, of old, from the first, fallen into the doubts elsewhere entertained, of the true extent of the duties of neutrality. However, this may be, it has, in long and enlightened ages, the just interpretation of the modern law of nations is, that neutral states are bound to be strictly neutral; and that it is a manifest and gross impropriety for individuals to engage in the conflicts of other states, and that it is as well to settle their government is at peace. War and peace are high national relations, which can properly be established or changed only by nations themselves.

The United States have thought, also, that the salutary doctrine of non-interference by one nation with the affairs of others, is liable to be essentially impaired, if, while government refrains from interference, interference is still allowed to its subjects, individually or in masses, it may happen, indeed, that persons, desirous to leave their country, emigrate to other regions, and settle themselves on uncultivated lands, in territories belonging to other states. This cannot be prevented by governments which allow the emigration of their subjects to other parts; and it is not to be supposed that they abandoned their own country, and have no longer claim to its protection, nor is it responsible for their acts. Such cases, therefore, if they occur, show no abandonment of the duty of neutrality.

The government of the United States has not considered it as sufficient to confine the duties of neutrality and non-interference to the case of governments whose territories lie adjacent to each other. The application of the principle may be more necessary in such cases, but the principle itself, it is believed, is being the same, if those territories be divided by the globe. The rule is founded in the impropriety and danger of allowing individuals to make war on their own authority, or by mingling themselves in the belligerent operations of other states, and in the hazard of contracting the policy, or embroiling the relations or their own government. And the United States have been the first among civilized nations to enforce the observance of this just rule of neutrality and peace, by special and adequate legal enactments.

In infancy of this government, on the breaking out of the European wars which had their origin in the French revolution, congress passed laws with severe penalties, for preventing the citizens of the U. States from taking part in foreign hostilities. By these laws, it prescribed to the citizens of the United States what it understood to be their duty as neutrals, by the law of nations, and the duty, also, which they owed to the tolerant and honor of their own country.

At a subsequent period, when the American colonies of an European power took up arms against their sovereign, congress not diverted from the established system of the government by any temporary considerations, not swayed from its sense of justice and of duty by any sympathies which it might naturally feel for one of the parties, did not hesitate also, to pass acts applicable to the case of colonial insurrection and civil war. And these provisions of law have been continued, revised, amended, and strengthened, by the force of the same principles. Nor have they been a dead letter, as it is well known that exemplary punishments have been inflicted on those who have transgressed them. It is known, indeed, that heavy penalties have fallen on individuals, citizens of the United States, engaged in very disturbances in Canada, with which the destruction of the Caroline was connected. And it is in Mr. Fox's knowledge, also, that the act of congress of March 10th, 1838, was passed for the precise purpose of more effectually restraining the citizens of the United States in the British provinces, by authorising the use of the most sure and decisive preventive means. The undersigned may add, that it stands on the admission of very high British authority, that during the recent disturbances, a number of bold and adventurous spirits appeared on the border, seeking it necessary for the people of Canada to keep themselves in a state prepared for self-defence, yet that these adventurers were acting by no means in accordance with the feeling of the great mass of the American people, or of the government of the United States.

This government, therefore, not only holds itself above reproach in every thing respecting the preservation of neutrality, the observance of the principle of non-interference, and the strictest conformity, in these respects, to the rules of international law, but it does not think that the world will do it justice to acknowledge that it has set an example not unfit to be followed by others, and that, by its steady legislation on this most important subject, it has taken the most effectual measures to preserve peace and neighborhood among nations, and to advance the civilization of mankind.

The undersigned trusts that, when her Britannic majesty's government shall present the grounds, at length, on which they justify the loss of the "Caroline," they will consider that the laws of the United States are such as the undersigned has now represented them, and that the government of the United States has always manifested a sincere and impartial administration. If there had been cases in which individuals, justly obnoxious to punishment, have escaped, this is no more than happens in regard to other laws.

Under these circumstances, and under those immediately connected with the transaction itself, it will be for her majesty's government to show upon what state of facts and what rules of national law the destruction of the "Caroline" is to be defended. It will be for that government to show a necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no room for deliberation, and no moment for delay. It will be for it to show, also, that the local authorities of Canada, even supposing the necessity of the moment authorized them to enter the territories of the U. States at all, did nothing unauthorized or extraordinary. It will be justified by the necessity of self-defence, must be limited by that necessity, and kept clearly within it. It must be shown that almost entire remembrance to the persons on board the "Caroline" was impracticable, or would have been unavailing; it must be shown that day light could not be waited for; that there could be no attempt at discrimination between the innocent and the guilty; that it would not have been enough to seize and detain the vessel; but that there was a necessity, present and probable, for attacking the vessel in the darkness of the night, while moored to the shore, and while unarmed men were asleep on board, killing some and wounding others, and then drawing her into the current, and, after the seizure, setting her on fire, and, careful to know whether there could not be in her the innocent with the guilty, or the living with the dead, committing her to a fate which fills the imagination with horror. A necessity for all this the government of the United States cannot be liable to have existed.

All will see that if such things be allowed to occur, they might lead to bloody and exaggerated war; and when an individual comes into the United States from Canada, and to the very place on which this drama was performed, and there chooses not to make public and vainglorious boast of the part he acted in it, it is hardly wonderful that great excitement should be created, and some degree of commotion arise.

This republic does not wish to disturb the tranquillity of the world. Its object is peace, its policy peace. It seeks no aggrandizement by foreign conquest, because it knows that so foreign acquisition could augment its power and importance so rapidly as they are already advancing by its own natural growth under the propitious circumstances of its situation. But it cannot admit that its government has not both the will and the power to preserve its own neutrality, and the independence of the observance of its own laws upon its own citizens. It is jealous of its rights, and among others, and most especially, of the right of the absolute immunity of its territory against aggression from abroad; and these rights it is the duty and the determination of this government to rely on at all times to maintain; while it will, at the same time, as scrupulously refrain from infringing on the rights of others.

The president instructs the undersigned to say, in conclusion, that he cordially trusts that all and all other questions of difference between the two governments will be treated by both in the full exercise of such a spirit of candor, justice and mutual respect as shall give assurance of the long continuance of peace and friendship between the two countries.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to assure Mr. Fox of his high consideration.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Henry S. Fox, esq. &c. &c.

Copy of instructions to Mr. Crittenden, enclosed in the above.

Department of state, Washington, March 15, 1841. Sir: Alexander McLeod, a Canadian subject of her Britannic majesty, is now imprisoned at Lockport in the state of New York, under an indictment for murder, alleged to have been committed by him at the attack on and destruction of the steamboat Caroline, at Sarnia, in this state, on the night of the 29th of December, 1837; and his trial is expected to take place at Lockport on the 22d instant.

You are apprized of the correspondence which took place between Mr. Forsyth, late secretary of state, and Mr. Fox, her Britannic majesty's minister here, on the subject of the above case.

In his note to Mr. Fox of the 26th of that month, Mr. Forsyth says: "If the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, and acting in obedience to the instructions of the government of the United States by a person authorized to make the admission, and it will be for the court which has taken cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged to decide upon its validity when legally established."

"The president deems this to be a proper occasion to remind the government of her Britannic majesty that the case of the Caroline has been long since brought to the attention of her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, who, up to this day, has not communicated its decision thereupon. It is hoped that the government of her majesty will perceive the importance of no longer leaving the government of the United States unimpressed in its views and intentions upon a subject which has naturally produced much exasperation and which has led to such grave consequences."

I have now to inform you that Mr. Fox has addressed a note to this department, under date of the 12th instant, in which, under the immediate suggestion and direction of his government, he demands, formally and officially, McLeod's immediate release, on the ground that the transaction, on account of which he has been arrested and is to be put upon his trial, was of a public character, planned and executed by the persons duly empowered by her majesty's colonial authorities to take any steps, and do any acts, which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories; and for the protection of her majesty's subjects; and that consequently those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction were performing an act of public duty, for which they cannot be so personally and individually answerable to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country; and that her majesty's government has furnished Mr. Fox to make known to the government of the United States that her majesty's government entirely approve of the course pursued by Mr. Fox, and the language adopted by him in the correspondence above mentioned.

There is, therefore, now, an authentic declaration on the part of the British government, that the attack on the Caroline was an act of public force, done by military men, under the orders of their superiors, and is recognized by her majesty's government. The importance of this declaration is not to be doubted, and the president is of opinion that it calls upon him for the performance of a high duty. That an individual forming part of a public force, and acting under the authority of his government, is not to be held answerable, as a private trespasser or malefactor, is a principle of public law sanctioned by the usages of all civilized nations, and which the government of the U. States has no inclination to dispute. This has no connexion whatever with the question whether, in this case, the attack on the Caroline was, as the British government think it, a justifiable employment of force for the purpose of detaching the British territory from unproved states, or whether it was a most unjustifiable invasion into the territory of the United States, as this government has regarded it. The two questions are essentially different; and, while acknowledging that an individual may claim immunity from the consequences of acts done by him, by showing that he acted under national authority, this government is not to be understood as changing the opinion which it has heretofore expressed in regard to its real nature of the transaction which resulted in the destruction of the Caroline. That subject, it is not necessary, for any purpose connected with this communication, to discuss. The views of this government in relation to it are known to that of England; and we are expecting the answer of that government to the communication which has been presented to it.

All that is intended to be said, at present, is that, since the attack on the Caroline is avowed as a national act which may justify reprisals, or even general war, if the government of the U. States, in the judgment which it shall form of the transaction, and of its own duty, should see fit so to decide, yet that it raises a question entirely public and political, a question between independent nations, and that individuals concerned in it cannot be arrested and tried before the ordinary tribunals, as for the violation of municipal law. If the attack on the Caroline was unjustifiable, as this government has asserted, the law which has been violated is the law of nations, and the redress which is to be sought, is the redress authorized in such cases by the provisions of that code.

You are well aware that the president has no power to arrest the proceeding in the civil and criminal courts of the state of New York. If this indictment were pending in one of the courts of the United States, I am confident that, should the president, upon the receipt of Mr. Fox's last communication, would have immediately directed a note prosequi to be entered.

Whether, in this case, the governor of N. York has that power, or, if he have, whether he would feel it his duty to exercise it, are points upon which we are not informed.

It is understood that McLeod is held also on civil process, sued out against him by the owner of the Caroline. We suppose it very clear that the executive of the state cannot interfere with such a process; and, indeed, if such process were pending in the courts of the United States, the president could not arrest it. In such, and many analogous cases, the party prosecuted is entitled, in defence to his exemption or defence by judicial proceedings, either in the court into which he is called, or in some other court. But whether the process be criminal or civil, the fact of having acted under public authority, and in obedience to the orders of lawful superiors, must be regarded as a valid defence, otherwise individuals would be held responsible for injuries resulting from the acts of government, and even from the operations of public war.

You will be furnished with a copy of this instruction for the use of the executive of N. York and the attorney general of that state. You will carry with you, also, authentic evidence of the recognition by the British government of the destruction of the Caroline as an act of public force done by national authority.

The president is impressed with the propriety of transferring the trial from the scene of the principal excitement to some other and distant county. You will take care that this be suggested to the prisoner's counsel. The president is gratified to learn that the governor of New York has already decided that the trial take place before the chief justice of the state.

Having consulted with the governor, you will proceed to Lockport, or wherever else the trial be held, and furnish the prisoner's counsel with the evidence which will be in possession of the material to his defence. You will see that he have skillful and eminent counsel, if such be not already retained; and, although you are not desired to act as counsel yourself, you will cause it to be signified to him, and to the gentleman who may conduct his defence, that it is the wish of this government that, in case his defence be overruled by the court into which he shall be tried, proper steps be taken immediately for removing the cause, by writ of error, to the supreme court of the U. States.

The president hopes you will use such dispatch as to make your arrival at the place of trial ante before the trial comes on; and he trusts you will keep him informed of whatever occurs by means of a correspondence through this department. I have the honor to be, Mr. Attorney General, your obedient servant,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Hon. John J. Crittenden, attorney gen. of the U. S.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON THE FINANCES, &c.

In obedience to the directions of the act of congress of the 10th of May, 1800, "supplementary to the act to establish the treasury department," the secretary of the treasury respectfully submits the following report:

1. Of the public revenue and expenditures. The receipts and expenditures for the year 1840 were as follows:

The available balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1840, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the states, trust funds, and indemnities, and the amount due from banks which failed in 1837), was, as appears by the books of the register of the treasury	$5,663,083 60
The receipts into the treasury during the year 1840 were, from Customs	$13,499,802 17
Lands	2,292,253 58
Bonds of the Bank of the United States	1,774,513 80
Miscellaneous and incidental sources	253,253 23
Banks which failed in 1837	748,629 55
Treasury notes issued	5,589,547 51
	25,187,736 84

Making	$26,850,820 44
The expenditures in the same year were, for—Civil list, foreign intercourse and miscellaneous	492,040 96
Military department	10,566,236 45
Naval department	6,031,088 88
Public debt	11,982 77
Add outstanding warrants issued prior to 1st January, 1841	1,416,324 28
Treasury notes redeemed, including interest	4,045,802 05
	27,568,475 41

Leaving a balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1841, of	967,345 03
The receipts from the 1st of January to the 4th of March, 1841, were—(1841)
From customs	$1,974,886 46
Lands	386,148 56
Miscellaneous and incidental sources	31,249 65
Banks which failed in 1837	18,000 00
Treasury notes issued per act of 31st March, 1840	1,110,611 08
Treasury notes issued under act of 15th of February, 1841	678,681 32

Bond of the Bank of the United States	17,913 00	4,212,540 07
Making, with the balance in the treasury, January 1, 1841		5,199,865 16
The expenditures for the same period were—

Treasury notes issued prior to the 1st of January, 1841, and outstanding on the 4th of March, 1841		5,573,220 00
Do. issued under the act of 1840, from 1st January to the 4th of March, 1841, which may, and most of which probably will, be presented in payment of public dues during the year 1841	1,110,611 08	300,000 00
Interest estimated at about
Making in the aggregate		$33,429,616 50
Of this there will be required for the services of the current year		24,210,000 00
Additional appropriations required by the war department for the year 1841, viz:
Fortifications and works of defence	$1,435,500 00
For armaments of fortifications and ordnance stores	220,000 00
For payment of arrears of & current expenses, and taking care of public property on roads, harbors, rivers, &c.	40,199 12
For arrears for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities	825,637 96	2,521,336 98
Making		26,731,336 90
The actual and estimated means under the existing laws to meet these demands are, viz:
The available balance in the treasury on the 4th of March, 1841.—(See statement B)		646,808 12
Treasury notes authorized under the act of 1840, issued after the 31st of March, 1841		413,592 72
Treasury notes authorized by the act of 1841 to be issued after the 4th of March, 1841		5,000,000 00
Receipts from customs estimated at	12,000,000 00
Receipts from public lands	2,500,000 00
Miscellaneous sources	170,000 00	20,730,895 84
Leaving unprovided for of the demand for the present year, the sum of		6,000,941 14
There will also be receivable for public dues in the present year, or payable in 1842, treasury notes the issue of the present year, viz:
Issued under the act of 1841, prior to the 4th of March		$673,681 32
Do. do. 1840, after the 4th of March		413,592 72
*This item, and the item of expenditures for the payment of treasury notes from the 1st of January to 4th of March, 1841, include about $500,000 of treasury notes which were received at the department on account of omissions during that period, but for which the warrants were not issued until a subsequent period.

Do. do. 1841, to be issued after the 4th of March, and included in the estimate of ways and means 5,000,000 00

Making an aggregate of debt and deficit, to be provided for in this and the ensuing year, 12,088,215 18
This estimate is founded on the assumption that all the moneys in the public depositories can be at once made available, and that any and all of the demands upon the treasury can be satisfied, so long as money is to a sufficient amount present in any or all the depositories. But that is by no means the case; while the power to issue treasury notes exists, there should be at all times, for the convenience of the treasury, a sum equal to $1,000,000 in the various depositories subject to draft. When their power is expended, the sum should be increased to not less than 4,000,000 00

Which sum, added to the above, makes the estimated deficit $16,088,215 18
But the undersigned feels it his duty to call the attention of congress to the more immediate demands of the public service, and the means by which those demands are to be supplied.

The sums which will be required from the 1st of June to the 31st of August next are estimated as follows, viz:

For the payment of treasury notes which will fall due within that time, and the interest thereon, about	$2,756,900 00
Balance for taking the 6th census	294,000 00
For the civil list, miscellaneous and foreign intercourse	1,309,308 37
Military service	4,594,098 00
Naval do.	1,844,000 00
Public debt	6,387 00
Expenses of the extra session of congress	350,000 00

Making about 11,151,698 37
The ways and means in the power of the treasury, and which will probably accrue under existing laws, are as follows:

1. Funds in the treasury (as per statement C) $644,361 18
2. Treasury notes authorized by the act of 18th of February, 1841 1,505,943 91
3. Estimated receipts from the customs 3,000,000 00
- Do. do. the lands 700,000 00
- Do. do. miscellaneous sources 50,000 00

Making 6,900,305 07
And leaving a deficit of 5,251,398 30
To which add the sum recommended to be kept in the treasury to meet any emergencies of the public service, viz: 4,000,000 00

Making an aggregate of 9,251,398 30
In another part of this paper the views of the department as to the mode of providing for the above deficit, together with the residua of the existing public debt, will be presented.

From the year 1816 to 1837, a period of twenty-one years, the revenues constantly exceed the expenditures. The average annual surplus during that time was $11,364,226 87, (see tables 1 and 2), making an aggregate excess of $248,740,764 27.
Of this there was applied to the extinction of the national debt $208,752,127 44, and there was under the provisions of the act of the 29th of June, 1836, deposited with the treasury $28,101,644 91, and there remained on the 1st of January, 1837, in the treasury of the U. States, including the fourth interest due to the states, a surplus of 17,109,473 26

There were, also, outstanding debts due and falling due to the treasury, arising from other sources than those of the ordinary revenue, and which were paid between the 1st of January, 1837, and 4th of March, 1841, the amount of (see statement D) 9,124,747 00

There were, also, issued within that period, and outstanding on the 4th of March, 1841, treasury notes to the amount of 5,648,512 40

Making the aggregate available means which were in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, and which came into it prior to the 4th of March, 1841, over and above the current revenue 31,882,732 66
From which deduct the amount (less the trust funds) remaining in the treasury on the 4th of March, 1841 572,718 46

And there appears an excess of expenditure over the current revenue of $31,810,014 20

It is proper to remark that the entries on the books of the register of the treasury do not always show the true dates of the receipts and expenditures. An item involved in the above statement (table D) will serve to illustrate this fact. The sum of $512,136 47 was, on the 2nd and 31st of October, 1840, paid by the Bank of the United States, its last bond to William Armstrong, superintendent at Fort Gibson, by order of the secretary of war. Though this sum was in fact received and expended on those days, it did not find its way into the office of the register until the 4th of March, 1841, on which day it appears on his books both as a receipt and an expenditure.

Thence to this extent, within the last four years, were the expenditures pushed beyond the amount of the revenue. They were made to exorbitate the surplus in the treasury, and the resulting debt due to the United States, so that the treasury was on the 4th of March, 1841, exhausted of its means and subject to heavy and immediate liabilities. It was already burdened with a debt incurred in time of peace, and without any adequate resources except the authority granted by law to augment the debt.

As yet no provision has been made to reduce this debt or to check its constant and rapid increase. We find it, therefore, as far as past legislation and financial arrangement characterizes it, a permanent and increasing national debt. The temporary expedients by which it has been sustained do not at all vary its essential character.

The attention of congress is respectfully invited to the necessity of early and effectual measures to prevent its further augmentation. The obvious remedy is to increase the revenue as far as may be without unreasonably burdening commerce, and to reduce the expenditures within the limits of strict economy.

But as it may not comport with the views of congress to go into a revision and adjustment of the customs so long before the act of March 2, 1833, comes to have its final and permanent operation, the undersigned would respectfully recommend, as a temporary measure, the levy of a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem on all articles which are now free of duty, or which pay a less duty than 20 per cent. except gold and silver, and the articles specifically enumerated in the 5th section of the act of March 2d, 1833.

If this measure be adopted, it is estimated that there will be received into the treasury from customs, in the last quarter of the present year, about 5,800,000 dollars; in all of the year 1842, about 22,500,000 dollars; and in the year 1843, after the final duration under the act of March 2, 1833, about 20,800,000 dollars. The details of this estimate will be found in the accompanying paper, marked E, and enclosures.

It is believed that, after the heavy expenditures required for the public service in the present year shall have been provided for, the revenues which will accrue from that, or a nearly proximate rate of duty, will be sufficient to defray the expenses of government, and leave a surplus to be annually applied to the gradual payment of the national debt, leaving the proceeds of the public lands to be disposed of as congress shall think fit.

The general principles upon which the final revision of the tariff is to rest, perhaps simple enough to be apprehended, but the work of revision itself, in its adaptation and detail, must be a work of time. It should be done on calm reflection and careful deliberation, with a view to reconcile, as far as possible, the conflicting opinions, and to promote all the various interests of the whole people of these United States. And it may be important, in that adjustment, not only to reciprocate on fair and equal principles, and in a liberal spirit, the concessions which may be accorded to our commerce by foreign nations, but also to do justice to our own citizens by meeting in a like equal comany heavy exactions or prohibitions which foreign nations may think fit to impose upon the importations of our staple productions.

Some legal provisions are also required to correct inequalities between the duties upon sugar and molasses, and the drawbacks upon refined sugar and rum, molasses or distilled from low quality materials. The relation between the duty and the drawback was adjusted by the acts of January 21st, 1829, and May 29th, 1830, since which time the duties have been diminished, while the drawbacks remain the same. And a provision of law declining to all non-enumerated articles which bear a similarity to any enumerated article chargeable with duty shall pay the same rate of duty with the article which it most resembles, would save a large sum annually to the revenue, and prevent much annoyance and litigation between the importer and the officers charged with the collection of the customs.

Of the public debt.

But it is not expected that any modification of the revenue laws or diminution of expenditure to supply the needs of the treasury, and to pay the public debts which fall due in the present and in the ensuing year. A further loan is necessary to effect these objects, and the only questions that can arise are as to the mode of procuring the loan, the character of the securities, and the assumed duration of the debt.

It would, in the opinion of the undersigned, be unwise to charge upon the commerce or the resources of the country the burden of the public debt, or at all having the restoration and relief be required. The currency of the country should be restored, and commerce and industry relieved from the dangerous state of embarrassment and depression, and a prudent and judicious mode of the part of the general government should call forth once more the hereditary industry and active enterprise of our people, and the vast resources of our country.

If we assume the period of from five to eight years as that in which this debt can be paid without inconvenience and embarrassment—and the time appears to be short enough—we have one of the most essential elements on which to form our judgment as to the best and most expeditious mode in which the loan can be kept up, and the credit of the government sustained.

In the inception and during the progressive increase of a national debt, the issues of treasury notes, the dangers to the present and future of their advantages. They need not be issued, and then the actual wants of the treasury require, and the power to issue any given sum is, for all effective purposes of immediate expenditure, a fund in the treasury available to that amount. But, when the debt has acquired its maximum and ceases to accumulate, or when it becomes larger than the amount necessary to be kept on hand to meet the current wants of the treasury, these advantages disappear. This mode of loan then becomes to the government what the issue in the market of new promissory notes, for the purpose of raising money to take up old promissory notes, is to an individual. It is the issue of treasury notes to take up other treasury notes year after year in succession; and, under those circumstances, it is inconceivable.

But the raising of money by the issue of treasury notes is objectionable, because it is deceptive; by this means a heavy debt may be raised and fastened permanently upon the country, the amount of new issues being increased to the point of ruin; while the people, and even those who administered the finances, may not be impressed with the important fact that a national debt is created or in the process of creation.

Therefore, in the opinion of the undersigned, when a national debt does exist, and must continue for a time, it is better that it should be made a funded debt, according to our ancient financial usage. It is then sheltered by no cover, and is the subject of no delusion. It is open, palpable, true; the eyes of the country will be upon it, and will be able at a glance to mark its reduction or its increase; and it is believed that a loan for the requisite amount, having eight years to run, but redeemable at the will of the government, on six months' notice, could be negotiated at a much less rate of interest than treasury notes. Much expense would also be saved in dispensing with the machinery of the issue and payment and cancelling of treasury notes.

It is therefore respectfully recommended that a sum sufficient to meet the debt of the present existing, and such as will necessarily accrue in this and the ensuing year, be raised on loan for the time, and on the condition above suggested.

On keeping and disbursing the public moneys.
The undersigned would also respectfully invite the attention of congress to the present mode of connected with the service, for purposes not essential to Indian warfare, has been earnestly enjoined. The many weighty considerations which invite the immediate attention of congress to the subject of the public defenses generally, and particularly to the works absolutely necessary to the security of our great commercial emporiums, and the keys to our most valuable resources, of every kind must be as generally understood and appreciated, as nothing this department can urge could add any thing to their force and conclusiveness. To say nothing of the destruction of property, and our weakened condition in a military point of view, attendant upon the carrying on of our most important business, the neutralization of our territory and the seizure of even one of our strong holds by a powerful enemy upon the sudden outbreak of war, it would seem to be equally the dictate of patriotism and wisdom to make due provision against the infliction of such insults to the national honor and character.

It has been urged as an objection to the further progress of the works heretofore projected for the defence of our extensive sea coast, that the recent experiments in the use of steam power in ocean navigation, and the ready application of the same powerful agent to the defence of our principal harbors, together with the late inventions in the means of increasing the destructiveness of shells, must necessarily entirely destroy the necessity of coast defence, as well as maritime war in general. It is true that the mental activity, characteristic of the age in every other art and science, has not been less fruitful in suggesting improvements in the art of war, than the value of some of our scientific discoveries, tested in precise, and doubtless others will, in time, prove equally successful. In no department of public affairs may the natural connexion and dependence between all the sciences and inventions so generally illustrated, than in the improvement of the means of national defence. That the cause of humanity will be promoted in proportion as the existing systems and means of defensive warfare are perfected by new improvements, in accordance to all nations greater security to independent enjoyment of their own acquisitions and forms of society and government; in putting the weak upon a more equal footing with the strong; in rendering war less profitable to the victor, and the cause of peace to flourish in uninterrupted vigor, cannot be doubted. It is a source of much gratification to observe that several gentlemen of high professional distinction in the army are employing themselves in these appropriations. And while, in carrying forward the plans devised in former years, due regard should be had to the improvements already introduced in the means of defence, and, as far as practicable, to such modifications as may be rendered necessary by future discoveries, we must take care, by the most judicious application of the means already known and approved, not to lose the advantage of present security.

The array of well authenticated facts and results of past experience, and the well sustained reasoning founded upon them, exhibited in the report of the board of officers referred to in the accompanying letter of the chief of the corps of engineers, appear to be conclusive in favor of compelling the system of defence therein recommended, so far, at least, as to place the country in such a position of defence as good state of defensive preparation against any sudden occurrence of war. To this extent the completion of the works heretofore projected may be regarded as indispensable, however they may be improved as a perfect system of national defence. It will be seen from the estimates stated in the report alluded to, that to effect that object will require an appropriation of $9,695,517 upon the fortifications, and $2,434,099 upon the armaments, and together the sum of $12,129,616. The obligation of the government to apply this sum to the objects contemplated as equally as the nature and due prominence of the several constructions will admit, is rendered imperative and urgent by every consideration of public safety and public honor.

It is estimated by the chief engineer that the sum of $1,435,500 can be judiciously and most beneficially applied during these essential works, of defence, during the remainder of the present year, in addition to the appropriations heretofore made for the same objects. The expenditures in this branch of the service have been more considerable in the current quarter than usual, and hence the additional appropriations asked for are larger than they would have been under ordinary circumstances. For this has happened will be explained by the fact, that, soon after the accession of your immediate and lamented predecessor, all the means at the disposal of this department were directed to be applied upon the fortifications and other works for the protection of the Atlantic frontier, in the manner deemed best calculated to produce the greatest possible efficiency in the shortest time. This course appeared to be called for by the unsettled and threatening aspect of our foreign relations. While the means and resources at the disposal of this department for this service were thus ordered to be applied to such unfinished works as could be made available, in whole or in part, in a reasonable time, it is proper to state, in this connection, that directions were at the same time given to supply, without delay, the works already completed with their appropriate armament.

The promptitude and liberality with which the governor of New York and the commissioner of public lands in that state responded to the recent application of the department to be put in possession of the works constructed on Staten Island, under the supervision and at the expense of that state, for the defence of New York harbor, deserves the thanks of the country, and should be further acknowledged by the immediate appropriation of the sum demanded as a compensation for the ground upon which they are situated. The works are regarded as of great importance to the subject which they were designed, and they are now in the course of repair and improvement, under the direction of a competent officer of the corps of engineers. The correspondence between this department and the governor of New York, and the report of the board of officers, will show, that the terms upon which the title to this property will be vested in the U. States.

It will be seen from the accompanying report upon the ordnance department, that some of the most important appropriations which services are believed to be important to the public interest. The amount called for is $220,000. The importance of the operations of this department, and its immediate connection with the national defence, in providing guns, carriages, and other munitions, will at once be perceived.

It is necessary that the attention of congress should be called to the policy recently adopted in the management of the public armories. The duty of increasing, by every practicable means, the efficiency of these important establishments, not less than a due regard to economy, influenced the department in giving its sanction to the plan of discharging the civil superintendents of these establishments by law. After full consideration, it was believed that this could be safely and advantageously done. Accordingly the armories are now in charge of skillful and experienced officers of the ordnance department, and the defence of the country is thereby secured. The experience of the past few years, as shown by past experience, is the want of the proper qualifications in the persons usually selected. Some degree of science, as well as a practical knowledge in the construction and use of arms of considerable requisites in the superintendents. The desired and proper qualifications are rarely to be found united in the same person in civil life, whose services can be commanded by the government. Another and more serious objection to the system of supervision heretofore practised is found in the defective and inadequate control which the department has been able to exercise over the superintendents. It has been found impossible, in some instances, to enforce the most salutary regulations. The necessary degree of deference to the orders and wishes of the superior authority, it is manifest, has not been felt. This probably is the inevitable result of the nature of the interests and influences, in no manner connected with the service, which these superintendents, who too often contract the conduct of the superintendents. For these reasons, it is deemed of great importance that the armories should be separated, as far as possible, from all connection with the party interested in the service. The former plan, as suggested to a civil superintendence, cannot be better illustrated than by the statements contained in the accompanying memorandum of the ordnance department, which appears to be taken chiefly from the report of the board of officers referred to in the report of the superintendent of the armory at Harper's Ferry.

But the expediency of continuing the superintendency of these officers must finally be decided by congress. Some hesitation was felt in dropping, temporarily, the civil superintendence, but as neither of the civil superintendents, though of much personal worth, was regarded as possessing, in the due degree, those particular qualifications which are important in the management of such establishments, it was deemed prudent to suspend the civil superintendence for a short period, the public interest would be subserved, whatever may be the result of the experiment. If the policy recommended by the ordnance department, and so far sanctioned by this department, shall succeed, it will be well for the public service. If it shall fail, there will no longer be any pretext for future changes; and the department will look to the selection of the most competent superintendents from the ranks of civil life, and to the means of improving the efficiency of these establishments by such new regulations, under your direction, as may be suggested by experience.

Additional appropriations, to the amount of $825,637 86, are required by the pay and quartermaster's departments for the service of the present year. The amount asked by the quartermaster general appears to be indispensable. It is about the sum which congress at the last session failed to appropriate, though included in the estimates, and understood to be in part for arrearages for the year 1840; and a large portion of the present demand may not be improperly set down to the same account. A portion of the sum required by the pay department is for arrearages of the year 1840, as will appear from the report of the paymaster general.

The agents and superintendents heretofore employed in the construction of the various improvements on the lakes, the seacoast, and in the interior, have been discharged, except such as have been retained at a small compensation, to guard some of the works, until the completion of the unfinished state, and the public property connected with them. In a few instances, it has been found expedient to employ an agent to take care of the property of the government collected for the construction of these works until congress shall determine upon the question of continuing or abandoning them, where there was no need of which they could be paid. Some of these agents have been paid from the proceeds of the sale of a portion of the public property; others can be paid only by further sales or order an appropriation by congress. It has also been ascertained that the expenditures upon several of these works have exceeded the appropriations made for their construction. These arrearages are generally due to contractors and laborers in no way responsible for this error; and provision should therefore be made for the payment of them. The amount necessary to discharge them, as well as to pay the expenses of the agents employed as above stated, appears from the report of the chief of the corps of topographical engineers to be $39,997 12.

The subject of the expediency of compelling the Cumberland river to improve certain harbors and the navigation of certain rivers, which may be regarded as necessary and proper, in making adequate provision for the public defence, I propose to postpone the further notice of until the stated time of the next session, the consideration of it will involve the propriety of making appropriations for various works of internal improvement not necessarily connected with that object, and, consequently, will require more time than congress, at its approaching session, may find it convenient to give.

At the late session of congress, the sum of 30,000 dollars was appropriated to be expended, under the direction of this department, in repairing the breach in the Potomac bridge. Soon after the adjournment, an officer of the corps of topographical engineers, distinguished alike for his science and practical skill, was selected to make the necessary examinations, and to report a suitable plan for the execution of the work. When the report of this agency he has performed this preliminary survey will appear from his report to the chief of the corps. The highest confidence being reposed in the soundness of his judgment, it was determined to once to expend the sum of money placed at the disposal of the department for the accomplishment of so important a work upon a plan which did not promise to secure, what was held to be indispensable, its permanence and durability. From the present statement of the report of Mr. Turnbull, it is obvious that the report, if approved upon the plan which formed the basis of the estimate upon which the appropriation was made, could not stand through a single season of frost or ice. The question was then presented, whether it was proper to commence the repairs upon the old plan which promised the requisite strength and durability, but the cost of which would far exceed the appropriation made by congress, and which, it was believed, the department, was supposed to be ample for the object, or the sale of the work, while its questionable propriety, under the prospect of so immediate session of congress, decided the department to postpone further operations until that body should have an opportunity of acting upon the subject. The utility and importance of this bridge not only to the citizens of this city and District, but to the carrying of the public mail, and to the north-western trade of the year when the river is obstructed by ice, are so generally felt and acknowledged, that I need say no more to recommend the additional appropriation required; or that the sanction of congress be given in some other form at an early day of the session, to the making of the necessary repairs upon the only safe and durable plan which presents itself.

Another public work of great interest committed to the care of the department, demands my notice at this time. The sum of $75,000 was appropriated at the late session of congress for clearing out the Red river trail. The large sums of money heretofore expended on this subject, the high expectation indulged, after the first successful experiment, of the practicability of effecting it, the subsequent accumulation and continuance of partial obstructions, and the consequent disappointment of the public, caused the department to give its early and serious attention to the subject. Believing that congress in making this appropriation, indulged the hope that it would be all that would be required for the completion of the work, the department, resolved that the highest degree of permanence and utility attainable by the use of the means placed at its disposal should be accomplished, directed that an officer of the highest credit for skill and judgment should proceed without delay to ascertain the nature, extent and causes of the obstructions which interrupt the navigation of the river, and to submit a plan for their removal. That officer has not yet reported to the department. It is intimated that the steam and snag boats, after being repaired, shall ascend Red river, while it continues in a navigable state, to the point of obstruction; but it is not designed to enter upon the work until autumn. This policy, as will fully appear from the report of the chief of the topographical engineers, and the accompanying letter of the superintendent, was dictated by a sound economy, it out by the necessity of the case.

A practice has prevailed in the Indian department of making payment from moneys drawn from the treasury under appropriations by congress, without regarding, in all cases, the objects of the appropriations as specified in the law.

This practice virtually defeats that provision of the constitution which declares that no money shall be drawn from the treasury except under appropriations by congress; for the objects of these appropriations must have been merely that money shall not be drawn from the treasury without being duly appropriated, but that it shall be paid only for objects specified in the acts of appropriation.

The practice of making payments from such circumstances—that is, of taking money drawn from the treasury under an appropriation for one object, and applying it to the payment of accounts, and for objects for which no appropriation has been made—renders the reports of the condition of the treasury entirely fallacious, and utterly destroys all confidence in them. The true condition of the treasury, or of its liabilities, is not and cannot be presented under such a practice.

The Indian department has favored itself in the means of practicing this irregularity by another usage, directly in contravention of the law of congress requiring that unexpended balances of appropriations, at the expiration of two years shall revert to the treasury. It has been customary, since the expiration of two years, to withdraw from the treasury the balances not actually required for disbursement within the specified period; and these balances have been placed in the hands of disbursing agents, forming a very large fund, from which payments have been made from time to time for objects for which no appropriations have been made by congress. The amount of funds in the hands of these special agents of the department has ranged, on an average, from two to three hundred thousand dollars for the last seven or eight years, and this has been generally deposited in banks selected at the direction of the agent himself.

Under these circumstances, the disbursing agents, having received moneys under authorized laws of appropriation, which have been applied to objects not sanctioned by law, have had their accounts brought into such a condition as will not allow of their settlement at the treasury without special appropriation by congress; and since there are disbursing agents who have been able to obtain a settlement during several years, and whose accounts are still open, notwithstanding the act of congress, most salutary in its object, requiring a settlement annually on the first of October.

As one irregularity is often the parent of another, so under the usage of the Indian bureau, by which large amounts of money have been held by disbursing agents, which should have reverted to the treasury, these agents have had the means of loaning, and have actually loaned, large sums, within the last few years, to meet the necessities of the treasury in other departments of the government or other and distinct branches of the Indian department; and, in this manner, a system of accommodation has obtained without responsibility and unknown to the treasury.

The evils of the practice the subject of these remarks, will sufficiently appear when it is considered that they are precisely those which it was the object of the provision in the constitution, prescribing the mode of drawing money from the treasury, to guard against; and those also which were intended to be counteracted by the law of congress requiring that unexpended balances shall revert to the treasury at the expiration of two years.

In the present condition of the accounts of disbursing agents, it is impossible to ascertain the precise amount of payments requiring appropriations by congress for their final adjustment at the treasury, but the amount is known, thus far, to exceed $200,000, and it will probably require $250,000, and possibly $300,000.

It would be easy to multiply remarks upon the impropriety of this practice of the department. The objections to it are numerous and weighty, and it is not necessary to multiply them, but principles as to deserve some further notice in this report.

All officers hold their powers in trust under the obligation of fulfilling the objects for which those powers were granted. Congress is entrusted with the power of expending money for the objects to be accomplished by executive agents. If the agents divert the money to other objects, there is a breach of trust. But as all the officers of the government are presumed to have in view the common good, congress, more or less, relies upon the executive agents to indicate the objects requiring appropriations with estimates of the amounts necessary for their accomplishment. This confidence in executive agents seems to have been regarded, in some cases, as an implied authority in the agents to expend the objects not yet sanctioned by congress, the agents looking prospectively for that sanction. But if this discretion is to be tolerated under any pretence whatever, for objects however apparently needful for the public service, checks and restraints upon the constitution and the laws are at once removed, and the most dangerous experiments may be made with the public money, having no higher sanction than the judgment of the heads of departments, while the discretion thus exercised at the fountain-head is liable to become licentiousness in the subordinate agents, resulting in frauds and defalcations of extraordinary character and magnitude.

The attention of the department has been directed to the subject of Indian treaties, and particularly to the manner in which some of those recently made have been executed, involving the disbursement of large sums of money for the emigration and subsistence of Indians.

The frauds that have been practiced in the south-west have been to some extent inquired into, but a full disclosure of all the facts has not yet been arrived at. Enough has, however, been brought to light to establish a conviction that certain contractors have realized the most enormous profits, the greater portion of which is believed to have been the direct fruit of gross fraud upon the government of the United States, and of the gross and systematic use of the Indians, practiced by bribing some of the subordinate instruments in the public employment, or through the mismanagement of higher public agents, who can only screen themselves from the suspicion of complicity in the frauds, by alleging to the imputation of gross negligence, ignorance or incompetency in the performance of their duty.

From the involved character of these transactions and the difficulty of procuring full and precise information, it has been found impossible as yet to fix upon the point where the frauds commenced, or to ascertain the boundaries of responsibility among the numerous public officers and agents through whose direct or indirect instrumentality, connivance or ignorance the contractors were able to consummate their unprincipled designs. This investigation has been prosecuted with the most painful reluctance, though persevered in under a paramount sense of duty; and enough has been disclosed to suggest an inquiry whether the guilty recipients may not be compelled to refund the money and its gains to the treasury by process of law.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN BELL.

To the president

FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Navy department, May 31, 1841.

Sir: The appropriation made at the last session of congress will be found amply sufficient to cover the expenditures for the current year, under the several heads of appropriation, unless it should become necessary to be deemed proper to assume another and larger basis of operations than that on which the estimates from the department were founded.

The state of the navy pension fund will require the immediate action of congress. Under the operation of the act entitled "an act for the more regular administration of the navy pension fund," that fund has been exhausted, so that the sum of the accompanying report of the commissioner of pensions, that there will be required for the payment of navy pensioners, on the 1st of July next, the sum of $98,706.06, and on the 1st of January, 1842, the further sum of $69,000. In addition to these sums, about $6,000 will be required to pay arrears of pensions which will probably be allowed between July next and the 1st of January, making in the whole $163,716.06. To meet these payments, there is within the control of the department the sum of $28,400; leaving a deficiency of $135,666.06, which the public faith requires should be promptly supplied.

The sudden return of the Brandywine seems to require some explanation. From the despatches sent to the department by the commanding officer of the ship, it appears that the great excitement prevailing in England in the early part of March last, induced our minister at that court to address a communication to Lord Palmerston, the secretary of state for the United States, and to request that the government of Great Britain should, as a mark of respect, send a squadron, then lying at Malton, left the station with a view to get out of that sea, ascertain the true state of things between the United States and Great Britain, and either return to the United States or return home, according to the result. The Brandywine, outlasting the commander, and captain Bolton having received no information on his voyage deemed satisfactory by him, he returned to the United States.

Though it is presumed congress will scarcely be willing to give attention to general matters unconnected with the objects for which the extraordinary session of that body was convoked, yet recent events induce me to bring to your notice, with a view to the consideration of congress, two subjects as worthy of present consideration. The first is the establishment of a home squadron. While squadrons are maintained in various parts of the world for the preservation of our commerce, our own shores have been left without any adequate protection. Had a war with Great Britain broken out, as it has been so often generally feared, of the subjects of difficulty now in a course of adjustment between that power and the United States, not only would our trade, but our shores would be liable to great interruption, and our merchant ships would be exposed to a naval force, comparatively small, might, on our very shores, have directed our merchant ships and insulted our flag, without suitable means of resistance or immediate retaliation being at the command of the government. To guard against such a result—to be ever ready to repel or promptly to chastise aggressions upon our own shores, it is necessary that a powerful squadron should be kept about at home. This measure is recommended by other considerations. There is no situation in which greater skill or seamanship can be exercised and acquired than on the coast of the United States; and in no service would our officers and seamen become more thoroughly initiated to all that is necessary for the national defence and glory. In that service, the most accurate survey now in progress, a thorough acquaintance would be gained with our own sea coast, extensive and hitherto imperfectly known—the various ports would be visited—the bays, inlets and harbors carefully examined—the uses to which each could be made available during war, either for escape, defence or annoyance, be ascertained, and the confidence resulting from perfect knowledge would give to us, what we ought surely to possess, a decided advantage over an enemy or our rivals. Should there be thought desirable that such a squadron be put in commission immediately and kept constant in duty, an additional appropriation may be necessary, for the amount of which, as well as the force deemed proper to be employed, I beg to leave to the accompanying report on the subject, prepared under my direction, by the board of navy commissioners.

The attention of congress has been heretofore earnestly invited to the state of our ordnance and ordnance stores, and I deem it worthy of immediate consideration. Since the late war, the successful and successful operations of the navy have been, and it cannot, from the nature of the case, be provided upon a sudden emergency. Sailors may be hastily collected from our commercial marine, ships may be purchased, but ordnance cannot be supplied on such an emergency, nor can the materials for the preparation of ammunition be procured either by purchase or manufacture. Hence the ordnance should, by a timely foresight, be provided in advance, and the materials be secured, from which a supply of ammunition can be speedily prepared. The accompanying report from the board of navy commissioners shows the amount of expenditure which will be required under this head. Should the object be deemed of such importance and urgency as to require the immediate attention of congress, I respectfully recommend that an appropriation of one-third of the estimated amount be now made.

The opinion seems to have become general, as well in the service as in the nation at large, that a thorough reorganization of the navy is demanded by considerations connected with the defence and honor of the country, and in this opinion I heartily concur. Yet I fully aware that any plan for this purpose should be the result of the most careful deliberation, and that it would be at once unwise and impolitic to submit to congress and the people proposed arrangements which should be liable to the charge of haste and inconsideration. Deeply sensible, therefore, at once of the importance and difficulty of the measure, I have taken proper steps to collect and avail myself of all the results of experience and observation from those whose opportunities have afforded the means of knowledge, and their intelligence the ability to use them profitably, and I entertain the hope of being able, before the next regular meeting of congress, to submit for your consideration a comprehensive and well-digested system of reform in the branch of the public service committed to my charge.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE E. BADGER.

The president of the United States.

FROM THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Post office department, May 29th, 1841.

Sir: The arrangement of business at, and the manner of returns to the general post office, forbid a detail report of its operations at the approaching meeting of congress. I have, however, it is my duty, at this time, to call public attention to the state of its finances, so far as I have yet been able to learn their condition.

When first entering upon my official duties, my attention was forced to the constant demands for payment beyond the ability of the department to discharge; and with a view to ascertain, as nearly as might be, its undisputed liabilities and probable means on the 21st day of March last a letter was addressed to the auditor of the treasury for the post office department, requesting from him information on those subjects. A copy of which letter, marked A, is herewith submitted. Such statements have not been furnished, for reasons clearly set forth in a letter from the auditor, dated the 22nd day of May, of which a copy is hereto appended, marked B.

It was also important to learn, without delay, what were the pressing liabilities and what the active funds of the department. For this purpose, directions were given to the chief clerk to state the amount due to contractors anterior to and for the quarter ending the 31st December, 1840, so far as the same had been reported by the auditor, and also the amount in deposit, subject to draft, for the discharge of some of these liabilities. His report is herewith submitted, marked C.

By an examination of that statement, it will be seen that there was due and unpaid to contractors, of ascertained balances, on the first day of January last, the sum of four hundred and forty-seven thousand and twenty-nine dollars, ($447,029), a considerable portion of which has been paid from the revenues of the quarter ending on the 31st March. A report from the auditor upon the outstanding contracts will undoubtedly, increase this amount of indebtedness to a total exceeding half a million of dollars. In addition to which, heavy demands are occasionally made on the department upon undigested claims. Of such demands, no notice can be taken at this time, nor is it proper that an opinion as to their justice should be now expressed.

Under these circumstances, two questions naturally present themselves: How can the department be sustained under its present embarrassments; and, what are its financial hopes for the future?

As no estimates, upon which can be based an answer to the first inquiry, can be presented until a full statement of the balances due from postmasters shall have been reported by the auditor, it is passed with the single remark, that although it can hardly be doubted that a large aggregate sum will be found due it is to be feared that from the small amount of most of such separate balances, scattered throughout this wide-spread nation, the want of responsibility in many of these officers and many of their securities, and the lapse of time since these balances accrued, but an inconsiderable part of the amount actually due will ever be received. It therefore remains for congress to determine whether the amount now due to contractors shall be paid from the national treasury, or whether this department shall struggle with the small amount of its resources, consuming its daily accruing revenues in the partial payment of old debts, and still leaving large balances which it has not the ability to discharge.

Notwithstanding the heavy increased expenditure consequent upon the act of 7th July, 1838, and although instead of the supposed gradual increase of revenue, the receipts for the quarter ending 31st March last, present, as compared with the corresponding quarter of the year before, a diminution of more than six per cent. still the department would probably find sufficient relief in its future operations from the decrease of prices which, it may be calculated, will be heretofore demanded upon most of the routes, were it not for the continuing increasing exactions in other branches of the service.

To present this subject in its most intelligible form, the first assistant postmaster general has prepared a tabular view of recent proposals, that comparison may be made between the amount of present bids and the sum now paid for mail service upon the same routes. This table is hereto annexed, marked D.

So no examination of this statement, it will be seen that, in some cases, the amount demanded by rail road companies for transportation of the mails is more than two hundred per cent. higher than is paid for coach service, upon roads forming connecting links between different rail road companies, upon the same main route, and that too where the night services upon the rail roads is less than that performed in coaches. Such demands deserve more consideration from the fact that, whilst at the recent meetings in New York and in the six eastern states the accepted service by coaches and other modes of conveyance has been secured at an average saving of twenty-two per cent. upon the contracts of 1837, there are but few instances where the demands of incorporated companies have not been increased in such manner as imposed upon me the necessity of suspending the contracts. Nor the extravagant prices demanded for mail transportation upon rail roads the only manner in which these incorporations affect the revenue of this department. The facilities secured by this mode of conveyance for sending letters by private hands very seriously diminish the receipts of the office upon such routes. A single illustration will establish this assertion.

Boston is one of the most important points of rail road concentration in the union. Its business prosperity is proverbial; and yet in that city the quarter ending the 31st March last, shows, as compared with the corresponding quarter of the year before, a decrease in postage receipts of three thousand one hundred and ninety-five dollars—being double the amount of diminution to be found, within the same time, in any other post office in the union, with the single exception of Philadelphia, which is another great terminus of rail road communication.

These facts are presented in no spirit of unkindness towards those to whose management these incorporations are intrusted, but that I have considered it due to our whole people to refer to this subject as one which will ere long call for national and state legislation, unless a corrective be sooner applied by public opinion.

A considerable saving will be found in the current year's service generally, directed by my immediate predecessor, in limiting the transportation of the mails to six trips a week upon most of the routes throughout the nation. The embarrassed condition of the department, if it was to remain unaided, would, of course, clearly indicate the propriety of some reduction of service, and the religious sense of the community will certainly approve the feeling that selects the Sabbath as the day on which that service should not be performed. Yet it cannot be denied that this order has cost heavily on contractors, and in many instances causes great derangement to the transportation of the mails.

Whilst in some sections of our country this alteration has not only received a cheerful acquiescence, but is warmly approved, there has been great general complaint of its operation and daily appeals for the old facilities are pressed upon the department. Without entering upon this subject at large, it is sufficient for my present purpose to state that, as this order purports to have been given to reduce the expenses of the department, and to aid in bringing them within its receipts, a return to the former service at this time, might well be considered as a declaration of my confidence in its ability to sustain the expenditure necessary for such restoration. I have therefore felt it imperative upon me to adhere to this order of curtailment.

The building now being erected for the general post office is so far advanced as to give assurance that it can be completed before the session of congress in December. This is much to be desired, not only for the convenience of the transaction of business, but that the public property may be kept in security. Such means as are kept in my power are continually employed to protect the present building from fire, but in its exposed condition the danger of destruction to the books and papers of the office is a source of constant anxiety. All which is respectfully submitted.

FRANCIS GRANGER.
To the president of the United States.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.
We have the pleasure to forward the official reports from the several departments at the earliest possible moment before our readers, to occupying the pages of the REGISTER, with fuller details of congressional proceedings at this stage of the session. A condensed account of what has occupied each house is given.

SENATE.

June 3. Mr. Clay, of Alabama, appeared and took his seat.

After the journal was read, the president of the senate announced the following as the committees on the part of the senate to join with that of the house in taking into consideration so much of the president's message as relates to the demise of the late president, viz: Messrs. Bayard, Frentiss, Benton, Archer and Walker.

The president also announced the select committee to which was referred so much of the president's message as relates to a uniform currency, &c.—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Choate, Wright, Barlow, King, Tallmadge, Bayard, Graham and Huntington.

The following senators were then announced by the chair as the standing committees, the chairman of each having been ballotted for on a prior day:
On foreign relations—Messrs. Rives, Preston, Buchanan, Tallmadge and Choate.

On finance—Messrs. Clay, of Ky., Evans, Woodbury, Mangum and Bayard.

On commerce—Messrs. Huntington, Merrick, King, Barrow and Wright.

On manufactures—Messrs. Evans, Archer, Miller, Buchanan and Summons.

On agriculture—Messrs. Linn, Woodbridge, Smith, of Conn. White and Shemons.

On military affairs—Messrs. Preston, Merrick, Benton, Archer and Pierce.

On the militia—Messrs. Phelps, Kerr, Clay, of Ala. Barrow and Fulton.

On naval affairs—Messrs. Mangum, Archer, Williams, Smith, of Ind. and Choate.

On public lands—Messrs. Smith, of Ind. Tallmadge, Walker and Mason.

On private land claims—Messrs. Bayard, Huntington, Linn, Sevier and Henderson.

On Indian affairs—Messrs. Morehead, White, Sevier, Phelps and Benton.

On claims—Messrs. Graham, Bates, Wright, Woodbury and Woodbridge.

On revolutionary claims—Messrs. Dixon, Morehead, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon and Graham.

On the judiciary—Messrs. Berrien, Clayton, Prentiss, Walker and Kerr.

On the post office—Messrs. Henderson, Simmons, McRobert, Berrien and Moulton.

On roads and canals—Messrs. Porter, White, Young, Culbert and King.

On pensions—Messrs. Bates, Pierce, Allen, Dixon and Nicholson.

For the District of Columbia—Messrs. Merrick, Clayton, King, Mangum and Young.

On patents—Messrs. Prentiss, Porter, Sturgeon, Tappan and Henderson.

On public buildings—Messrs. Barrow, Fulton and Kerr.

On the contingent expenses—Messrs. White, Tappan and Porter.

On engrossed bills—Messrs. McRobert, Miller and Nicholson.

Mr. Clay offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue" ought to be forthwith repealed, and that the committee on finance be directed to report a bill to that effect.

Mr. Clay addressed the senate upon the subject, and a debate ensued, principally between him and Mr. Calhoun. A amendment proposed by the latter was negatived, ayes 18, nays 27. The resolution, as modified by Mr. Clay, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue."

June 4. After the presentation of memorials and petitions—ayes 18, nays 27. The resolution, as modified by Mr. Clay, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on finance, reported the following bill, which was read and ordered to a second reading:

A bill to repeal the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue," and to provide for the punishment of embezzlers of the public money."

Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue," approved on the fourth July, eighteen hundred and forty, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, always, That for any offences which may have been committed against the provisions of the severalth section of the said act, the offenders may be prosecuted and punished according to those provisions, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any officer charged with the safe-keeping, transfer or disbursement of public moneys, or connected with the post office department, shall convert to his own use in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind or property, or shall loan or shall loan with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys entrusted to him for safe-keeping, transfer, disbursement or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be so converted, invested, loaned, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a felony; and the refusal to pay over, on demand, any public moneys in his hands upon the presentation of a warrant drawn upon and signed by the secretary of the treasury, shall be prima facie evidence of such conversion to his own use of so much of the public moneys as may be in his hands. Any officer or agent of the United States and any persons advising or knowingly and willingly participating in such embezzlement, upon being convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay to the United States a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled, and shall suffer imprisonment for a term not less than six months nor more than five years.

June 7. Memorials and petitions were presented; by Mr. Clay from citizens of Cherokee county, Georgia, for the abolishment of the branch mill, in that state. Mr. C. expressed his hearty concurrence and his admiration of the disinterested views of the petitioners.

By Mr. Tallmadge, three memorials from citizens of New York, for a general bankrupt law, from the chamber of commerce of New York in favor of a national bank, and from merchants of that city relative to drawbacks.

By Mr. Merrick, a memorial from the Patriotic bank of Washington, for a renewal of charter, and resolutions from the legislature of Maryland, relative to the tobacco growing interests.

Some conversation ensued as to any reference of this matter to the present session, when it was manifest it could not be acted on. When, on motion, it was laid on the table.

Mr. Clay said he would call the attention of the senate to a resolution he wished to present, growing out of some of the suggestions contained in the report of the secretary of the treasury. That report and doubts been read by the senators generally, and it would be recollected by every gentleman that it concluded by an explicit recommendation of a plan for the creation of a Bank of the United States. The secretary added the suggestion of what Mr. C. should be most glad to see, though he must confess that he had not full faith in its practicability, viz: a plan for conducting the fiscal business of the government which shall reconcile all opinions, and harmonize the votes of all parties in the country.

However, it might be very right that the senate should see what is the plan which the secretary thought capable of effecting a result so desirable to all; it was certainly proper that any plan that officer might deem worthy have prepared and recommended to the adoption of congress should be in its possession. With a view to obtain this, Mr. C. had prepared a resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate a plan, as practicable, as a plan of such a bank to be incorporated by congress, as in his opinion is best adapted to the public service.

In this proposition a debate took place, in which Messrs. King, Woodbury, Wright, Calhoun, Rives and Buchanan took part.

Mr. Buchanan said he was very anxious to see this fiscal agent of the honorable secretary; it was, it seemed to him, a political question. A political question was approaching, when the hon. man was to lie down with the lamb. This fiscal agent was to smooth away all difficulties. The valleys were to be exalted, the rough places made smooth, and all that together was to be this wing salvation. This fiscal agent was to make money plenty, supply a uniform currency, and to regulate the exchanges; and yet was not to be a Bank of the United States! He should really be most happy to see it. But if it seemed to him that it was to be a system of discounting paper, issuing notes, and dealing in exchanges, let it be located where it might—here, at the seat of government, or in Philadelphia, or at New York—those who had constitutional objections to the United States Bank, let them state them, if they had, their objections to this new agent as strong as ever. Frowned as it now was, he thought the resolution of the senator might leave the senate in some doubt as to his real purpose in this call, because it seemed to him that the speaker of a fiscal agent was in favor of a Bank of the United States on the old plan; that was his first choice; though he had, it seemed, an alternative ready. Of all things of a political nature in this world, what Mr. B. wanted most to see was this reformed fiscal agent of the secretary.

Mr. Rives moved to amend the resolution offered by Mr. Clay so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to communicate to the senate, with as little delay as practicable, the plan of such a fiscal agent, being free from constitutional objection, with in his opinion produce the happiest results, and confer lasting advantages on the country.

Mr. Clay said he could not agree to the proposition in that shape; if the gentleman would say "a bank or fiscal agent," and substitute "directed" for "requested," he would accept of it as a modification. Mr. Rives replied that, although he preferred the resolution as he had drawn it, yet in a liberal spirit of compromise he was willing so to modify it; there ought to be, there must be some concession for the sake of uniting the opinion of gentlemen. (Considerable objections were made (across) by gentlemen on the right of the chair.)

Mr. R. said he should be glad to accommodate a gentleman, but he must yield to the suggestion of the senator from Kentucky.

Mr. Benton said he did not like the resolution; it seemed to him to open too wide a field, and to invite such a plan as never was contemplated by the constitution. Its language sounded, in Mr. B.'s ear, very like calling for a book to promote the general welfare. He had decided objection to calling on the head of a department for a scheme to promote the general welfare.

Mr. Clay having adopted Mr. Rives' amendment for the sake of uniting the opinion of gentlemen, as follows, and adopted con.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate with as little delay as practicable, the plan of such a bank or fiscal agent as, being free from constitutional objection, with in his opinion, produce the happiest results and confer lasting and important benefits to the country.

Mr. Benton submitted resolutions calling for reconsideration, but he noticed when they are called up for consideration.

Mr. Byrd, from the select committee appointed to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the decease of their late president, made the following report:

The melancholy event of the death of Wm. Henry Harrison, late president of the United States, having occurred during the recess of congress, and the two houses sitting in the general grief and mourning, manifest their sentiments upon the occasion of that public bereavement, therefore—

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, That the chairs of the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives be shrouded in black during the residue of the session; and that the president pro tempore of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, and the members and officers of both houses wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mr. Harrison, and to assure him of the profound respect of the two houses of congress for her person and character, and of the sincere condolence of the late suffering disposition of Providence.

Mr. Clay said he would now recollect that on the last meeting some conversation had passed as to introducing a resolution which should declare, in the outset, on what subjects it was proposed that congress should act at the present extra session; he had once then turned his attention to the subject, and if no other gentleman had any resolution to offer, he would present the result of his reflection in the shape of the following resolution:

Resolved, as the opinion of the senate, That at the present session of congress no business ought to be transacted but such as being of an important or great nature may be supposed to have influenced the extraordinary convention of congress, or such as that department of the public service as materially detrimental to the public interest.

Resolved, therefore, as the opinion of the senate, That the following resolutions be adopted, which shall engage the deliberation of congress at the present session—

1st. The repeal of the sub-treasury.

2d. The introduction of a bill adapted to the wants of the people and of the government.

3d. The provision of an adequate revenue for the government by the imposition of duties, and including an authorized bill for a temporary law, to cover some public debt created by the last administration.

4th. The prospective distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

5th. The passage of necessary appropriation bills.

6th. Some modification of the banking system of the District of Columbia for the benefit of the people of that District.

Resolved, That it is expedient to distribute the business proper to be done this session between the senate and house of representatives, so as to avoid both houses sitting on the same subject and at the same time.

After a few brief remarks by Messrs. Clay and Woodbury—

The senate then proceeded to ballot, under the 4th rule, for the election of officers of the senate.

The first ballot being for secretary of the senate, there were 43 votes given, of which Mr. Asbury Dickinson received 41, and was declared duly elected.

For sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, the whole number being 44, of which Mr. Asbury Dickinson received 41, and was declared duly elected.

For assistant doorkeeper, the whole number of votes given were 44, of which Mr. Robert Bell, having received 41, was declared duly elected.

The bill reported yesterday from the finance committee, a debate ensued, which occupied the senate until they adjourned.

June 8. After the presentation of memorials and petitions, Mr. Benton's resolution calling for reconsideration was taken up, and, after a slight modification, adopted.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas, was taken up and read:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform the senate why general Matthew Arbuck's has been removed from his command at Fort Gibson, west of Arkansas, to Baton Rouge, in Louisiana.

Upon this a debate arose between Mr. Preston and Mr. Sevier, which was terminated by a call for the order of the day, and the resolution was for the present laid upon the table.

The resolution reported by Mr. Esperand, from the joint committee recommending that the chairs of the presiding officers, of both houses be shrouded in mourning, was read a third time and passed.

The debate upon the bill to repeal the sub-treasury act was resumed, the question being on the following amendment moved by Mr. Calhoun:

That so much of the 5th section of the act of 2d June, 1836, as provides that no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall, after the 4th of July, 1836, in use or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than $5; and that no notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States which shall, after the 4th of July, 1836, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than $5, be, and shall be hereby, repealed.

After discussion the question on this amendment was adopted by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clay, of N. Carolina, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Prentiss, Sumner, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White—22.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurring on the amendment as thus amended, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ohio, John, King, McKim, Nichol, Noyes, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berners, Choate, Clay, Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, River, Sumner, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Woodbury, White—25.

So the amendment, as amended, was rejected. Mr. Clay said that the effect of the last vote was, to leave the bill in the form in which it had been reported. If it should in this form pass out of congress, and become a law, the state bank system, as regulated in 1836, would be revived and continue in force until a substitute should be adopted by congress.

Mr. C. took it for granted that a substitute of some description would pass; but if, unfortunately, congress should be unable to agree upon any substitute, whether in the form of a bank or other fiscal agent, then he presumed that congress would adopt some discharge of the duty of rendering the state bank system as efficient and perfect as possible. After the gallant course pursued by the honorable senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Walker), Mr. C. considered it as proper for him, also, to stand that he would vote that way under the circumstances—none whatever—none. He had never been opposed to the plan, and would not have given his vote for the law of 1836 on any other ground than that that law contained the principle of a distribution of the money fund among the states. No gentleman on the other side chose to put themselves in command of such a miserable fee, he did not care under what commodore Mr. C. and his friends were ready to meet them upon any sea, and he doctored not to say that he would vote for such a victory as Perry had achieved on one of our great lakes, or the brave McDonough on another.

Mr. Calhoun would say to the senator from Kentucky that he was fighting against an imaginary flag if he supposed that the amendment on that side would be successful in conferring the state bank system. No. They intended to go into battle under the noble flag of the sub-treasury. He was glad that the senator had been compelled to say that if the sub-treasury should be repealed, the law of 1836 would be enforced. If that law as it now stood should in practice be found impracticable, the difficulty would fall chiefly in the south and southwest. Mr. Clay said he had never doubted that the law of 1836 would remain; but when he had introduced his bill to repeal the sub-treasury, he had given notice that this was the first in a series, and had avowed, openly, his preference for a Bank of the U. States. If, then, the law of 1836 did revive in its present form, he hoped it would be but for a very short time. But, if otherwise, it must undergo a complete revision.

Mr. Benton proposed to amend the bill by excluding the Bank of the U. S. of Pennsylvania from being used as a depositary for the proceeds of the sale.

Some conversation ensued—It was objected to discriminate, else it would be proper to invert the Ohio Creek bank, and some others, in the exclusion. On the amendment the yeas and nays were called; and were, yeas 20, nays 35.

After further discussion, and some slight amendments, the bill was finally ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berners, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, River, Sumner, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Fulton, King, Nicholson, Sevier, Sevier, Smith, of Ct., Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—18.

It was then ordered to be printed; and the senate adjourned.

June 9. Mr. Clay gave the notice that he should tomorrow ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

The bill to repeal the sub-treasury act having been read a third time, the question being on its engrossment, Mr. Woodbury took the floor, and, in a considerable length addressed the senate upon the general principle of the sub-treasury act, and upon his administration of the currency. He warmly defended the sub treasury bill, and did not wish to leave the currency under the control of the executive, as it would be of the repeal took place, and no respect act was passed.

Mr. Calhoun yet believed that the course of the gentlemen on the other side was such as to leave the public money under the control of the executive; he re-asserted against it the right.

Mr. Benton attempted the introduction of a resolution declaring the repeal of the sub-treasury independent, which the senate pronounced out of order; when Mr. Benton withdrew his motion, and proposed to rescind his bill with instructions, which was negatived, yeas 18, nays 25.

Mr. Wright then took the floor, and spoke at great length.

The debate was continued until near 7 o'clock, by Messrs. Calhoun, Benton, Tallmadge, Wright, Arnold, and McRoberts—all then speaking in opposition to the bill, except Mr. Tallmadge.

The question having been taken on the passage of the bill it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berners, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, River, Sumner, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbury—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, McKim, Nicholson, Phelps, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—18. And the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The house has been occupied a considerable portion of several days in debating a resolution moved by Mr. Wise, that the rules of the last session be adopted for the government of the house for ten days, or until the same are revised, which Mr. Adams proposed to amend by "excepting the 21st rule," which is the rule that disposes of petitions respecting abolition. This amendment after a debate was adopted—but a motion was subsequently made to reconsider the vote, and that motion was under debate when our latest accounts left the city of Washington.

Tuesday, June 8. The speaker announced the following standing committees:

Elections—Messrs. Halsted, Blair, Craven, Borden, Sumner, Gamble, Aaron V. Brown, Medill, and C. A. Floyd.

Ways and means—Messrs. Fillmore, Gilmer, Botts, Samson Mason, Thos. F. Marshall, Rencher, Pickens, John W. Jones and Altherton.

Claims—Messrs. Giddings, Sprigg, Linn, Warren, Arnold, Cowan, Banks, Burke and Robert McClellan.

Commerce—Messrs. John P. Kennedy, Winthrop, Tolson, Rayner, Benj. Randall, Ed. D. White, Holmes, Brewster, and Chas. Brown.

Public lands—Messrs. Wm. Cost Johnson, Morriss, Lewis Williams, Smith, Genly, Bronson, Howard, Chapman and Cave Johnson.

Post office and post roads—Messrs. Briggs, Jos. L. Williams, Russell, Brockway, Morgan, Owley, Andrew Kennedy, Hopkins and Railing.

District of Columbia—Messrs. Underwood, King, Powell, Harris, Alex. Randall, Rich'd W. Thompson, Keim, John Campbell and John T. Mason.

Judiciary—Messrs. Barnard, Trumbull, Maxwell, Wood, Foster, Milton Brown, Pearce, Ingersoll, Roosevelt and Saunders.

Revolutionary claims—Messrs. Hall, Patrick G. Goode, Thomas J. Campbell, Mathiot, Washington, James, Parmenter, Wm. O. Goode and Van Buren.

Public expenditures—Messrs. Graham, Childs, Hudson, Alford, Clinton, Jeremiah Brown, Watterson, Green and Littlefield.

Private land claims—Messrs. Moore, R. D. Davis, Benj. G. Gable, Stuart, Cross, J. B. Dawson, Turney and Gordon.

Manufactures—Messrs. Saltonstall, Randolph, Greig, Henry, Slade, Tillingshast, Nabbi, A. Marshall and Eastman.

Agriculture—Messrs. Deberry, Ridgway, Simonson, Doig, A. McClellan, Arrington, Mettucks, Shaw and John Hastings.

Indian affairs—Messrs. Adams, Cooper, Barton, W. B. Campbell, Merriweather, Crittenden, Shepherd, Wm. Butler and Bidlack.

Military affairs—Messrs. Wm. C. Dawson, Wallace, Caruthers, Pendleton, Goggins, Van Rensselaer, Wm. O. Butler, Sumler and Miller.

Millia—Messrs. King, Triplett, Colles, Bokley, Ward, Wiley, Sweney, Lowrey and S. H. Butler.

Naval affairs—Messrs. Wise, Stanley, G. Davis, T. W. Williams, King, Burnett, Pressenden, Mallory and Clifford.

Foreign affairs—Messrs. Cushing, Everett, Hunt, John C. Clark, Allen, Proctor, Rhett, Hunier and Ferris.

Territories—Messrs. Pope, C. H. Williams, Solers, Maynard, Hays, Gaica, Green, W. Caldwell, Daniel and Dean.

Revolutionary pensions—Messrs. Tallifero, Rodney, Laws, L. W. Andrews, Matthews, S. N. Clarke, Babcock, C. A. Floyd and Fernald.

Invalid pensions—Messrs. Morris, Ayer, J. Edwards, Gerry, Gordon, Hubbard, Dixon, Sutton and Gustin.

Roads and canals—Messrs. Lawrence, Joseph L. White, Boardman, Sherlock, J. Andrews, John B. Thompson, John Young, Bieenor, Wm. W. Irwin and Bresson.

Patents—Messrs. Osborne, Cranston, Plumer, Birtch, Donck, Jack and C. A. Floyd.

Public Buildings and grounds—Messrs. Boardman, Augustus Young, Cranston, Bowne and Wood.

Revisal and unfinished business—Messrs. James, Birtch, Donck, Jack and C. A. Floyd.

Accounts—Messrs. Baker, L. W. Andrews, Marchand, J. G. Floyd and York.

Mirages—Messrs. Thomas W. Williams, Patrick C. Caldwell, John C. Edwards, Westbrook and Egerton.

Expenditure in the state department—Messrs. Van Buren, Hudson, Oliver, Brockway and Wm. S. Hastings.

Expenditures in the treasury department—Messrs. McKim, Brown, Mason, Partridge, I. D. Jones and James Irvin.

Expenditures in the war department—Messrs. McKay, Tomlinson, Neward, Alford and Brockway.

Expenditures in the navy department—Messrs. York, Simonton, Burden, Stuart and Green.

Expenditures in the post office department—Messrs. Lowell, Morgan, Washington, Boyd and Lane.

Expenditures on the public buildings—Messrs. C. Johnson, Gates, Bidlack, Stokly and Houck.

The speaker announced the names of the following members as constituting the select committee ordered yesterday to be appointed "on the subject of the currency and the establishment of a suitable fiscal agency capable of adding increased facilities in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues, and rendering their custody more secure."

Committee—Messrs. Seagraves, Adams, Pope, W. Cost Johnson, Wm. C. Dawson, Botts, McKay, McKim and Rhett.

Mr. Gilmer presented the memorial of William Smith, of the 12th congressional district, in the state of Va. contesting the seat now held by the hon. Linn Banks, which was referred to the committee of elections.

The house proceeded to an election, sine voce, of a sergeant-at-arms, and the following persons were balloted for:

	1st	2d	3d	4th	5th
Whole number of votes	222	221	218	216	217
Necessary to a choice	112	111	109	109	109
Mr. Dorcey	82	89	85	81	85
Mr. Townsend	55	71	76	76	80
Mr. Huse	24	41	47	43	32
Blake	19	9	—	—	—
Wilson	11	—	—	—	—
— Birchett	11	12	10	6	—

The house was about to proceed to a 6th ballot, when Mr. Iugensoll moved a reconsideration of the vote by which, on yesterday, the house had agreed to the amendment of Mr. Adams, striking out the 21st rule.

The house was in a ferment in a moment, and a question of order arose.

The motion was entered on the journal, and will come up for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. Adams, on leave, from the select committee, to whom was referred that portion of the president's message, relating to the family of the late president, reported a bill "for the relief of Mrs. Harrison, widow of president Harrison." It was read twice and referred to a committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The sum to be appropriated is left for the consideration of the house.

The balloting for sergeant-at-arms was then resumed, and on the 7th ballot, Mr. Townsend receiving a majority of votes, was declared to have been duly elected.

Mr. Hunt offered a resolution discharging the standing committees from all business appertaining to them during the present session, except those whose duty it is to consider the several subjects referred to in the president's message.

A motion was here made to adjourn, which prevailed; and, at half past 5, the house adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

CHRONICLE.

ABOLITION CANDIDATES. At an adjourned meeting of the American and Foreign anti-slavery society, held at the church, corner of Houston and Thompson streets, N. York, June 11, Drury and Thomas Morris, late V. B. senator from Ohio, were nominated unanimously as suitable candidates for president and vice president at the United States at the election of 1844.

ABOLITION NOMINATION. The abolitionists of Vermont have nominated a ticket for state officers: Governor, Hon. Charles K. Williams; lieutenant, Paul Dillingham, jr.; treasurer, honorable Henry F. James.

AGRICULTURE. The legislature of New York at its late session appropriated $4,000 per annum for five years for the promotion of agriculture and household manufactures in that state.

AREOL. There are thirteen pair of mill-stones in Akron grinding at this time on an average per day 2,000 bushels of wheat. Thus will probably fall off some in July and August, and taking the average of 6,000 bushels per day, which is low enough, the number of bushels of wheat will be 200,000 bushels, or 20,000 barrels of flour, worth at present prices over $200,000. ANIMAL CRYSTAL. The principles fibrin and albumen, which play an important part in the constitution of the animal body, are now, on the authority of Liebig, stated to be identical. M. Denig has communicated a letter to the academy of sciences, in which Liebig states that he has been able to dissolve fibrin by a moderate heat in a saturated solution of nitre, and the fluid has all the properties of solution of albumen. (Provincial Medical and Surgical Journal.)

ATMOSPHERIC AIR. M. Thillier, a French philosopher, has perfected an apparatus for condensing air, and he states that he obtains a degree of condensation of about degrees below zero. He has announced his intention of liquifying atmospheric air. But according to the London Foreign Quarterly, it is not yet known that this had not already been achieved by our distinguished countryman, Mr. Perkins. He placed a glass tube in the compressing engine under a pressure of thirty pounds to the square inch, and when it was taken out, there was a small globe of fluid at the bottom of the glass, and no appearance of air in the tube. Dr. Wollaston and Dr. Humphrey then considered that the liquefaction of atmospheric air. (Ibid. Jour.)

THE SHIP WILLIAM BROWN. Captain Harris of this unfortunate ship, with seven sailors and a young woman, (Elizabeth Lesford), were picked up at sea by a French vessel, having been six days in the jelly boat after the ship struck the iceberg. Some of the sailors were in the hospital at St. Peter's, having been brought from Boston. They have arrived at Castine. Captain H. had labored for Boston.

COURT MARTIAL. A court martial is now in session at Somerset House, London.

Commander Staubbach, president.
Captains—Shannon, Benson, Grininger, Voorhes, Zantinger.
Commanders—Webb, Delany, Mayo.
Henry S. Alliman, judge advocate.

CROPS. Appearances at present, so far as we have opportunity, promise abundance of grain and fruit. Accounts from the south are not equally favorable in relation to the cotton crop. It is too early to judge of the tobacco crop.

DEATHS during the week ending 31st ult. in Baltimore 35, of which 19 were under 1 year of age, 11 were free colored and 3 slaves. During the week ending the 7th inst. 44, of which 18 were under 1 year of age, 9 were free colored and 5 slaves.

EMIGRATION. It is stated in the New York Journal of Commerce, that 17,500 passengers have arrived in that port from foreign countries, since the 1st of January, of the year 1840 the whole number of passengers which arrived there from foreign countries was 69,757.

FLOUR. The inspections of last week, in Baltimore, comprised 9,136 barrels and 1,077 half barrels. Prices declined in 84 7/8¢ from wheat and 85 cents. At New York, country flour 84 1/2¢, city mill 84 1/2¢, Frederickburg family flour 84 1/2¢.

FARTY ELLER cleared $40,000 at the south. The price of hops is evidently rising in the southern market. (Low Jour.)

GAS LAW. A law for the preservation of gas has passed the N. Y. legislature. It prohibits parades or qualls from being caught or killed from March to September, and woodcock from March till July.

GAS SEWER IN LOS CAJONS. Several inflammable gas accidents have occurred in St. Clair county, near New Hope, says the Detroit (Michigan) Western Farmer, which have excited considerable curiosity. The gas issues from borings made in the earth, without intervention, and may be set fire to by burning with a large and steady flame. Several years ago Mr. Smith discovered bubbles of air rising through the water from the bottom of the Lake. Druggists were soon introduced, through which the gas passed in considerable quantities. One of these tubes has been made to pass up through the floor of the house where Mr. Smith discovered the gas, for the purpose of a large gas escapes through a small orifice, and burns with a steady flame several inches in length. A tube has been placed in the cellar to collect the gas and render it available for domestic purposes. Mr. Smith, who conducted the geological survey of this country, that this gas must proceed from some considerable deposit of mineral matter in the vicinity, and may result from the decomposition of a large mass of which exist in a neighboring marsh. It is a carbonized hydrogen gas, and the same kind is not only found in the decomposition of humus, but also in the decomposition of wood, and in the decomposition of coal, and it is not an indication of coal, but that mineral does not exist in the country. The odor is slightly balsamic and oily.

GOVERNMENTAL NOMINATIONS. The whig gubernatorial nomination in the city of Baltimore, on the 2d instant. Governor Sprigg, of Prince George's county, presided. William C. Johnson, esq. was nominated as whig candidate.

The V. B. convention assembled on the 10th instant. General Tobias E. Stansbury presided. The convention named Francis Thomas, esq. as the Van Buren candidate for governor.

THE GERM. The principle of adapting steam power to vessels of war begins to draw towards the accomplishment of the important object the armed vessels and stores of both the naval architecture and practical engineer. Many experiments have of late been tested, but none with entire success to convert all wood into iron. The idea of building a vessel of iron, and which will take the liberty to draw public attention to the value of the above subject, and the attention of the government to the subject, is a subject of great importance. The United States navy, in his little vessel, the "Germ." This small craft having the following dimensions, arrived at the navy yard, Washington, on the 2d of June.

Length of vessel	25 feet.
Beam	11 "
Depth of water	11 "
Power of engine	6 horse.
Superficial area of floats	1 foot.
Velocity obtained	10 miles per hour.

No doubt that experiments in this little vessel, and the results already obtained are sufficient proof of the entire success of this plan for war purposes. Hoping from this Germ may spring up fair trees, it will be at least a great success.

LOTTERY DEALERS. James Scott, charged with the offence of selling lottery policies a device framed to evade the act of assembly against the sale of lottery tickets, was tried at Philadelphia on the 29th ult. and convicted.

MILL ROBBERIES. After a long and tedious trial, John Briddle, the mill robber, was convicted at Pittsburgh, Penn. on the 4th instant, for three offences—and subsequently two of his gang, Stayer and Corman, came before the court on the 6th inst. for the same offence. The clerk of Briddle. Briddle's sentence must be from six to thirty years.

OIL TRADE. The vessels which arrived at the several New England ports last week brought 18,000 barrels of sperm and 10,000 barrels of whale oil.

OVERDUE. With all the bad reputation incident to omnibuses in the city, it is constantly stated that a well known proprietor on the Broadway route, who commenced as a driver three years since, has amassed $50,000 dollars, and would have made $40,000 if he had not all the time been arrested by the police, and made all his journeys in the proprietor and the customer. Why not abolish rickets altogether, and make the fare up and down 6 pence, cash? Try it. This change, with the abolition of the omnibus, would save the city all cheating. The clock would note the number of passengers who enter the stage, and prevent all disputes with the drivers. (N. Y. Amer.)

PROFESSOR OLIVER, owing to ill health, has resigned the chair of natural medicine in Ohio medical college.

POST OFFICE ARRANGEMENT. The regulations of the British post office in relation to letters and sea letters, and the customs of Europe, allow such letters to be without the previous payment of postage to all the continent of Europe except to Australia, Sicily, and Portugal. The Italian states, including Sicily, Spain and Portugal.

Letters for Sweden and Norway can be forwarded in the manner during certain months in the year, when the packets are running from Hull direct for Gothenburg.

Letters for France, the German states, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, Prussia, Russia, can be transmitted by the steamer, through England without previously paying postage.

PRISON DUTIES SOCIETY. The annual meeting of this society was held at Boston a few days ago. From the report which was submitted we learn that the whole number of county prisoners is about 430, and the whole number of prisoners annually 75,000—of which 30,000 are in the prisons of New York, Philadelphia and Boston. The number of prisoners in the county prisons is about 100 in proportion than the increase of population. The mortality has been only 1 in 56. This calculation includes the prisoners indicted by the grand jury, the whole were 1 to 15. The number of lunatics in the prison is stated at 25, of whom 22 were in the Philadelphia and N. Jersey penitentiaries. The number of annual commitments have greatly diminished in some of the states.

STEAMERS. A London paper mentions that the "British Queen" steamer has been sold to the king of the Belgians.

The London Dispatch says that the steamer President and the Commodore, both of the U. S. Navy, Robert N. W. was a married man, and had five children, who reside in London. He was a native of the county of Cork, and was employed by putting an end to the slave trade in a portion of the west of Africa, when he commanded a brig of war.

SPEECH. Several gentlemen have arrived at St. Louis, in advance of the regular spring caravan from Santa Fe. The Commodore, Robert N. W. was a married man, and had five children, who reside in London. He was a native of the county of Cork, and was employed by putting an end to the slave trade in a portion of the west of Africa, when he commanded a brig of war.

STOCKS. U. S. bank of Pennsylvania has declined again and again at Philadelphia at the close of last week at 30 1/2; Gerard bank at 75.

A SHAW. We saw yesterday the water-wheel shaft for the United States steam frigate Menom, which was forged at the West Point foundry from bars of inches square, made at the Utterton iron works. It weighed, before turned 34,400 pounds. It is now 25 feet 4 inches long and 18 inches diameter, which is as large as the largest ever made, and does credit to the engineering skill of the country.

Tobacco. The demand has declined during the last week in Baltimore; for Maryland, inferior to common No 4 to 50; middling to good 85 to 100; good 85 to 90; fine, 90 to 125; Ohio, sales are quite limited, common to middling 85 to 100; fine 100 to 125; red and wrappery 85 to 125; prime yellow at 87 to 100; and extra wrappery 90 to 125. The inspections of the tobacco in the city of Baltimore, for the week ending 13th, 16th, Kentucky, and 1 bid, Pennsylvania 16 to 137.

TRANSCENDENTALISM is making quite a sensation in some places east of us. Professor T. W. Alexander, of Princeton, in lecturing on the subject in one of the Philadelphia churches, said the U. S. Gazette says that a correspondent of a New York paper has written with earnestness and propriety, the meaning of the word "transcendentalism," which is considerably used at present with reference to German literature and its imitations. He is thus answered:

"Transcendentalism is the spiritual cognate of psychologism, irrefragably connected with convenient adoption of metaphysical speculation and etherealized contention of sublimity conception."

There can be no mistake about the matter now.

TWO PLEASANT EXPEDITIONS are announced in the Cincinnati papers, to start about the first of June, for the purpose of reaching the great city of New York, Mississippi, and all intermediate landing places. The distance is nearly 4,000 miles.

THE WHEELERS are evidently losing their wits, if they ever had any. A few weeks ago a couple of them went into Westport, near New Bedford, where they ought to have known that they would be "hunted" as soon as they were seen; and since that, two more of them, on the same errand, have been "hunted" better than "doomed fish," by running into the New port harbor without one of Mr. Blunt's charts; the consequence of which may be readily imagined. One of them struck the rocks, and the other was obliged to get out of water. He hauled off, however, and went to sea without regret. Great apprehensions are felt along the western coast that he may lose, with a full cargo of fifty barrels of oil on board, without any compensation. (N. Y. Cour. & Enquirer.)

VICTORIA, queen of Great Britain, was 29 years of age on Monday last the 1st June.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The Great Western, steam ship, capt. Hosken, arrived at New York on the 10th instant, in fourteen days from Liverpool, bringing English dates to the 27th, and Paris to the 25th May. She brought forty-two passengers and a valuable cargo.

The President steamer. A steam ship, capt. seen by the Portuguese ship Comde Palma, captain Sabino Antonio de Cabo Almeida, on her passage from Rio de Janeiro to Lisbon, which afforded a glimpse—and but a faint glimpse—of hope to those who had friends on board of the steamer President. The following are extracts from her log-book, as given by the Liverpool Standard of May 26th:

"On April 23, at 4 P. M., in lat. 31.24 N., and long. by chronometer, 40.23 W. of Greenwich, saw a very large steamer under canvas, without showing her colors, or making any signal; the paddle-works were not in motion, nor was any smoke issuing from the funnel. Next morning, the 24th, at six o'clock, saw her again under two square topsails (fore and main) and latten sails, (fore and aft,) steering NNE. The wind was at east, with moderate weather. On the 25th the wind veered to the NW., blew strong, which would prevent our steamer reaching the western isles. The steamer had three masts, of a dark color; not certain as to the color of the funnel. The nearest distance we were to the steamer was four English miles. They showed no signals at all indicative of anxiety to speak to us. She was proceeding at the rate of from three to four miles per hour. She made a good deal of lee way. We did not communicate, but could easily have done so on both days. The NW. wind, which sprung up on the 25th, lasted for five days. We viewed the steamer through a telescope."

The following article appears in this morning's "Times":

Lisbon, May 17, 4 P. M. The following is a transcript from the minutes of the log book of the Portuguese ship Comde de Palma, captain Sabino Antonio de Cabo Almeida, which arrived at this port from Rio de Janeiro, in 50 days, on the 6th inst.—A general hope is entertained here that the vessel in question must be the long missing steam packet President.

"On the 22d of April, at 3 P. M., being in lat. 29° 29' 18" north, long. 40° 28' west of Greenwich—wind at east—saw, at about five or six miles ahead, a vessel whose rig we could not well make out, steering the same course, NNE. The same wind continued throughout the night, with fine weather, but rather a rough sea. Early on the morning of the 23d the same vessel was about six miles on the harbor quarter, when we could well perceive her to be a large steamer under all sail, and making no use of her steam power. At noon, latitude by observation 34° 24' 36", longitude by chronometer 40° 20', she was fast falling to leeward; at 4 P. M., she was scarcely perceptible on the horizon; soon after the wind shifted to NNE, NE, NNW, N, WNW, and W, and blew strong with an agitated sea; this continued until the 3d of May, when the weather became finer, and the wind veered from W to WSW and SW, which brought us to the Tago on the 6th inst."

N. E.—The steamer had three masts; did not show her colors, or make any signal; nor did we show any. She was going on easily with all her sails set, making no use of her machinery, and was using every endeavor to beat to windward, but was making much lee way; the funnel was painted white and had a confused idea that the vessel was painted with a white streak."

The principal discrepancy between the two statements is the color of the funnel. The postscript of the article in the "Times" states the funnel to be white—whereas in the extract of the log given above it is said, "not certain of the color of her funnel."

Remarks by captain M'Lea. Captain Almeida appeared to be an intelligent man, and willing to give every information in his power. I implored of him to state nothing but what was positive truth, and he assured me that all he had said was fact; and he deeply regretted that he knew nothing of the President steamer being missing, or he would have spoken the steamer he saw. On my rigidly examining him, he declared that the steamer alluded to was as large as a frigate. After the most serious and mature deliberation, my own opinion is that there are good grounds to suppose it was the President, and the probable reason for their not communicating may have been that they had previously fallen in with some vessel homeward or outward bound, and transferred their passengers and received supplies from her; and that they were making the best of their way to the nearest port in the Western Islands.

It will be necessary to ascertain where Her Majesty's steamer Dee was on the 23d and 24th days of April, as I was informed at Lisbon that vessel was on her passage home from the West Indies.—When ascertained that it could not have been that vessel, then I am firmly of opinion that it must have been the President, and as they were then in the parallel of latitude where the trade winds commence, it may be many weeks, from the date they were seen, till they arrive at any port.

At the date they were seen, their nearest port was in the island of Fayal, one of the Azores or Western islands, bearing from them per compass, E. N. E. 708 miles.

The President had three months' rations on board when she left N. York, on the 11th of March; moreover her cargo partly consisted of a large quantity of flour. At Lloyd's it is considered extremely doubtful whether the vessel was the President, and it is thought more likely to refer to the Dee steamer, which arrived on the 10th instant, from the West Indies.

The great eastern treaty. This deed which had only received the initials of the five powers has now been fully settled by all five, and most cheerfully by France. So ends that noisy affair.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The principle topic is the great movement in parliamentary tactics and struggle for place and power between the whigs and Tories. It will be remembered that Lord J. Russell introduced a measure to reduce the duties on sugar from 6s. to 3s., and moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the question. Lord Nelson opposed this with an amendment, which after a debate of eight nights, was decided against the ministers on the 18th May as follows—

For going into committee, 281

Majority against ministers, 36

Lord John Russell next day refused to resign and said that he should reserve the great test question of the corn laws for the 4th of June. Sir Robert Peel immediately gave notice that, on the 27th of May, he should move that the house had no confidence in ministers, or in other words, the poor of England are saddled with an extraordinary tax on sugar, of five to six cents in the pound, more than any other people in the world pay for it. The duties on sugar are to remain as before.

On the evening of May 24, the house of commons was filled to an uncommon extent—something was expected. Shortly after five o'clock the speaker called upon Sir Robert Peel. Sir R. Peel arose amidst tremendous cheering, which having subsided, the most profound silence reigned throughout the house. The right hon. baronet said: I rise, sir, to give notice that, on Thursday next, I shall submit the following resolution to the house: "That her majesty's ministers do not sufficiently possess the confidence of the house of commons to enable them to carry through the house measures which they deem of essential importance to the public welfare; and that their continuance in office under such circumstances is at variance with the spirit of the constitution." [The right hon. baronet sat down amidst the most tremendous cheers we ever heard, and which were several times renewed.]

The London Times of the 22d, says that that announcement in the house of commons leaves no doubt as to the intention of ministers to dissolve parliament immediately after the decision of the corn law question, which they intend to make a test. It is for the conservative leaders to determine whether they shall be permitted to carry this intention into effect without impediment. And it is for the conservative people to lose no time in girding up their loins for the approaching contest, and to take such prompt and vigorous measures as will enable them to follow up the series of triumphs which have hitherto rewarded their efforts in and out of parliament, with a signal decisive and universal victory throughout the country. When the battle walt turns to bay the phase is nearly at an end.

Chartist. London May 26. In the house of commons last night, Mr. Duncombe presented a number of petitions one of which was signed by 1,300,000 persons, praying for the release of all political offenders; for a free pardon to Frost, Williams and Jones; and for the adoption of the principles of the charter by the house of commons.

Steam Frigate. The town of Greenock exhibits at present a scene of no common interest. Six large frigates are now being constructed in the town or its vicinity, each of these of about 1500 tons capacity, and carrying engines of about 500 horse power, being part of the fleet of fourteen armed frigates, destined in time of need, to carry out and discontinue the mails among the West India colonies. Four of these are to be supplied by a single firm in Greenock, who deliver the ships, engines and equipments complete and ready for sea.

The queen's birth day came off on the 21st inst. The day was fine. The concourse of people in the park of St. James, was immense. Twenty one guns were fired as a salute, one for each year of her majesty's age.

Joseph Bonaparte. The count de Surville, Joseph Bonaparte, with his son-in-law, the prince de Canino, and his son Lucien, and Messrs. Mallard and Thibaud, secretaries, and a numerous suite, embarked at the Brunswick wharf, Blackwall, yesterday afternoon, on board the Peninsular and Orlean-tal steam navigation company's steamship Iberia, Mr. E. Cooper, commander, for Genoa.

O'Connell has addressed a spirit-stirring letter to his countrymen, in relation to the coming elections, commencing with the quotation:

"Humblest business, know ye not.

Who would be free themselves must strike the blow?"

Emigration. Thirty vessels have sailed from Cork harbor up to the present period, this season, conveying four thousand six hundred and sixty-two emigrants to New South Wales, and across the Atlantic, of these 456 proceeded to Port Phillip, 200 to Sydney, and 16 to Bathurst, New South Wales. Of the total number, 3,981 arrived for America—comprising 474 to New York, 1,010 to Quebec, and 2,497 for St. John's. This enumeration can give no idea of the total amount of emigration from this part of the country, as the steamers weekly convey passengers destined to ship from ports in England; besides that, many vessels sailed from this and the adjoining counties, conveying hundreds of emigrants.

Corn laws. All the manufacturing and commercial towns are holding large meetings in opposition to the corn law, sugar and timber duties. The cities and towns of Scotland are particularly active on the subject; and the forthcoming elections will be the most exciting and important which have ever taken place in England, since the reform parliament. Already many candidates are in the field, in anticipation of a dissolution. Before our next advices from England, or very soon afterwards, parliament will be dissolved and all England in an uproar. There is some talk of bringing Mr. Hume forward to represent Edinburgh in parliament.

Money-market and trade. In London, the bankers were decreasing their facilities, and money was more difficult to be obtained. Many heavy failures had taken place, particularly in the West India trade. The exchanges continued, however, favorable, and was good, somewhat dearer in London than on the continent. This was the result of the dearthness of the currency in England, rather than of an unusually favorable commercial balance.

In the manufacturing districts the gloom and stagnation of business rather increased than otherwise, and working short time, had become more general. The cotton market had consequently suffered a further depression of $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$, with small sales. Many failures had occurred in Manchester. In American stocks there was no set-up. Few transactions had taken place.

London, May 25. Money is again in great demand at the stock exchange, where so much as 6 per cent, is paid for short loans on stock or exchequer bills, and 5 per cent for the 16th of July, the next account day. This being settling day in consols, bankers and capitalists as usual hold back, and thus cause an artificial scarcity of money for a time.

The opening prices of stocks were—consols for money, 89½ to 90, and for the July account 90½; new 4½ per cent, 98½ to 99; and exchequer bills 10s to 10s prem.

[Globe.]

An utter stagnation is now rapidly creeping over every branch of industry, whether manufacturing or commercial, and whether in town or country. All kinds of testimony agree that in this, ordinarily the liveliest period of the year, there never was experienced in the memory of man so general and complete a paralyzation of trade.

Cotton market, Liverpool, May 24. There has been some little improvement in the demand, but the wants of the trade are still on a very limited scale, and upon the whole the market continues without animation, and in prices we have little or no change to notice. The sales of the week amount to 18,040 bales; 300 bags American and 100 Surat being on speculation, with 200 American, 500 Surat, and 150 Pernambuco for export, and comprise 80 sea island at 14½d; 4200 bowed 5½ to 7½; 1750 Mobile, Alabama, and Tennessee 5½ to 7½; 5800 Orleans 5½ to 6½.

We have again to report a moderate extent of business in cotton to day, with a continuance of the dull feeling which prevailed on Saturday. The sales which include 200 bales American and 200 Surat, purchased for exportation, are 3009 bales, without any material alteration from the current rates of last week, although all descriptions are rather slow.

May 25. The sales to-day are 1000 bales.

Liverpool corn market, May 24th. Several purchases have been made of United States flour in bond at 20s for New Orleans, and at 22s at 23s for prime brands.

Liverpool, May 25. A parcel of Odessa wheat order sold at 5s per 70 lb and 40s to 5000 bbls, of flour have changed hands at 20s for New Orleans, 22s for Philadelphia and Virginia, and 23s per bbl, for prime western canal.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur promulgates the law relative to the levy of 80,000 recruits of the class of 1841, and another granting a credit of 2,500,000fr, for the purchase of cavalry horses.

Paris, May 22. The chamber of deputies commenced on Tuesday the discussion of the project decree relative to the extraordinary works which the loan of 450,000,000fr. is intended to defray. In the house of Peers the debate also turned on extraordinary credits, voted for 1830 by the chamber of deputies; and the creation of the eighteen new regiments, attacked by generals D'Jean and D'Ambruge, was warmly defended by general Cuhiers, the minister of war under the Thiers administration.

M. Piscatory one of the doctrinaire deputies who most eagerly espoused the cause of M. Thiers, and subsequently to the downfall of that minister, distinguished himself for his opposition to the cabinet of the 29th October, had accepted a mission from the latter to the Greek government.

La Presse asserts that in a few days a formidable squadron, under the command of admiral La Suesse, would sail from Toulon for the coast of Greece, and that this expedition was intimately connected with the mission of M. Piscatory.

La France states that M. Guizot had applied to the court of London to unite with France in assembling an European congress, but that the British government had refused to accede to his request.

The contents of the Paris papers of Monday, May 24, are of little interest. The trial of Darnes and his accomplices, Dacles and Considers, for their attempt on the life of the king, commenced on that day. There are 68 witnesses, but it is doubtful if the accomplices will be found guilty—the conviction of Darnes is, however, certain.

The comparative failure of the late much vaunted expedition against Ab-dei Kader is ascribed in the Parisian journals to the rashness or want of judgment of the duke de Nemours.

The Texian loan. "La Presse" states, that the issuing of the Texian loan had been received with such general disapprobation and distrust, that the firm of J. Lafitte, which had undertaken to bring it out, and had inundated the country with its prospectuses, was obliged to abandon it. [Standard.]

Private accounts from Paris contradict the statement in "La Presse" newspaper, that the house of Lafitte & Co. have withdrawn from the Texian loan, and, on the contrary, affirm that they are proceeding with it, and are, indeed, bound by special contract to do so. [Times.]

GERMANY.

Berlin, May 8. We are able to give our readers the joyful intelligence that the convention relative to the continuation of the German customs union was signed yesterday, and that several of the plenipotentiaries have already left Berlin to return home.

POLAND.

The emperor Nicholas, on occasion of the marriage of his son, has conferred some favors on the inhabitants of the kingdom of Poland. All persons under sentence of death have their punishment commuted to imprisonment.

SPAIN.

Madrid, May 17. Senor Osoaga has failed to form a cabinet, and the regent has charged count Almodovar with powers to try what he could do. As a cabinet council it had been resolved that the title "highness" should be prefixed to the name of the regent.

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Department of state, Washington, May 24, 1841.

Sir: There are several subjects connected with the foreign commerce of the United States to which the secretary of state considers it to be his duty to call the attention of the president at the earliest opportunity.

The first is, the collection of Sound dues, or the tax payable at Elsinore, laid by the Danish government upon the cargoes of vessels passing through the sound into and out from the Baltic sea.

The right of Denmark to levy these dues is asserted on the ground of ancient usage, coming down from the period when that power had possession of both shores of the Belt and Sound. However questionable the right or uncertain its origin, it has been recognized by European governments, in several treaties with Denmark, since the year 1700, and at as early a period as the fourteenth century; and inasmuch as our treaty with that power contains a clause giving us on the same footing in this respect as other the most favored nations, it has been acquiesced in by us, and has not been denied by us.

The treaty of 1613, between Denmark and Holland, to which a tariff of the principal articles then known in commerce, with a rule of measurement and a fixed rate of duty, was appended, together with a subsequent one between the same parties in 1701, amendatory and explanatory of the former, has been generally considered as the basis of all subsequent treaties, and among them of our own, concluded in 1826, and limited to continue ten years from that date, and further until the end of one year, after notice by either party of an intention to terminate it, and which is still in force.

Treaties have also been concluded with Denmark, by Great Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, Russia, Prussia and Brazil, by which, with one or two exceptions in their favor, they are placed on the same footing as the United States.

There has recently been a general movement on the part of the northern powers of Europe, with regard to the subject of Sound dues, and which seems to afford to this government a favorable opportunity, in conjunction with them, for exerting itself to obtain some such alteration or modification of existing regulations as shall conduce to the freedom and extension of the commerce, or at least to relieve it from some of the burthens now imposed, which, owing to the nature of our trade, operate, in many instances, very unequally and unjustly on it in comparison with that of other nations.

The ancient tariff of 1613, by which the payment of these dues was regulated, has never been revised, and by means of the various changes which have taken place in commerce since that period, and of the alteration in price in many articles therein included, chiefly in consequence of the settlement of America, and the introduction of her products into general commerce, it has become quite inapplicable.

It is presumed to have been the intention of the framers of that tariff to fix a duty of about one per centum ad valorem upon the articles therein enumerated, but the change in value of many of those commodities, and the absence of any corresponding change in the duty, has, in many instances, increased the ad valorem from one per centum to three, four, and even seven; and thus, generally, upon those articles which form the chief exports of the United States, from South America, and the West India Islands, such as the articles of cotton, rice, raw sugar, tobacco, rum, Campeachy wood, &c. On all articles not enumerated in this ancient tariff it is stipulated by the treaty of 1701 that the "privileged nations," or those who have treaties with Denmark, shall pay an ad valorem of one per cent, but the value of these articles being fixed by some rule known only to the Danish government, or at least unknown to us, this duty appears uncertain and fluctuating, and its estimate is very much left to the arbitrary discretion of the custom house officers at Elsinore.

It has been, by some of the public writers in Denmark, contended that goods of privileged nations, carried in the vessels of unprivileged nations, should not be entitled to the same duties as if carried in a vessel of valorem, but should be taxed one and a quarter per centum, the amount levied on the goods of unprivileged nations; and, also, that this limitation should be confined to the direct trade, so that vessels coming from or bound to the port of a nation not in treaty with Denmark should pay on their cargoes the additional quarter per cent.

These questions, although the former is not of so much consequence to us, who are our own carriers, are still in connexion with each other, of sufficient importance to render a decision upon them, and a final understanding, extremely desirable.

These Sound dues are, moreover, in addition to the port charges of light money, pass-money, &c. which are quite equal to the port dues of other places, and the payment of which, together with the Sound dues, often causes to vessels considerable delay at Elsinore.

The port charges, which are usual among all nations whose ports vessels resort, are unobjectionable, except that, as in this case, they are more consequences of the imposition of the Sound dues, following, necessarily, upon the compulsory duty at Elsinore of vessels bound up and down the Sound with cargo, with no intention of making any importation into any port of Denmark, and having no other occasion for delay at Elsinore than that which arises from the necessity of paying the Sound dues, and, in doing, involuntarily subjecting themselves to these other demands.

These port duties would appear to have some reason in them, because of the equivalent; while, in fact, they are made requisite, with the exception, perhaps, of the expense of tolls, by the delay necessary for the payment of the Sound dues.

The amount of our commerce with Denmark, direct, is inconsiderable, compared with that of our transactions with Russia, Sweden, and the ports of Prussia, and the German association on the Baltic; but the sum annually paid to that government in Sound dues, and the consequent port charges by our vessels alone, is estimated at something over one hundred thousand dollars. This is paid by the greater proportion of this amount is paid by the articles of cotton, sugar, tobacco and rice; the first and last of these paying a duty of about three per cent. ad valorem, reckoning their value at the places whence they are imported.

By a list published at Elsinore, in 1840, it appears that between April and November of that year, seventy-two American vessels, comparatively a small number, lowered their topsails betwixt the castle of Cronborg. There were all bound up the Sound to ports on the Baltic, with cargoes composed in part of the above named products, upon which alone, according to the tariff, was paid a sum exceeding forty thousand dollars for these dues. Having disposed of these cargoes, they returned laden with the usual productions of the countries on the Baltic, on which, in like manner, were paid duties on going out through the Sound, again acknowledging the tribute by an inconvenient and sometimes hazardous ceremony.

The whole amount thus paid within a period of eight months on inward and outward bound cargoes, by vessels of the United States, none of which were bound for, or to, the port of Elsinore, is paid in Denmark, except compulsorily at Elsinore, for the purpose of complying with these exactions, must have exceeded the large sum above named.

I have, therefore, thought proper to bring this subject before you at this time, and to go into these general statements in relation to it, which might be carried more into detail, and substantiated by documents now at the department, to the end that, if you should deem it expedient, instructions may be given to the representatives of the United States at Denmark to enter into friendly negotiations with that government, with a view of securing to the commerce of the United States a full participation in any reduction of these duties, or the benefits resulting from any new arrangements respecting them which may be granted to the commerce of other states.

The other subject, which, in the opinion of the secretary, demands the early consideration of the government, is the German association or customs union, established in Germany, and now in successful operation under the leading auspices of the government of Prussia. This important association has its object the union of many of the German states into one body, for the purpose of establishing uniform regulations of commerce; uniform duties of importation, exportation and transit; a system of uniform weights and measures, and a uniform coinage throughout all the members of the association; objects resembling, as we will be perceived, important purposes contemplated by the establishment of the general government of the United States.

In all these states of the association the greatest variety and diversity had previously existed. Each has its own tariff of custom houses, and its peculiar system of duties, constituting them in these respects foreign countries to one another. The effect of these diversities upon trade and manufactures may easily be supposed to have been highly prejudicial to the general commerce of the country.

To Prussia, who had labored for years to bring about this commercial revolution in Germany, chiefly belongs the credit of its accomplishment. She has united the members of the confederation in a treaty which establishes one tariff for all, the duties to be collected on the frontiers of what now forms one great commercial league. The net revenues arising from the duties are divided among the several states in proportion to their respective areas of population, every article, salt and playing cards excepted, having once paid the duties on the frontier, being permitted to circulate freely among all the states of the union without any additional impost.

The association was concluded in 1834, and was to continue in force until the 1st of January, 1842; and, if, during that term, and at latest two years before its expiration, the contrary should not be declared for twelve years more, and afterwards from year to year, it has recently, under the same provisions, been renewed for another term of twelve years. The effect of this confederation has probably been to give to Prussia and Germany a new vigour in the political balance of Europe; but it is principally interesting to the United States in its commercial tendencies, and in the hopes which it encourages of furnishing an enlarged consumption of some of the staple articles of our production, such as cotton, tobacco and rice. The German commercial and customs association comprises an ample territory abounding in wealth, industry, population and resources of every description. The states included in it are

	Population.
The kingdom of Prussia, . . .	14,211,530
The kingdom of Bavaria, . . .	4,515,469
The kingdom of Wurttemberg, . . .	1,649,829
The kingdom of Saxony, . . .	1,169,826
The grand duchy of Baden, . . .	1,277,403
Electorate of Hesse, . . .	704,700
Grand duchy of Hesse, (with Homburg), . . .	807,671

The Thuringian union, . . .	906,000
Free city of Frankfurt on Mayn, . . .	84,000

Total, 26,027,425

It is understood that Brunswick has exhibited an inclination to separate from the northwestern union, at which she was a member, and join the association; and the accession of the grand duchy of Luxembourg is likely soon to swell still higher the total population of the states thus united, which constitutes already the most industrious, enlightened and prosperous people of Germany.

Three of the German states have not yet acceded to the association, but have named a separate commercial and customs union; viz:

	Population.
The kingdom of Hanover, . . .	1,772,107
The grand duchy of Oldenburg, . . .	1,169,826
The duchy of Brunswick, . . .	251,000

Total, 2,289,643

And a few of the states of Germany have neither acceded to the association, nor formed any special union among themselves; these are

The kingdom of Holstein and Lauenburg, . . .	471,278
(belonging to the king of Denmark), . . .	471,278
The grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, . . .	292,523
The grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, . . .	89,528
The Hanseatic cities of Lubeck, Hamburg and Bremen, . . .	245,300

Total, 1,289,229

In the accomplishment of her great political object, Prussia has been compelled to make considerable pecuniary sacrifices, her revenues from the customs being less than before the formation of the association; thus the tolling of war has been gradually lessening, owing to the increased population and prosperity of the kingdom. The attempts made to adjust and compensate this loss have not been successful, but it is believed that the difficulty will be removed by allowing Prussia to levy, for her own exclusive benefit, the transit duties on cotton and other commodities, without any material change in the general system.

The net revenues of the association have increased from about 12,000,000 thalers, collected in 1834, the year of its first establishment, to upwards of 20,000,000, the present amount, exclusive of the expense on collection, amounting to 12½ per cent.—a prodigious increase, and mainly owing to the rapidly increasing prosperity and consequently augmented consumption of the German states associated in the league.

With Hanover the United States has recently concluded a treaty of commerce and navigation, through which it has secured the free trade of the United States at Berlin, which has been ratified. The treaty differs from our commercial treaties with Prussia, the Hanseatic towns and Denmark, by combining the indirect trade to the productions of the kingdom of Hanover and of any other country of the confederation on the one side, and, on the other, to the productions of the United States, and of the South American continent and West India Islands. It gives us the right of carrying to Hanover in our ships the produce of the United States and the North and South American continent and islands, in exchange for their right of bringing in Hanoverian vessels to the United States the productions of Hanover and the countries composing the confederation, and may be regarded as favorable to our navigation.

Several states of the league have manifested dispositions to form treaties with the United States upon a similar basis, but it is not deemed proper, on this occasion, to express any opinion upon the policy of establishing the principle of entire reciprocity in commercial treaties with the minor states of Europe.

One of the advantages already acquired by the negotiation of our minister at Berlin is a considerable reduction of the duties on rice, which, under a resolution of the house of representatives of 11th of June, 1838, he was instructed to endeavor to procure. This important object has been gained, and the consequences, as has been pointed out, are beneficial to all parties. A great increase in the importation of Carolina rice, which too, as has been known, was reduced by a corresponding decrease of revenue drawn from its increased consumption in Germany. The success of this experiment encourages the belief that a like course in respect to other important staples would be followed by similar results.

The tobacco duties, however, arising, as they do, the two-fold purpose of raising revenue and of protecting the culture of the tobacco of native growth in Germany, still finding formidable obstacles in the way of their reduction, it is not probable that the state of the negotiations on this subject up to the session of 1839 and 1840 is sufficiently explained in the correspondence transmitted to the house of representatives with the president's message of the 14th of April, 1841.

Several of the states of the Germanic association have no natural outlet to the sea. Their commerce, therefore, is carried on through rivers the mouths of which open to the ocean in the territories of other powers. This shows the importance of the union in all the states composing it; but as the union itself is not a government, commercial stipulations and conventions must be made with the states of the union in their political capacities. By a paper annexed marked A, it will appear that in March last Great Britain entered into a convention of commerce and navigation with Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Wurttemberg, Baden, the electorate of Hesse, the grand duchy of Hesse, the grand duchy of Baden, and the commercial union of Thuringia, Nassau and Frankfurt; and similar arrangements with these states might probably be accomplished by the government of the United States.

Such being the general nature of the association, and such our commercial intercourse with it, it becomes matter of interest to consider how far our relations with its several members might be beneficially extended, and if it be thought advisable to enter into commercial treaties with them or any of them, it remains to be determined whether powers for such a purpose should be conferred upon the minister of the U. States at Berlin, or some other diplomatic agency; or, if the general object being to seek the means of enlarging the consumption of the staple products of the United States in Germany, and of securing all practicable benefit to their navigation.

There is another part of the subject of our connection with this association, which, though of less consequence than those that have been pointed out, is nevertheless one which deeply concerns the numerous German emigrants who are constantly selling their property to proceed to the United States, as well as the naturalization of the emigrants, and the distribution of property in that country. Throughout Germany the droit d'aubaine and the droit de traction exist in the shape of a tax, payable on the withdrawal from the country of personal property which has been inherited by will or succession, or which forms the proceeds of the property thereof in the same manner. In the United States, as all know, no such tax exists.

It is probable that an exemption from this tax might be obtained on the ground of reciprocity—some of the states have initiated their legislatures to enter into arrangements for that purpose. If there should be no other reason for a formal convention, this particular object might be effected by a simple official declaration, signed by the secretary of state, under the seal of the department, certifying that the subjects and citizens of Germany enjoy this immunity in the United States; upon which there is reason to believe that an alteration in their own laws would be made by the states, or some of them, as to make the rights reciprocal. The form of a declaration, such as it is stated above, has been adopted by the English government, as may be seen by a paper heretofore annexed, marked B. All which is respectfully submitted.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

To the president of the United States.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 9.—[In continuation.] Mr. Clay offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act entitled "an act to provide for the collection, sale-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue," be repealed, and that the committee on finance be directed to report a bill to that effect.

Mr. C. observed that the resolution he had now offered was the use in substance with that now before him at the last session. Its object was a speedy repeal of the sub-treasury system. It was not his purpose to discuss the resolution; indeed, he hoped and presumed that no discussion would be deemed necessary in any quarter, but that the committee would be allowed at once to report a bill.—Mr. C. said he had come to this session of congress with a determination to expedite, so far as he was concerned, the public business, and, in attempting this, to observe the utmost kindness and courtesy toward gentlemen on all sides of the house. He had not the least desire to deal harshly with the feelings of any; and he would take the present occasion to express his deep regret and surprise that casual expressions used by the committee at the last session had been most terribly perverted by the public prints—perverted in a manner and to a degree he never could have supposed possible. In the course of some observations in relation to the sub-treasury, he had said that the world would be astonished and grieved at that measure as attempt to convince a convicted criminal with the rope round his neck that his conviction had been just and right. But the papers had represented him as having compared the gentlemen of the senate who differed from him with opinion with regard to that measure, as a company of conscripts with ballers round their necks. Mr. C. protested to Heaven that nothing could be further from his mind than any such a thought; on the contrary, he had been sedulously desirous of avoiding any language which could wound the feelings of those with whom it had been his misfortune to differ.

Mr. C. was happy in the opportunity of making this explanation, although he felt very sure that it could scarcely be needed by any gentleman of the senate who had been present at the time. This resolution he now offered proposed an immediate repeal of the sub-treasury law. He was ready, however, to use any allusion in the terms of the resolution which he might cause it to conform to the wishes of gentlemen.

Mr. Wright said that he should not interpose any objection of time; if the gentleman from Kentucky would consent so far to modify the language of the resolution as to make it the duty of the committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law in question, Mr. W. would cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. Clay replied that he had not the least objection, and would modify the resolution accordingly. Indeed, this was the more necessary since he believed there were some portions of the law which it might be expedient to retain.

Mr. Calhoun said he must confess his great surprise that a resolution like that which he had now offered. The senate had yesterday, without any opposition, consented to raise a special committee of nine to express the views of the senate on the entire subject of the finance and currency. After that, he thought it due to a larger portion of the people of the United States, and also of the members of the senate, that that committee should take up this matter of the sub-treasury as part and parcel of the general subject committed to them. Before this senate was asked to repeal the sub-treasury law, let it know what was intended as the substitute to be proposed. Repeal involved substitution. Mr. C. presumed that it had been the intention of the senate that the select committee should have the whole subject of currency and finance before them, otherwise it would have been a most extraordinary course to appoint the committee, since the subject would naturally have gone to the finance committee. Now, Mr. C. regarded it as not entirely fair to the American people that a committee should be required to report on the repeal of this single isolated measure of the sub-treasury, without giving the country to understand what substitute was to be proposed in its stead. Let gentlemen come out with their project—a Bank of the United States, or the pet banks, or whatever else it was—so that the senate and the country might see the whole question to be considered. He hoped the senator from Kentucky would not persist in pressing his resolution. Was it fair that those who considered the sub-treasury system as the only constitutional and the only expedient mode of keeping the finances of the government, should be called upon, at once, without opportunity for consideration, to repeal that system blindfolded, without being told what was to follow?

Mr. Clay said the senator could not certainly have been so mistaken as to suppose that he would have employed such language in regard to it. He called for the reading of the paper; and it was read accordingly.

Mr. Calhoun said that he had not heard the modification proposed, and if he had, he should still have objected to the resolution as modified. There was already a special committee appointed to take into consideration the whole subject of a fiscal agent for the safe keeping and disbursement of the public revenue. He called for the reading of the paper, and specifying the duties of the select committee; which was read. Mr. C. said that this resolution certainly embraced the subject of the sub-treasury, which its friends considered as the most perfect of fiscal agents; but could possibly be devised for the ends to be effected.

Mr. Clay. That may be; but was think no such thing. Mr. C. should really have supposed that the senator from South Carolina would have foreborne. He said he had made the best of the resolution. In a large and liberal spirit of concession Mr. C. had at once consented to modify it so as to meet the wishes of the senator from New York, [Mr. Wright], and had put the resolution in a form which he had no objection to have protected as such as the senator had made. As to the position that repeal necessarily involved substitution, Mr. C. differed from the senator entirely. So far from this, if there was to be no substitute order heaven for the sub-treasury scheme, he would have nevertheless repeal it, and that in deference to the declared will of the people of the United States.—But there was no concealment, no mystery intended. Mr. C. could tell the honorable senator, at once, and with all frankness, what he went for, and what he believed his friends who acted with him meant to go for—and that was a bank of the United States. That was the object in view. But as the architect, before he erected a building, first cleared away the rubbish which occupied and encumbered the ground upon which it was to stand, so the friends of a national bank desired first to remove this sub-treasury scheme clean out of the way. Mr. Calhoun had done that; they were prepared to move the direct accumulation of the public money to the treasury, and to the public good. When they had got a clean and fair sheet of paper before them, then they should be prepared to inscribe upon it whatever a majority of the senate should determine to be expedient for the public good. Mr. C. again observed that he had hoped, after yielding at once to the wishes of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wright], the resolution in its modified shape would have encountered no objection.

Mr. Calhoun repeated that the modification of the resolution had not met his ear; but he must still object. He knew perfectly well that the only alternative was the sub-treasury or a bank of the U. S. He was not at all disposed to quarrel with the ground against the one and in favor of the other.—The senator had observed that an architect polled down first and built up afterwards. This was a metaphor, but metaphors did not always turn out to be correct arguments. The position of the senator might be true in architecture, but it was not true in legislation. The mere repeal of the sub-treasury would reinstate the pet bank system. The creation of a bank of the United States would supersede the pet banks. He could not vote for the repeal of the sub-treasury law, especially since the avowal of the senator.

Mr. Clay rejoined. The resolution adopted by the senate yesterday for the appointment of a select committee on the subjects of finance and of a fiscal agent did not cover this matter of the sub-treasury, for the duties of that committee rather looked to an increase of the revenue, but even if it did, this act of repeal was an implied exception. Mr. C. said he most heartily concurred with the sentiment expressed by the senator from South Carolina, that the only alternative before the nation was the sub-treasury or a bank of the United States. Undoubtedly, there was no other alternative. The senator, with great manliness, had admitted this; so had the other senator, [Mr. Wright], on a former occasion; it had always been Mr. C.'s own conviction; and he was not glad to hear the fact so frankly admitted in this quarter. The only alternative, then being a sub-treasury or a bank of the U. States, and the people of the U. States having most decidedly and unequivocally condemned and repudiated the sub-treasury, it only remained that congress should provide in due season a bank of the United States. But this was not a season for talking; it was pre-eminently the season for action. The day of judgment is come, said Mr. Clay, with great emphasis and animation; the day of judgment, I hope, is come—at least to our political world.

Mr. Calhoun said that when he had before remarked that there was but one alternative beside the sub-treasury, he meant to be understood that nothing but a bank of the United States, or the two measures that there was, practically, no other alternative. But there were other alternatives which might be adopted. The pet bank system was an alternative, though, in practice, it was but a name for the sub-treasury, and it differed from the United States. The senator himself had so designated it, and had declared himself content to lodge in it for a year or two. But Mr. C. had always known that it must come to a national bank at last, and the sub-treasury were once abandoned. It was in this view that he had resisted this scheme in 1837, and should continue to resist it in all its stages.

Mr. Rives said he should vote for the resolution, not on the ground that, if the sub-treasury were repealed, the only other alternative must be a bank of the United States. He thought there were many alternatives. The president in his message had indicated several. There were the state banks, there was a United States Bank formerly organized, and there was a fiscal agent which might be marked with a very different character. The removal of the sub-treasury would at least narrow the field of choice. If that should be thrown aside, the senator would have a bank of the United States should be substituted for it. He entirely agreed with the president, that a large majority of the people of the United States had unequivocally condemned the measure, while, at the same time, they had not pronounced their opinion in favor of any other. The senator from South Carolina himself had expressly admitted on a former occasion that the sub-treasury had been condemned by the voice of the nation. So, at least, he was represented to have said; but Mr. C. did not speak from his own personal recollection.

Mr. Calhoun begged leave to correct the senator from Virginia. The statement Mr. C. had made was that, in regard to the sub-treasury, taken as a sole and solitary measure, the people had declared their opposition to it, but then there had not been a greater majority in favor either of the pet bank scheme, or that of a United States bank.

Mr. Rives. I repeat, that the people being confessedly against the sub-treasury, he could see why congress might not, forthwith, proceed to execute the public will. When that was done, the state bank question would revive, and then it would be necessary to consider whether we should hold the public moneys, or whether we should adopt a bank of the United, or should create a new fiscal agent. Without intending, at this time to commit himself to either of the three schemes, Mr. R. was prepared to say that he was not at all disposed to have committed itself, to the repeal of the sub-treasury law.

The question being now called for on the resolution—

Mr. Calhoun proposed to amend it by adding the words "and to report a substitute."

Mr. Clay begged the amendment would not be made; and he called for the question.

Mr. Calhoun demurred the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Clay. The amendment proposes that the finance committee shall report a substitute for the sub-treasury; that is, it totally nullifies the select committee which the senate appointed on the subject of finance and a fiscal agent for the government.

Mr. Woodbury suggested whether it would not be expedient to refer the pending resolution to the select committee instead of to the committee on finance.

Mr. Clay said that the select committee stood on a special and peculiar ground, and the object of its appointment did not embrace that of this resolution; it is thought that they did, but would with pleasure accept the suggestion.

Mr. Walker asked whether the subject was not already before the select committee, and whether the amendment would not defeat that reference?

Mr. Calhoun said his object was to take the sense of the senate whether they intended to act separately on this subject without the other matters connected with it. There were three sets of opinions in the country—one for a national bank, one for the pet banks, and one for the sub-treasury. The object of this resolution had been distinctly avowed; it was the establishment of a national bank. The sub-treasury had just commenced its operations; why not give it a fair trial?

(Mr. Clay, across. Because the people have condemned it.)

It is said there is a majority of the people opposed to it; and so, I believe, there is against the pet bank system, and against a bank of the United States. If the resolution was adopted, Mr. C. did not care to which committee it was referred.

Mr. Walker preferred his reference to the select committee on the currency, &c.

The question was now put on Mr. Calhoun's amendment, and decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Nicholas, Clay, of Ala., Fulton, King, McKelister, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Butler, Fremont, Preston, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mansueti, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Pugh, Rivers, Sumner, Smith, of Ind., Soudard, Tallmadge, Woodbridge—27.

The resolution of Mr. Clay, was then adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the act entitled "an act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer and establishment of the public revenues."

On motion of Mr. Clay, so much of the president's message as relates to the subject of the finances was referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Rices moved that so much of the president's message as relates to foreign affairs be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Buchanan hoped the senator would defer that motion for a day or two; he desired to pay particular attention to the late correspondence between the British minister and the present secretary of state. His impressions were very different at present on the law of nations from those of that distinguished gentleman. He did not know that he was correct in his views, and if, on examination, he found that he was not, he should most cheerfully yield his opinions.

Mr. Rices assented.

On motion of Mr. Huntington, so much of the president's message as relates to commerce was referred to the committee on commerce.

Mr. Preston submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president of the United States communicate to the senate the causes which led to the sailing of the United States squadron from the Mediterranean, and the return of the Brandywine, together with such official correspondence connected therewith as in his opinion is necessary to be improper to communicate.

Mr. Sevier submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform the senate of the general officer Arthurcke has been removed from his command at Fort Gibson, west of Arkansas, to Baton Rouge, at Louisiana, where there are no United States troops.

And then the senate adjourned.

June 4. The senate was called to order at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Sevier, on his request, was excused from attending on the committee on private land claims. He asked for the substitution of his colleague, Mr. Fulton, in his place.

Mr. Clay, from the committee on finance, reported a bill repealing the sub-treasury law. Bill read twice and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Clay asked that it be read a second time now. Mr. Wright objected. It was, after some brief explanations between Messrs. Clay, Wright and Calhoun, by general consent, made the special order of the day for twelve o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. Young presented a memorial of citizens of Illinois, for a bankrupt law, and a memorial for confirmation of land titles. He asked for the printing of them.

Mr. Clay objected. He strongly deprecated the introduction of ordinary business, and he wished to check it at the outset. He hoped that the senator from Illinois would withdraw his request until next session, when the petitions would be presented again.

Mr. Young accepted the suggestion, and withdrew his motion to print.

Mr. Tallmadge presented memorials for a bankrupt law.

Mr. Linn suggested that it was desirable that a resolution should be adopted, totally excluding all business except on the subjects named in the message. Such a resolution had been adopted at the commencement of the extra session in 1837.

A brief discussion followed on this subject, between Messrs. Clay, Berrien, Choate and Huntington, and the whole was by agreement deferred till Monday, to give time for the preparation of a resolution.

The senate adjourned at half past twelve, to meet on Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

June 7. The bill reported on the 4th by Mr. Clay, from the committee on finance, to repeal the sub-treasury act, being under consideration.

Mr. Clay rose and said he had only a word or two to offer way of explanation on the provisions of the bill, and on the consequences which would result from its passage into a law.

The first section contained the repeal of the sub-treasury act. Should that repeal take place, the sub-treasury, by the law of 1836, would be the finances of the country, would be this; it would under the operation of the law of 1789 establishing the treasury department, under the resolutions of 1816 as to the medium receivable in payment of the public debt, and under the law of 1836 establishing what was familiarly called the pet-bank system; (but this last law Mr. C. proposed by an amendment to repeal.)

The second section of the bill contained the repeal of the act of the sections of the existing sub-treasury law with a slight alteration adapting its provisions to the present changed state of the country, and containing a new principle. Under the law as it is before said, embarrassment of the public money is the case; but in its practical application, difficulty arises. A public officer neglected to pay over at the proper time the balance in his hands; a demand of the money was made by government, and the officer raised; and the question arose whether he should be prosecuted or not; or could not be prosecuted for embezzlement? To obviate this difficulty hereafter, the present bill provided that the refusal of an officer under such demand shall be held to be prima facie evidence of embezzlement, unless the individual shall be able clearly to show that the refusal was unaccompanied by any unlawful intent, he shall be subject to all the penalties provided in another part of the bill against those who embezzle the public property.

Mr. C. went on to observe that should the bill pass in its form as reported, the consequence would be the revival of the act of 1836, establishing the state bank system. He supposed, however, there was no disposition on any side of the house to revive that system—a system which had been found in practice so very inconvenient, and which would now be still more so from the changed circumstances of the country and of the banks. By that law the secretary was prohibited from making any deposit of the public money in any bank which did not pay specie on demand, and also in any bank issuing promissory notes under the denomination of five dollars; a prohibition which, if enforced at this time, would exclude him from a large majority of the banks of the whole country. Mr. C. said he did not introduce a section repealing the act of 1836, because he cherished the confident hope that should the bill pass into a law, it would speedily be followed by a bill providing for a large majority of the United States, or for some competent fiscal agent, such as should furnish to the people that which, of all things, they now wanted most, a sound and uniform currency. It might, however, by possibility, happen, though he could scarce anticipate such a thing as in the least likely to occur, that no such bill might be passed, or, at least, not for a month or six weeks perhaps, during which interval this law of 1836 coming up in revived form might operate exceedingly to embarrass the secretary of the treasury in conducting the fiscal operations of the government. With a view to avoid both contingencies, viz: either of no bill's passing, or of its passage being delayed, Mr. C. had prepared an amendment to come in as a third section of the bill in the words following:

And be it further enacted, That all of the act entitled "an act to regulate the deposits of the public money," which passed on the 25th of June, 1836, except the 13th and 14th sections thereof, and the act supplementary thereto, approved 4th July, 1836, entitled "an act supplementary to an act to regulate the deposits of the public money," passed 23d

June, 1836, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; Provided, That this repeal shall not affect or impair any securities which may have been taken for the safe-keeping of the public moneys deposited with any of the banks in the said act mentioned, nor any remedies to enforce the said securities which have been, or may hereafter be, prosecuted.

By this section the whole of the act of 1836 would be repealed, save the two sections which provide for the deposits of the surplus funds in the treasury with the several states; this provision, he presumed, was to be considered as of a permanent character and need not be repealed.

Mr. C. added he did not mean to say one word on the policy of the sub-treasury system, or attempt to reargue that question; and if he had not misapprehended the temper and disposition of the senate, gentlemen on all sides of the house were so little disposed of this as he could be. Out of respect to the country, to the senate, and to himself, he should resolutely abstain from again entering on a question which had been already sufficiently argued, and needed no redress now. In saying this, he hoped that no offence would be understood. He intended to the feelings of any gentleman; it was one of those cases which would sometimes occur when a difference of opinion took place between the members of the senate, and the members of the house, and the amendment of the people at large.

The amendment having been read—

Mr. Calhoun said that if he had rightly understood the object of the senator in proposing this amendment, he would have been in a dilemma. He would have been obliged to state the difficulties and restraints imposed upon the secretary, in consequence of changes which had taken place since the passage of the law of 1836. Certain banks which could at that time be made the depositories of the public money, the law had been passed, and the changes and of the prohibitions in the law, precluded at this time from being so used. If this was his object, he might get it at much more easily by simply moving to repeal so much of the law as contained those prohibitions. The law had been passed, under a thorough and general conviction that it was wrong to have the entire treasury under absolute executive control, and for the express purpose of taking the public money from under that control, and placing it under the expenditure of the law. But now it was proposed to undo all this, to retrace our steps, and repeal the law. And on what ground? Why, that in a few weeks a law would be passed establishing a bank of the United States; so that, if that act should pass, the entire public moneys would be left, as it was before the passage of the law of 1836, under the absolute disposal of the executive! [Hear Mr. Clay give signs of dissent.]

The gentleman shows his head. Under what control then will it be?

Mr. Clay, under the law of 1789.

Mr. Calhoun. Well, I will go back most cheerfully to the law of 1789. If that is the meaning of the senator, let him move an amendment, (or if not, I will do it), declaring that the law of 1789 is hereby revived. It declares that the revenue shall be received in gold and silver only, and shall be kept by the treasurer of the United States.

Mr. Clay said he never had alluded to the subject of a metallic medium, or of any manner in which the coins of the United States were to be paid. He had merely said that should the sub-treasury law be repealed, the contrary would operate the law of 1789, under the resolution of 1816, and the law of 1836 unless that should be repealed. What he meant to say was, that under the principles now revived, as to the powers of the president, the act of 1789 would be repealed, and complete security to the treasury till a new law should be passed.

Mr. Calhoun said that, as to that, the law of 1789 was as much in force in 1836, when the law was passed to regulate the deposits, as it was now; and yet president Jackson had advised that the public money was left absolutely under executive control, and that this state of things ought not to continue. Did gentlemen now propose at one blow to undo what it had cost such strenuous efforts and so much precious blood to accomplish? (He agreed upon.) And on what ground? Simply because the part of the law of 1836 would, at this time, impose inconvenient and embarrassing restrictions. Well, if that was the case, why not simply repeal so much of the law as imposed such restrictions? (He agreed upon.) And on what ground? Simply because the senator wanted to go back to the law of 1789, it was what Mr. C. himself earnestly desired. But his object now was to record his objections to the amendment as proposed; and with this view he demanded the yeas and nays.

And they were ordered by the senate.

Mr. Clay asked the senator from South Carolina to recall to mind what were the assertions of executive power advanced by general Jackson and his friends in 1836. The removal of the deposits in 1836, taken in connection with Geo. Jackson's alleged right to remove any secretary of the treasury who opposed that policy, was the sole length of making a secretary of the treasury the mere creature of the executive will. This doctrine Mr. C. and those who then acted with him utterly and strenuously denied; and he desired it still. The power assumed by President Jackson over the public money and over the secretary of the treasury was without law and against law, and wholly arbitrary and tyrannical. But he would not now revive that discussion. Under such principles, the treasury was the absolute property of the executive. The whole doctrine and the whole proceeding was against the law; and he had no doubt, could the question have been brought before a judicial tribunal, the secretary might have been convicted before any court in the country. Mr. Clay had considered the law of 1789 as always in force; the union of the purse and the sword was in the face of that law. These had been their principles then, and they were their principles now. If opposite principles, indeed, presented at this day, as they had in 1836, if there were now any danger of the removal of the deposits by the executive mandate, and the repetition of the specie circular, then it might be dangerous to repeal this law of 1836; but such was not the case; and if the law of 1836 were repealed, the law of 1789 would immediately revive, and in union with the resolutions of 1816 would prescribe the duties of government in relation to the public money.

Mr. Benson went into a review of some of the circumstances which attended the removal of the deposits in 1833. He adverted to the strong language then employed by those who opposed that measure, declaring that the public money was in the lawless possession of the executive. He reminded the reader of the repeated messages of President Jackson, inviting congress to regulate the subject by law, and then referred to the enactment of the law of 1836, and the effects of that law; but what was proposed now? To repeal the law by a stroke of the pen, and to leave public treasure in the lawless custody of the executive? As to the law of 1789, it had been just as much in force in 1836 as it was now, yet these gentlemen then preached, from day to day, that the money was in the lawless control of the president. Mr. B. contended that, even if the law of 1836 were repealed, it would regulate the custody and management of the public treasure. But it was said that there was no need of the law now, because those in power held principles which would prevent them from any improper use of the public money; they were a different sort of people; and therefore they needed no law to regulate their conduct. This, Mr. B. said, was the very first time, during the twenty years he had had a seat in that house, that he had heard such a doctrine brought forward. It was the first time he had heard that the removal of the deposits made a difference made between men in the making of the laws of the land; that laws were necessary to govern one set of men, but not another; that the principles of one set of public officers were so pure that they needed no laws to govern them. He called upon the senate to put the brand of its reprobation upon doctrines like this. He should, at all events, record his dissent from them.

Mr. Calhoun said it was not his purpose to go as large into the argument. He only wished the senate to understand that it was now proposed, without the least necessity, to return back to that state of things which preceded the passage of the law of 1836. He had himself differed from general Jackson in fact, with regard to the removal of the deposits; but he must do him the justice to say that it had been his deliberate opinion that, when the public money lay in the banks of the States unregulated by law, they were in a strange condition. In confirmation of this position, Mr. C. called for the reading of an executive message calling the attention of congress to this subject; [which was read accordingly].

In conformity with this recommendation, the law of 1836 had been passed almost unanimously; yet now an amendment was proposed which went to put back the public money exactly where it had been before, giving the president discretionary power to say in what bank it should be kept, and when and whether it should be removed. The removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, general Jackson himself claimed no power beyond this. The pretext he had already stated, but the whole difficulty could be removed by repealing the 1836 re-employment law which created certain disabilities which would now operate very unconsciously. Under this view, Mr. C. would move to amend the amendment by striking out all but the enacting words, and inserting as a substitute the following:

"That so much of the 5th section of the act of 23d June, 1836, as provides that no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall after the 4th of July, 1836, hold any note or bill of a less denomination than $5; and that no note or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States which shall, after the 4th of July, 1836, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than $5, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

This would meet the whole objection, without leaving the public treasure at the executive control. Mr. C. said all recent objections to the law would not continue to leave the treasury at his disposal for two days, much less for a month or six weeks. The senator from Kentucky, indeed, said that the law of 1789 would be still in force. Nothing, certainly, would gratify Mr. C. more than a return to the provisions of that law; it might very truly be called a sub-treasury act; it declared that the public funds shall be kept by a treasurer, and received in gold and silver only. But, by what process he would not now say, that law had become a dead letter. Could it be revived, nothing would gratify Mr. C. in a higher degree. But he would ask gentlemen if all which had passed to-day on this subject did not go to prove that, as he had at first imagined, the sub-treasury law ought to remain in force till some substitute or it was provided? If light, in architecture, do very well to take down one building before you laid the foundation of another, but this did not hold in legislation. The sub-treasury law, if it was to be repealed, some other measure could be agreed on? Could it be from personal feeling?—from party triumph? Why re-ignite the purse and the sword after so loudly denouncing that union?

The executive order of Mr. Calhoun having now been read at the secretary's table—

Mr. Rice addressed the senate. The effect of the amendment proposed by the senator from Kentucky would be to nullify, to a great extent, the law of 1836, and to leave the treasury in the custody of the executive. One was the requirement to collect the revenue in gold and silver, and the other to place the money thus collected in the custody of executive agents. But was not the effect of the amendment of the senator from Kentucky to leave the sub-treasury law, at least to one of these odious features? It gave the personal custody of the public treasure to executive officers. Mr. R. here reverted to the objections which had been urged against this state of things, and to the danger to the country, and to the passage of the law of 1836. The law of 1789 was as much in force then as now. And where did it place the public treasure? In the custody of the treasurer of the United States. And who was he? An executive officer removable at the pleasure of the president of the United States, and exercising the privilege of selecting, according to his own discretion, the depositories where the money were to be placed, and where so placed they were held to be constructively, in the custody of the treasury itself. And what guaranty had the country for the safe-keeping of funds so disposed of? None but the treasurer's bond of $150,000. Who could consider the public funds safe under such a security? If at least there was a stronger security than this.

Mr. R. insisted that the proper course at this time was simply to repeal the sub-treasury law, and then stop till they could agree upon some one of the several measures which had been suggested for the removal of the deposits. There were at least three to choose out of: first, the state banks; secondly, a bank of the United States on the old plan; or, lastly, a new fiscal agent. For his own part, he believed that the people of the United States would ever prefer to see the public money kept in the state banks, provided they were restricted to such as paid specie, to having them put under the discretion of the executive. There were many banks which still continued to redeem their notes, and to pay down the currency to desire now only to put down the sub-treasury law, but, by the same blow, to prostrate the state banks, and any other fiscal agent; so that nothing should remain to be adopted but a bank of the United States. Its long and arduous task would be to adopt the amendment proposed by the senator from South Carolina, and surrender the measure he had proposed, and to which there were so many serious objections.

Mr. Mangum thought there was in the senate some ground for disagreement on this matter; gentlemen seemed disposed to look at it rather as disbelievers than in that point of view in which it would be looked at by the people. He thought there was no real difference between the views of the committee of finance and those of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Rives). If the sub-treasury should be repealed, the country would be thrown upon the law of 1836; but the provisions of that law were such that scarce a depository could be used of all that were in the United States. Of the fifty banks of New England, there was scarce one that did not issue bills under the denomination of five dollars. It was, therefore, a new question of conversion, during the short period between the repeal of the sub-treasury law and the adoption of a substitute; for they did not mean to stop at the "half-way house." They desired the establishment of a bank of the United States; but, if that could not be accomplished, they did not suppose they had no intention of adjourning without placing the public money under the custody of law. The inference, therefore, was not to be drawn, that there was any idea of abandoning the principles contended for in 1836. The question was, whether they should abandon the law of 1836 for a few weeks, till a final law could be agreed on, or should leave the secretary of the treasury to struggle with all the embarrassments which must befall him should that law be revived? A short time would settle the question; and then, if no bank of the United States, or other fiscal agent, could be agreed upon, the public money must be placed in the state banks, subject to regulations to be provided by law.

Mr. Calhoun said that he did not understand the political discussions of the last ten years, till the repeal of the law of 1836 would not place the nation in the very condition which the whig party had so loudly and strenuously deprecated. He did not suppose that the whig party, as the senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Mangum). It appeared to him that it would be far better for the whig party to fall back on the law of 1836, than to allow the public deposits to be at the discretion of the executive order of a single day. After all that had been telling the people of his district for ten years past, he never could consent to adopt the amendment proposed by the senator from Kentucky. He would prefer even the continuance of the antislavery law to the loss of the property of the nation, and the sword. He had great respect for the opinion of his political friends, and was disposed to defer to it when he could without a sacrifice of principle, but he could not follow their lead in a measure so dangerous.

When the deposits were removed, the whole American people united in the demand to have them placed under the regulation of law, and it was in consequence of that demand that the law of 1836 had been passed. If the law of 1836 were now repealed, it would be put in its present form, save a large portion of the banks did not now pay specie; but he would rather after the law so as to allow the public money to be placed even in such banks than have it left to the discretion of the executive, for he would say where it should be put and when it should be withdrawn. He was in favor of allowing time for further deliberation; the subject was more complicated than some gentlemen imagined. He would rather revive the law of 1836, than leave the public money for thirty or sixty days at executive discretion. When the United States bank was rechartered in 1816, the law of 1789 was repealed, and new directions were given for the control of the public money. But it was not until 1836, that in 1836 was not a repeal of the law of 1816, but a nullification of it. Mr. B. said that if he was forced to vote now, he must vote for the amendment of the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun). He differed from some gentlemen of the whig party in their opinion at present the simple repeal of the sub-treasury law. He did not believe that the people of Louisiana had so much distrust for banks as some people imagined.

Mr. Preston said the only real question was one of time. He agreed that it was proper the public treasure should not be left without the control of law; and there was but little difference as to a further step, viz: whether it should not be put under further control by the president of the United States. It had been considered, in the discussion of 1816, that the state of the public money was not safe, though they were still under the law of 1789. He presumed, that if, whether then or now, it was proposed to re-enact the raked law of 1789, there would be a general if not an universal objection to it. The general direction to a treasurer to receive and keep the public money was not a sufficient regulation of it from executive control, so long as that officer might himself be removed by the president. The law of 1789 was passed by an unusually large majority; it was passed in response to calls from the executive; and though not intended as a permanent provision on the subject, it was at least better than the law of 1836. Acting on the principle that the law was should be left with great caution. None of those on his side of the house intended to leave the public

Mr. Sevier said that he should be gratified had the resolution been sufficient to pass without such remarks as called him out in explanation of the facts of the case to which the resolution referred. He had no wish to make any statements here which might be considered of a personal nature, but if the president of the United States or his secretary of war had a right to disgrace a military officer of high standing and long and useful public service, and congress had no right to inquire into the matter, all he would say was, that this was the first time he had heard such a doctrine. He was himself no military man, and professed to know but little as to the rights of the army. But there were some things so plain and palpable as to strike all minds of common sense, on the mere presentation of them, as being wrong, opposite and tyrannical.

Gen. Arbuckle had been in the west for twenty years. His military command embraced the whole of the posts on our western frontier, and he had conducted himself in it in such a manner as to satisfy all the people of the country. He was tried by the army, but, since the 4th of March last, he had been removed from Fort Gibson and sent to Baton Rouge, a post where there was not even a single company of soldiers, and where he had no duty to perform. He had not been ordered to Baton Rouge, but his military rank he should supercede a government favorite in command there, (col. Worth); but he had been sent substantially into exile at Baton Rouge. Why was this? Why was a brave and veteran officer of 25 years' service, and who had been 10 years in the army, to be publicly disgraced in his old days, and this without reason assigned? Why, he asked, was such an order issued? Mr. S. himself resided on the frontier, and was in circumstances to know in his private and personal capacity the true reasons which had led to such a measure, however, which he had no hope to obtain from the department, even should the resolution be adopted. Mr. S. had been told by an officer of the government to whom he had applied, that gen. Arbuckle had been so long at Fort Gibson that it was time he was removed to make room for others. If, indeed, that principle was to be carried out in the case of other officers in the same region, he might believe there was some truth in it. But why must it be applied only to a single officer, and to an officer to whom all the people of that country had full faith; who, by his firmness, vigilance and prudence, had kept that frontier in peace and quietness, notwithstanding the action of government had collected there so large a body of troops, and so many soldiers? Why was he removed from his post? The true reason was because the course he had pursued, though eminently beneficial to the U. States, had been against the interests of John Ross. To gratify John Ross, the government had opened a route to a brave, vigilant, veteran officer, and sent him into exile; sent him to a post where there was a sergeant and not men enough to make a company, while it had put into his place a junior officer, (gen. Taylor), and that entirely against Taylor's will and every feeling of his heart. For Mr. S. well knew that he would be the very last man to seek any elevation for himself at the cost of the wounded feelings of a brother in arms. It could not be that he had been removed simply because he had been long at that post, for Brady and Atkinson had been as long, and longer at theirs, and yet were not removed. Mr. S. wanted to see whether the secretary of war, out of mere favoritism, could, at his sovereign will and pleasure, remove a military officer into exile. If he could, it was time that the army should know it. Mr. S. knew gen. Arbuckle well, and was his personal friend, although he had not seen him for the last two years, and scarce heard from him in that time.

Mr. S. said, that he was tired of his disgraced without a cause, and not raise his voice against such oppression. He was astonished at the remarks of the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston). Congress had no right to inquire. He was members of the states end of the people to have padlocks on their lips! It would be hard putting a lock on his mouth. He wanted to see the secretary's reasons; he meant the public reasons, the reasons openly assigned, for, as he truly said, the object of this movement, he feared that those could not be got at by any congressional inquiry. Here was an officer of 60 years old, with locks bleached white in the service of his country, who had not performed a single post duty that was not approved by his fellow citizens; who had watched over their safety and kept the whole frontier in quiet; and most he was disgraced to gratify John Ross! Mr. S. had reason to believe that John Ross was to be gratified in another respect. To please him, the post at Fort Gibson was to be withdrawn from the Indian country, that Ross might be left at liberty to stay and slaughter every Indian chief who had signed a treaty which he disapproved. He, however, would not say a word against John Ross. He would give this phrase to the secretary in broken doses, intending to reserve what he had to say on that matter to a future occasion.

Mr. S. observed, in conclusion, that he had hoped to have spared the pain of making this speech. It was in the mission in the military office of the friends of the administration could, if they pleased, stifle all inquiry. If gen. Arbuckle was to be disgraced, he had no power to help it, but he should do his duty in this case and there leave it.

Mr. Preston spoke in reply. To the merits of the individual case he would not refer, but he would speak, for he knew nothing of the facts, but he submitted to the senate and to the candor of the gentleman from Arkansas himself, whether it was a proper and becoming thing for the senate to call upon the officer at the head of the army publicly to explain the reasons of every military order given by him to a subaltern. An officer, after being many years at a particular post, was transferred to another post; Mr. P. must object to calling for the reasons, military or other, on which every order was issued.

Once establish this principle, and every officer removed against his wishes from one part of the country to another would be entitled to have that removal made the subject of legislative inquiry.—Whereas it might be judged proper that an officer who, by long remaining in one command, had formed many associations, and who was known, perhaps, to entertain different views of military policy from those embraced by the government, whereas it might be judged proper that an officer of a different or distant post, he would consider himself as having a right to make his appeal to congress.—Against this Mr. P. should set his face.

The senator from Arkansas considered gen. Arbuckle as disgraced by being transferred to a different command. Mr. P. could not understand it. That officer had accepted his commission under the known condition that he was to go wherever the government might deem his services most conducive to the general good, and far be it from Mr. P. to consider him disgraced whenever the government in his case exercised this right. It might be a sufficient ground for his removal that he had been so long in one particular spot that many interests and possibly many prejudices had grown up around him and associated with his personal opinions. He might have views, in which views the government might not coincide. But if on this account the officer considered himself injured, his rights and his honor infringed, there were military tribunals open to him, to which he might apply for and obtain redress. The slightest touch upon his honor might immediately be examined into by a court of inquiry. But Mr. P. did not, and could not, understand that because a transfer might be disagreeable to an officer, it injured him. English obedience was the first duty of a soldier. Was it disgrace to be sent to Baton Rouge. Had every officer who was sent there an immediate right to apply to congress? But this call for reasons came with no good cause from the honorable senator from Arkansas, whose party friends held the doctrine that no reasons were to be demanded or given even in the case of removals from civil office, and who had steadily refused to give such reasons when officially called upon. Mr. P. said he did not make it a point with any peculiar reference to this case, but on general considerations of propriety and decorum. Should the resolution be agreed to, and the senate call upon the president for the reasons of this military order, the president might perhaps say in reply, that it was a matter which lay exclusively with the executive, and that he did not choose to give any answer to the inquiry. Mr. P. should not like to see the senate placed in such a position, and therefore did not think it proper to say more for the present.

The morning hour being now expired, Mr. P. called for the order of the day.

Mr. Clay said he hoped he would move to lay the resolution on the table.

But Mr. Sevier claimed the floor. The senator from South Carolina had appealed to him in candor to say whether the senate had a right to inquire into the reasons of every military order. Certainly it had. In this free country the military was as yet subordinate to the civil power. The senator had asked whether gen. Arbuckle was disgraced by being sent to Baton Rouge. Most certainly he was. He had been removed from an extensive and important command, and transferred to a petty post, where there were neither troops nor garrison. The senator had said that he could give no answer. But that could not be except from a court of inquiry? The order of which he complained was in its form according to law, and, sooner than make complaint at such a tribunal, gen. Arbuckle would cut his throat. The senator had said, further, that the party to which Mr. B. belonged had refused to give reasons for removals. Yes; and what was the doctrine insisted on by the senator and his friends?—That the demand for reasons was of right, and that the refusal to give them was of right, and that of the late administration. Now, it seemed, the case was altered. But Mr. S. would not prolong the discussion; he would content himself by calling for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered by the senate; and then, on motion of Mr. Mangum, the resolution was for the present laid on the table.

Mr. Clay moved the printing of 1,300 additional copies of the report of the secretary of the treasury on the state of the finances.

Mr. Woodbury wished Mr. C. to delay this motion for the present as he wanted to make some remarks upon that paper.

Mr. Clay wished he would take some other opportunity, and would, in the meanwhile, suffer the order to be postponed by the yeas.

Mr. Woodbury said that he considered the motion to print as presenting a very appropriate occasion for the offering of remarks upon the document.

Mr. Clay. We will afford the honorable senator five or ten minutes.

After some further conversation—Mr. Clay said he would not press his motion to-day.

Mr. Rives advertising to a desire expressed by Mr. Buchanan some days since for further time to examine the 85th order of intimation, and the correspondence between the secretary of state and Mr. Fox, said that it had been his desire to call on the motion to print that correspondence to-day, but not wishing to interfere with the order of the day, he now gave notice that he would call it up on Tuesday next, in conformity to-morrow.

The senate then passed to the order of the day, which was the bill to repeal the sub-treasury. The question being on the following amendment moved by Mr. Calhoun:

That so much of the 5th section of the act of 23d June, 1836, as provides that no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall, after the 4th of July, 1836, issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than $5, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that no note or bill of a less denomination than $5, be received in payment of any debt due to the U. States which shall, after the said 4th of July, 1836, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than $5, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: so amended.

And he further enacted, That all of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," which passed on the 23d June, 1836, except the 13th and 14th sections thereof, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d June, 1836, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That no repeal shall not affect or impair any securities which have been taken for the safe-keeping of the public moneys deposited with any of the banks in the said act mentioned, nor any remedies to enforce the said securities which have been, or may hereafter be, provided.

Mr. Rives rose to move to the amendment.—The senate having adjourned on his motion yesterday, he would now briefly submit an explanation of the motives which had induced him to make that motion. He had not intended to call the attention of the senate to this subject at first moved by the senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) or the substitute for that amendment moved by the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun). They presented to him these alternatives:—That the act of 1836, moved by Mr. Clay, should be repealed, and the deposits of 1836 should thereby be repealed, the country would be thrown back on the original law passed in 1789, establishing the treasury department, which directed that the public money should be kept by a treasurer of the United States; and also upon the resolution of 1816, which declared in what manner the public dues were receivable. With this result Mr. B. was not satisfied; the practical effect would be this. Under the general direction of the treasury to keep the public moneys, that officer would adopt one of two courses; either he would avail himself of the depository under the existing law, which stripped the sub-treasury of its agents and of its specie requirements, or he would select a new institution, and would select the banks which should receive and retain the public funds in their possession. In other words, the entire amount of the public treasure would be placed at the absolute discretion of an individual officer. As Mr. B. himself said, it was with him, when he acted had protested against and opposed with all earnestness such a state of things, he could not acquiesce in an amendment, which would bring it back on the country.

The amendment of the separator from S. Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] contemplated, not the repeal, but the preservation and the continuance of the act of 1838—divesting it, however of the disabilities which it bore, and which, for the purpose of the bill, were to be removed, which would be a necessary step to make any deposit of public money in banks issuing bills below the denomination of five dollars, or in banks not redeeming their notes on demand, specie. This amendment would have left the currency of the country in the hands of the banks in 1838, in a modified shape. Now Mr. B. had been desirous to examine this law, and ascertain whether, in the changed condition of the country, since the passage of the act of 1838, it was still feasible to carry a practical operation, provided no bank or other fiscal agent should be established by congress at its present session. It had been suggested that a difficulty would be experienced in carrying out the law, if banks which were in a state of suspension, although, on the other hand, it had been stated many banks in different parts of the country still continued open, and that the bill would not be able to carry out the provisions of that law, and that these were situated at those important commercial points where the collection and disbursement of the public money would be required.

Mr. B. was not contented with founding on these representations a deliberate act of legislation; and on examining the law for himself, he found in it a provision calculated to remove the difficulty which was alleged to exist on this score, for the first section of the act provided that if the secretary of the treasury could not find, within a given district of country, a specie-paying bank issuing no bills under five dollars, he might resort to some other district where such bank did exist, and might make arrangements with it to issue bills in the name of the district where he wanted to make his deposit, and might use such office as his depository. This met and removed the objection, and the country would then be left under the act of 1836, so far modified as to permit the secretary to employ banks issuing

It would, however, in all probability, be unnecessary to adopt either of the amendments proposed for his hope and belief was, that but a very brief interval could intervene after the repeal of the sub-treasury, before congress would provide a substitute for it, for the senate would recollect that the chairman of the finance committee, when reporting the bill now before the senate for the repeal of the sub-treasury law, announced this as being but the first in a series of fiscal measures to be reported by that committee.

Considering it to be a fact that the opinion of the American people, clearly and fully expressed, required the prompt repeal of the sub-treasury law, and viewing it as the duty of the senate forthwith to proceed to that repeal, he was not willing, in the exercise of his official duty, to propose any other substitute, that the public treasure should in fact be, or should even seem to be, under the discretion or control of an executive officer. Upon the whole, he was content, after the sub-treasury should have been repealed, to leave the subject of the sub-treasury, as it now stood, without any modification, but with the express understanding that, should congress fail to adopt any substitute in the shape of a bank or fiscal agent, then the senate would advise promptly the repeal of the law, under the changed circumstances of the country, should the law be repealed.

This was Mr. B.'s view of the matter. He came here instructed by a large majority of the people of his district to put an speedy an end to the sub-treasury law as might be consistent with just legislation; and then to lend his aid in providing a substitute for the same. He was not to be a mere bystander, he was called was to him a thing perfectly indifferent, provided it would perform the duty of an efficient fiscal agent, by furnishing a safe depository for the public money, facilitating the transfer of the funds of government, and by exerting a salutary and beneficial influence on the currency of the country. If he must speak comparatively of the relative value of the objects to be effected by such an agent, each would oblige him to say that his constituents would be more interested in the substitution of an immediate to operate on their national credit, namely, its influence in rescuing the national currency from its present state of degradation. The duty thus required by his constituents Mr. B. was ready to discharge whenever the opportunity should

Mr. Calhoun said that he was not sure he understood distinctly the position taken by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Berrien.) If he rightly comprehended the position he had assumed, it was his intention to vote first against the amendment to the amendment, and then against the amendment itself, thereby leaving the law of 1836 unaltered.

Mr. Berrien here re-stated his position.

Mr. Cuthbert said that he had no unmodified amendment. If the gentleman would vote for Mr. C.'s amendment, it would remove the disabilities in the law of 1836 as to banks not paying specie and banks issuing small notes; but if the gentleman would vote against both amendments, and leave the law as it stood, then, when the sub-treasury had been repealed, the banks would be enabled to issue money by the secretary just as he pleased, and the law would, in all probability, never be modified. Mr. C. said he had moved his amendment solely in reference to that which had been moved by the senator from Kentucky (Mr. May). He was, indeed, in favor of the amendment, but he had not moved it because its discussion had shown that that gentleman rightly understood what would be the operation of a repeal of the sub-treasury. He had been obliged to admit that the country would than be in the law of 1836, and he hoped the question would be taken up by the amendment in their order, and he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALKER said that the yeas and nays having been ordered, he was constrained to state the reasons which should govern him in giving a vote different from that of his political friends. The question was not to be decided by the majority, and if no substitute should be provided, it was about to re-establish the state bank system. Mr. W. was opposed to the repeal, for he greatly preferred: the present system, and he would not have it provided; but he was fully aware that a powerful minority, now commanding a majority in both houses of congress, was utterly opposed to that measure, and he could not doubt its repeal would take place. He was not, therefore, in favor of the amendment, but, what substitute was to be provided? The very last he (Mr. W.) was willing to adopt was the state bank system. To this he was utterly opposed, and he had opposed it from 1835 to 1838, and it was the only measure which he had administered up to that time from which he had disassociated. His constituents, with a full knowledge that he did so, opposed it, had elected him to the assembly, and he had no objection to their opposing the measure from that time to this. He had voted against the law of 1836 on two grounds: first, because it contained the distribution principle, and, secondly, because it established the state bank system. He had at that time recognized the fact that that system would explode and fall. When again elected, he had again announced his opposition to the system, and had said that there was no other measure which he would support, and which he should not prefer to it. What was the opinion of the people of Mississippi with regard to a Bank of the United States might be doubtful—but he was fully satisfied that the great parties in that state were utterly opposed to the establishment of state banks as depositories for the public money. As their representative, faithfully reflecting their opinions, he never would give his vote to reestablish the state bank system. He would not vote for what he was now called to vote for; for it could not be concealed that if he voted against the amendment proposed by the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), he voted for the reestablishment of the system.

Genlman had told the senate that it would not leave the public treasure at the discretion of the president for a single day: he would tell them that, by the aid of his vote, that treasure never should be placed under the control of state banks for a single day. He had said that he would not be one of those, on some points, he still had confidence in his integrity, but he had no confidence whatever in the integrity of the banks. He was utterly unwilling to give a vote through which the bank deposit system, its credit, its popularity, resting on the solid ground of the land, should be destroyed. He believed it to be the worst system ever had been devised—the most corrupting system that the wit of man could invent. It caused the banks to erouch like menials at the foot of the executive, and it placed in the hands of the executive the power of creating and destroying banks, not rather, than human folly, ever before contrived. Genlman was so very much opposed to executive discretion that, although they admitted they had no doubt some substitute would be adopted for the present, he was not at all disposed to let the public money be subject to executive discretion for a single day. He would tell these squeamish genlmen that if they continued the law of 1836 they would leave that treasure at the control of executive discretion, and at the mercy, but for a single moment, of the president. He would tell them that rather, Mr. W. called the attention of the senate to the Mr. W. called the attention of the senate to the fact that the secretary must, in the first place, call upon all the backs of the country to show him their hands; they would form him the amount of stock; their circulation; and their liabilities; and then, when all these reports

Mr. W. called the attention of the senate to the 4th section of that law. They would find that the secretary must, in the first place, call upon all the banks of the country to show him their hands; to lay before him their amount of stock; their circulation and their liabilities; and, in a word, their entire condition. And then, when all these reports it was an improvement on the section to make a refusal by a depository to pay over public moneys in his hands prima facie evidence of the embezzlement of the money.

His thought gentlemen could not but perceive, at every step, that they had begun at the wrong end. The proceeding threw every body into the most preposterous circumstances, and ought to be a warning to gentlemen on the other side to see where they were and begin anew. As to the fiscal agent or instrument proposed to be established, which could live in this District, it could live elsewhere also, for the same cause of the constitution which forbade the establishment of a bank in the District, forbade it in every fort, garrison, arsenal, powder magazine, and every other territory, for ever all these the United States had exclusive jurisdiction. If it could live in the District, it could live in all these places, and the senate might place such an institution in each one of them and then turn round and laugh at the constitution.

Mr. Calhoun said that the great difference between himself and Mr. Walker was, that the latter did not consider the bank of the United States as the last alternative to be adopted. He viewed the pet bank system as only a temporary, and in that opinion the gentleman would stand alone on that side of the house. It was not then surprising that, if the sub-treasury must be repealed, that gentleman should for a bank of the United States rather than for the pet bank of the United States.

Mr. Walker denied that he said that he would, in any alternative, vote for a bank of the U. States.

Mr. Calhoun reminded him that he had said there was nothing he would not prefer to that pet bank. If the senator did not vote for the bank of the United States, why would he vote to put the country into a state still worse than that? Mr. C. believed that nine-tenths of the people of the United States considered a pet bank system, if enforced by law and subject only to executive control, the very worst possible state of things. Mr. C. was sorry to state that the probability was very great that the sub-treasury law would be repealed. If that should take place and the act of 1836 should also be repealed, then the senate would be pushed into a place where it must choose between a bank of the United States and a pet bank system unregulated by law. Every body knew Mr. Calhoun's deep aversion to the latter of these alternatives, but he must still consider a bank of the United States more to be deprecated. It was with him the last possible alternative. He submitted to Mr. Walker whether the senator from Kentucky [Mr. Clay] was not one who understood the game he was playing, and saw with great clearness that the pet bank would lead. That senator proposed the repeal of the law of 1836; and would the senator from Mississippi play into the hands of one who openly avowed his preference for a bank of the U. States? Mr. C. again insisted that the vote of the United States was the wrong end, and that the same bill which proposed to destroy the sub-treasury should contain a substitute to be adopted in its room. In fact, the difficulties were becoming so great that gentlemen must come to that.

Mr. Walker said that he did not choose either to be misunderstood or misrepresented by the senator from South Carolina.

Mr. Calhoun said that he was sure the gentleman did not support him of wilfully misrepresenting him.

Mr. Walker said that he did not. The gentleman from South Carolina had said that if he preferred a bank of the United States to the pet bank system, he would stand alone on that side of the house. He could tell that statement to be true, and he stood alone. That threat had no terrors for him, and would exert not the slightest influence upon his vote. If he stood alone here, he should not stand alone in his own state. An overwhelming majority of the people of the United States held the pet bank system as the very last alternative within the limits of the constitution. There was no constitutional measure that they would not prefer to it. It had been their curse. It had been established in 1831 against Mr. C. and he stood alone in the Jackson democratic party in Mississippi. It not absolutely alone, he had certainly been nearly so, and so he had stood in 1836, when he voted against the system, and the senator from South Carolina voted for it.

Mr. Calhoun said that he had unquestionably preferred a regulated system of state bank depositories to a bank of the United States.

Mr. Walker responded that he did not presume to say what had influenced the vote of the honorable senator. All he said was, that there stood that senator's vote on record to favor of state banks by the side of Mr. W.'s own vote against them. His opinion had then been recorded (although he stood alone in his party) that the state bank system would explode. He was now asked to change his opinion, but he could not do it. Nor had he ever changed his opinion, whatever might have been the case with other gentlemen.

The senator then said that Mr. W. preferred a bank of the United States; but he did not choose that the senator from South Carolina should put words into his mouth which he had not used, or alternatives which he had not intended. The senator would not permit Mr. W. to do so to him, nor could he himself submit to it. He had made no such statement, nor would he consent that it should go out to the country that he had. What he had said was this, that he understood the president as recommending the state bank system as equally condemning a bank of the United States, and had suggested as a substitute for both a fiscal agent which should not be a bank, and seemed to prefer its establishment in the District of Columbia. Mr. W. had then added that though he preferred the sub-treasury to the other systems, yet he would take such a fiscal agent as the president recommended in preference to the state banks, and if the alternative were presented to him, would vote for it. Because he was opposed to a bank of the U. States, must he therefore vote for state banks? He was opposed to them both, and could not vote for either.

The senator from South Carolina had warned that the motion for a repeal of the law of 1836 came from a politician who understood his party, and who was avowedly in favor of a bank of the United States. It might be so, but Mr. W. would not on any question, much less on a question of interest and mightily important as that of the currency, ask who introduced the measure, but the measure was. He should be regulated by the merits of the motion, and not by the quarter from which it proceeded. The senator from Missouri reminded him that the clause of the bill prohibiting the issuing of the public money was equally to the state banks. Well, if so, could it not then substantially repeal the state bank system? For those banks paid interest for the public moneys for the purpose of loaning them out again. If the senator from Missouri was correct, then there was no difference between himself and Mr. W. except this, that the one voted openly against state banks and secretly for them; while Mr. W. went both openly and secretly against them in fact.

Mr. W. then said that if the sub-treasury and the law of 1836 should be repealed, then the public moneys would be under no control of law whatever, but thus he denied. They would still remain under the glorious law of 1793, which required the general assent of all government officers and officers. Without any particular means of knowing different from those possessed by other gentlemen, Mr. W. cherished strong hopes that, if both the sub-treasury and the pet banks should be put down, the country would be benefited. He pronounced a law of 1793, instead of putting the public moneys in any man's hands whatever. Mr. W. was for throwing that officer on his high responsibility, but he never should, by Mr. W.'s vote, be forced upon the employment of state banks.

The question being now taken on Mr. Calhoun's amendment to the amendment of Mr. Clay, it was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 23, nays 22.

The question then recurring on the amendment thus amended, was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 19, nays 23. [For the yeas and nays on these questions, see pages 228, 229.]

Mr. Young, of Illinois, proposed to amend the bill, by inserting the words "neglect" before the word "refuse," in the clause making a refusal to pay over public moneys to the order of government prima facie evidence of embezzlement; which amendment was accepted by Mr. Clay, and adopted by the senate; and in this manner was proposed to amend the bill in such a manner as to provide that if an agent of the government, previous to his refusal to pay over the public money, should put by property out of his hands by assignment or other conveyance, that act should be pronounced a felony and subject him to all the penalties of embezzlement.

Mr. Clay said he could not agree to this amendment. He thought it pushed the principle rather too far. To declare the fraudulent conveyance of property a felony was going beyond any law with which he was acquainted, and there might, besides, be many cases where the fact of conveyance would not be proved.

Mr. Young observed that the case was of very frequent occurrence, at least in the west, and some punishment ought to be provided for it. If gentlemen would not declare it felony, would they think that it should be held as a conspiracy to defraud the United States?

Mr. Houghton admitted that it was very desirable to prevent such frauds, but the courts were open, and he thought would provide a sufficient remedy. At all events, he could not consent to declare a fraudulent conveyance felony.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. Benton moved the following amendments: And provided further, That the following sections and parts of said bill shall be excepted from this repeal and shall remain and continue in force, to wit: Section 19 and 20, except the first, second, third, and fourth of the 19th section as making it felony in disbursing officers and persons connected with the post office department to use the public money for their own or other purposes; and a neglect or refusal to pay over public moneys on demand or to transfer or disburse them shall be prima facie evidence of an embezzlement of the same.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Bank of the United States, formerly called the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, and its branches and the local banks and agencies owned by it, shall not be entrusted with the collection or safe-keeping or transfer or disbursement of the public moneys or any part thereof.

And he said that the question be divided, and that a vote be taken on each question by yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the senate.

The item with regard to the Bank of the United States at Philadelphia having been read, Mr. Clay said he would rise in declining to offer all the disclosures that had recently been made, that he should deprecate as much as any gentleman could do the employment of that bank by the government at a depository of the public funds. He had estimated the major sum as much as three years ago that the government was cut loose from that institution from the period of its charter by the state of Pennsylvania. But still he could not consent to the adoption of such an amendment as that proposed. If the senate were to declare its disapproval of the management of a particular bank, there were many others, such as the Owl Creek bank, &c. which might with equal justice be included in the denunciation. He did not, however, consider it as competing with the dignity of the senate to enter upon any such course of discrimination, and he hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. Benton admitted that other banks had behaved very badly but the case of this bank stood distinguished from all others. It had originally come into existence under a charter from the U. States, and the eyes of foreigners were in a peculiar manner fixed upon it. Mr. B. proceeded to speak with much warmth against the course of the bank generally, and especially on its bringing upon itself the last suspension by an unheeded and an unwelcome endeavor to break the New York banks. He accused it of having plotted the suspension in 1837, and as being in effect the only obstacle to a resumption of the specie payments by all the banks of the south. They had recently made an effort to resume, but this bank had actually run upon them and forced them to return to a suspension.

Mr. Bayard admitted the culpability of the bank, but opposed the amendment as unnecessary, because the law of 1836 expressly prohibited the government from employing any bank which did not pay specie.

Mr. Woodbury, in reply to this, explained the connection of the law by the treasury department. When that department had funds to deposit, and no bank could be found which conformed to the provisions of the law of 1836, the department considered itself thrown upon the previous law, and used that law at liberty to select any bank. In no special paying banks. What else could it do, unless it threw the money into the streets?

Mr. Dixon said he should vote against the amendment, not because he thought it improper to refer to individual banks, but especially because this bank assigned as one cause of its suspension the hard treatment of the United States government.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young.

NAYS—Messrs. Barlow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Houghton, Humphreys, Mangum, Miller, Moreland, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Summons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, of Louisiana—25.

Mr. Trumbull said that in that clause of the bill which made a refusal to pay over money to the order of the government prima facie evidence of embezzlement, as violating the great principle of criminal law, that every man is to be held innocent until he is proved to be guilty. It might so happen and orders of the last house of representatives shall be considered as the rules and orders of this house."

To which amendment Mr. Adams had heretofore offered the following amendment: After the words "house of representatives" insert the words "excepting the 21st rule, which is hereby repealed." (This rule excludes the reception of abolition petitions, &c.)

And the question being on the amendment to the amendment, Mr. Underwood said he was somewhat indifferent whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), prevailed or not. He, (Mr. U.) thought that, in all probability, it would be proper to allow gentlemen from the north to discuss this question of the right of petition. He was willing to meet them, and to give them his views on this subject, as he had wished to do some years ago, but at that time he was cut off by the previous question. He did not think debate could be prevented, and he was willing to accept the consequences of it now, as well as at any other time. Indeed, as a southern man and a slaveholder, he was desirous to see the position which northern men intended to occupy clearly laid open. He, for one, was afraid of it. And were he would take occasion to say that he was in favor of the resolutions read by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), the other day did not fairly present the question. He thought, however, that the house should treat petitions on their merits, and on their merits, and should assign its reasons for the rejection of such petitions; and a few years ago he, (Mr. U.) had proposed to assign upon the record reasons why petitions for the abolition of slavery, coming from the north, should not be received, he was willing to see which those petitions had been treated here, and the use which politicians had made of them, had led to the supposition that the people of the north were insulted—were treated with disrespect; and, in consequence of this, indignation was excited against the proceedings here; when, if the true state of the case had been made known, there could have been no ground for such an inference. The standing rule of the house always required the member presenting a petition to give a brief statement of the contents of the petition; upon that statement of facts it was that the house acted; and he wished the people to be informed that, instead of being treated disrespectfully, their petitions were acted upon on principle; and he would be glad to adopt such a standing principle which would show the reasons why these petitions should not be received. It was not his wish to go into a general discussion; he thought that, if that were done, the house would be kept week after week debating the question, to the detriment of the great matters of public concernment in reference to which they had been called together.—And, for his own part, for the purpose of avoiding that discussion, he would sooner consent to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and receive the question for discussion at some future day. The debate, if once entered upon, would not terminate for weeks; and he hoped, therefore, that all the members on different sides of the house would restrain their inclinations to discuss the question. The time, the occasion which convened them, the business before congress—all these considerations seemed to him to be so many strong arguments against giving into the general discussion.

As to the amendment proposed by himself he would say a single word. The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wile), allowed the committee ten days. The effect of his, (Mr. U.) proposition, if carried, would be to reduce the committee in point of time, but to adopt the rules and orders of the last house until the committee should report; and that he conceived was the only difference between his proposition and that of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Wile. I will accept the gentleman's proposition as a modification of my own.

Mr. Underwood then proceeded to state some facts, illustrative of the correctness of the opinion expressed by him the other day, and which he now repeated, that there was a necessity for a radical change in the rules of the house. He instanced especially the cases, first, of time lost at a former session in merely compelling the attendance of the members, which he demonstrated to have been nineteen days. Secondly, the time lost in the discussion of preliminary arrangements in the distribution of subjects among the appropriate committees. And, lastly, the excess of assaults and batteries. He had, in the course of his experience, heard language of the most offensive character applied by members to each other—language which his mouth should not utter. He had seen assaults and batteries committed in this house right under the nose of the speaker, and in no instance had the party offender been made accountable for his conduct. Heretofore, in such cases, the house had attempted to act under the broad pr-liamentary law of Great Britain—a law which was not specific, which did not define the offence, nor prescribe the punishment; and the consequence was, when the house came to apply it, they found they could do nothing at all. The committee to be appointed to consider the subject should be appointed. The house must legislate; it must define the offence and prescribe the punishment; and when that was done, the house would have a plain rule of action before it, and would not be left at large to the uncertainty of the future. The present case. This, in his judgment, was a most important matter; and he did wish that while the rules were under investigation the committee might take charge of this subject also. If something was not done, we should witness the same scenes here again that we had witnessed heretofore.

Mr. Wile said: Sir, when I consented this other day to take the question upon this resolution, in the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), I was informed that he had, probably, no remarks to make on the subject, and I certainly had no desire to debate it, but wished to avoid all debate. My wish now is, to adopt the rules and to proceed in business; but the gentleman has some delicate business to do, and I will compel me to do it, to them, which I will do briefly, though reluctantly.

The gentleman says that this 21st rule, to reject abolition petitions upon their presentation and a denial to give their contents, is the standing rule of the last administration, and that either that administration was the tool of those whigs who offered and supported it, or that those whigs were the tools of that administration.

Now, I declare that the gentleman has not the shadow of foundation in truth for this assertion. There is no evidence, no data upon which to base any such assertion; and it is the mere creature of a blind, bigoted, prejudiced imagination.

The history of this 21st rule is simply this. I know it well, for the proposition from which it sprung was drawn originally by my own hand. I was taken sick, and a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), the only gentleman who proposed to give a brief statement of the contents of the petition and offered it to the house, and he accepted as a substitute for it from my friend from the Montgomery district in Maryland, (Mr. Johnson), the measure as it now stands in the form of the 21st rule, was drawn up by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Johnson) and myself, without consultation, advice, or concert with any member of the then administration party. I will not go back and trace this rule from the first movement, in 1836, to lay the question of rejection of abolition petitions upon the table, but content myself with the contradiction only of the declaration that it was an administration measure. It is true, however, as stated by the gentleman, that this rule was passed by the majority of the members of the present administration, and a minority of the whigs—a minority composed of all the southern or slaveholding whigs, except some four or five, perhaps, and one whig gentleman, (Mr. Proffitt) of the non-slaveholding states, to whom I now return my sincere thanks.

But the gentleman meant to go further than to say merely that this rule was an administration measure. He meant, doubtless, to have it inferred that it will be an administration measure to have this rule repealed; and, indeed, if the gentleman meant any thing, he made an appeal direct to the whig majority now here from the non-slaveholding states to rescind it. Sir, I know not when the gentleman will be able to get the administration party to rescind his cabinet or to resign his office here. But, if he means the president of the United States and his cabinet, I here undertake to say that that gentleman has no authority for advancing the repeal of this rule as a measure of the present administration. Indeed, I know that no man is opposed to the introduction of this disturbing topic here than the present chief magistracy. And what authority has the gentleman for applying this to be an administration measure, when the present secretaries of state, representing Massachusetts here in the cabinet, pledged himself to Virginia from her capital that her institutions should not be touched by him—that this delicate subject should be left where it was, and that the members of the constitution, untouched, undisturbed, unengaged by him and those who acted with him in the north. If by an administration measure the gentleman means that the majority of non-slaveholding whig members, combined with a few from the south, will repeal this rule, I confess that as to that I am not so well or so fully advised.

We shall see. But, if they do, it will badly comport with their professions and pro-pretensions before the election that they were not of the abolition party in the north, and that they were not of the abolition party for the first time, declared to be a measure of the last administration; and this repeal by this administration will not contrast well in the south with the adoption of the measure by the last administration. But until I am convinced otherwise, I will not distrust the whigs of the north on this subject. If the rule had never been adopted, I would hardly ask them not to adopt it for the first time, but I, not having been adopted, I confidently trust in them not to repeat it.

The gentleman says it should be rescinded because it is a case of the south against the north, to oppress the north. Sir, I am sorry to see an assertion like an unfounded in truth as it is sectional in feeling. The south against the north? If any such proposition be true, the truth is rather that it is the north against the south, to oppress the south. No, sir, I beg pardon of the speaker if a few distant fanatics in the north against the south—unsupported, unsubdued, disconcerted by the virtue and intelligence and patriotism of the north. Fanatics, few and insignificant in numbers, but potent in fact, in truth, in wealth, in arms, in the pulpit, in the press, and in the schools—frowned upon by the great majority in the north for agitating this most dangerous topic of abolishing our southern institutions, of applying the brand of the incendiary and the knife of domestic war to the sacred institutions of the south, do we of the south threaten or attack? Are we to be said to be against the north, to oppress the north, merely because we prevent dangers to ourselves and desire to protect ourselves from the attacks of the gentlemen who say that it is against the north to oppress the north, because nine petitions out of ten coming from the north are not received under the operation of this 21st rule. Sir, if this be so, and because nine out of ten of the petitions come here from the north, the petitions for the abolition of slavery in this District and the south. I defy the gentleman to show an instance of a respectful petition from any quarter rejected, unless it was one praying for the abolition of slavery. But the gentleman read only "resolves of the legislature of Massachusetts concerning the denial by the United States house of representatives of the right of petition," declaring this rule to be "a palpable violation of the constitution of the United States, a bold denial of inalienable rights, and stretch of power which can never be quietly submitted to by a free people;" and protesting against it "as being void in its inception and of no binding force, they assert the right of the people to petition, and to have their petition, however mistaken in their views or insignificant in number, to petition congress for a redress of grievances, or what to them may seem such; and that congress is bound to receive all such petitions, and to give them a respectful and deliberate consideration." &c. By the bye, sir, I do not know how these resolves ever of the sovereign state of Massachusetts came to be placed upon our journals of the last congress. They do not belong there under any circumstances, and the petition for the abolition of slavery, were hardly respectful to the last congress, and were exactly such resolves as should have been excluded from a place in our printing. But, this aside, they are not true in fact or argument.

This 21st rule does not deny the right of petition on any subject; and congress is not bound to receive all petitions praying for a redress of grievances, or what to petitioners may seem such, and to give them a respectful and deliberate consideration. These resolves, like the opinions of many on this rule, are founded on an ignorance of the operation and practice of our rules in congress, and in a failure to understand the relation of the rights of petitioners and the rights of legislators. The right of petition to congress is guaranteed by the constitution, by the provision of the first article of amendments—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Our rules require a member to rise in his place to present a petition, and to make "a brief statement of the contents thereof, verbatim." At present, the statement of contents, and hearing, of course the question of reception arises upon every petition. The 21st rule declares that "No petition, memorial, remonstrance or other paper praying the abolition of slavery, &c. shall be received by this house, or entertained in any way whatever." The rule you observe, sir, prevents the reception of abolition petitions, or their being entertained by the house, by a whig or a slaveholder, but does not prevent their presentation for reception, or their hearing, by stating their contents. And the question is, whether the whig majority in the north, who are the authors of this rule, are to be said to be against the south, to oppress the south, merely because they prevent dangers to themselves and desire to protect themselves from the attacks of the gentlemen who say that it is against the north to oppress the north, because nine petitions out of ten coming from the north are not received under the operation of this 21st rule.

These resolves, like the opinions of many on this rule, are founded on an ignorance of the operation and practice of our rules in congress, and in a failure to understand the relation of the rights of petitioners and the rights of legislators.

The right of petition to congress is guaranteed by the constitution, by the provision of the first article of amendments.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

Our rules require a member to rise in his place to present a petition, and to make "a brief statement of the contents thereof, verbatim."

At present, the statement of contents, and hearing, of course the question of reception arises upon every petition.

The 21st rule declares that "No petition, memorial, remonstrance or other paper praying the abolition of slavery, &c. shall be received by this house, or entertained in any way whatever."

The rule you observe, sir, prevents the reception of abolition petitions, or their being entertained by the house, by a whig or a slaveholder, but does not prevent their presentation for reception, or their hearing, by stating their contents. And the question the rejection of abolition petitions. He would say that he was most happy for two years to be surrounded in that house by a majority of the members of congress who sustained, both by their speeches and votes, the rule now proposed to be rescinded, and he would be most happy if the present congress would do as the last one has done. Why change the rule in question? He saw no good reason for it. An apprehension prevailed at the period to which he had referred that its adoption would create great excitement of the north; but he would ask if it had had that effect. And he appealed to northern men and to the public journals to prove that it was without foundation. He would ask if it had not been productive of good; if there had not been less excitement than in years, and whether any thing had not gone on in peace and harmony, both in and out of congress, on the question of the abolition of slavery? We all know that before the adoption of the twenty-first rule congress had been perpetually interrupted, day after day, by efforts to introduce a resolution to receive petitions on the subject of abolition. He objected to agitating this question again, and he would tell gentlemen that they might bring it up again and triumph for a season, and sport with the feelings of southern men, but that a reaction in the public feeling would take place as was inevitable as that the tides of the ocean would ebb and flow. Whilst now all was quiet, whilst all was peace, they might think that they could make mischief, but they would ask themselves if they should attempt it, that moment would they re-create an excitement, both in and out of these halls, which every lover of peace and harmony must deprecate. And it would be found that in proportion to their numbers would grow the opposition to such a measure become stronger in denouncing any interference with their rights. The whole south would be found meeting as one man on this question. We have been called here to dispose of grave and serious subjects, and not to excite the question of abolition, and, therefore, it was useless and unnecessary to interfere with the twenty-first rule. Did the president of the United States say one word in his message on the subject of abolition, directly or indirectly? Not a word. Any, but the first step taken on this floor was contrary to the recommendations in the message. It was then entirely foreign to the purposes for which congress had been specially convened.

The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Underwood), had remarked, in the course of his speech this morning, that a feeling of indignation had been gotten up in the country in regard to the presentation of abolition petitions to congress. Now where, he (Mr. W. C. Johnson) would ask, was this feeling of indignation? He knew not. The action was, at this moment, in the enjoyment of the utmost tranquillity and repose. It was, too, looking with the most anxious solicitude to our proceedings, in order to see what we were going to do. Any, but the first step taken on this floor was contrary to the recommendations in the message. It was then entirely foreign to the purposes for which congress had been specially convened.

Mr. Adams here asked for reading of the letter. Mr. W. C. Johnson resumed. He had not the letter in his possession, but as a fact he would say that the executive had written a letter to the effect which he, (Mr. J.) had intimated. He therefore was desirous to clear his skirts of any charge that he was either directly or indirectly an instrument in this matter. It was true, he had taken towards that distinguished individual to say thus much in his vindication. If this house, the grand institution of the nation, should undertake the responsibility of acting on this question, and of throwing open the doors to a flood of abolition petitions, they would do it better than to couple the name of the executive with it. As he had already said, he offered this resolution on the subject of abolition petitions which became the 21st rule, and he rejoiced that he had done it. Having advocated it, he would do so now, because he had seen no reason to change his opinion as to the propriety and correctness of the course which he thought it his duty to take.

He did not think it proper to discuss the whole subject again, which had been fully and elaborately argued on a former occasion. The chief motive by which he had been governed in offering his resolution was to throw oil upon the troubled waters, and the result of its adoption was to produce peace and harmony to the house. We had not witnessed those angry scenes here since, which had induced a whole delegation of members representing a portion of the south to withdraw from this body in order to devise and commit upon what course they should take to defend the rights of their constituents. But repeated this resolution, and what might he do, he would not need to forestall. He would, however, predict that no good would come of it in any portion of this union—no beneficial results to any interest of this wide spread confederacy. Rescind this rule, and endless agitation will be the consequence, and the excitement would be no great as to retard the despatch of the business which had called us together, and thus we might be sitting here till near the meeting of the regular session. He was, for all these reasons, opposed to rescinding the rule, because he wished congress to go on and dispose of the various measures which the country was most anxiously waiting to have disposed of as speedily as possible. He would vote to retain the resolution, and let the consequences fall upon those who were for rescinding it. He would invade this house, and more especially his whig friends, to pause and anxiously and deliberately reflect before they commenced a course of action which would lead to re-bate their petitions, and then, in order to show to enlarge upon this occasion, but in order to show what had been the proceedings of this house upon the question, he would ask its attention to the yass and nays which had been taken on the subject, and he would read the proceedings in rescinding the house, in the years 1835-6. [Here the clerk read them.] His object in having the yass and nays read was to show that the principle had been adopted to reject abolition petitions, and that, too, on the subject of rescinding the rule. He would read the statement throughout the country, and in the national councils.

Now, rescind this resolution, and we should then have the same excitement that was witnessed here before its adoption, and then, in order to show a motion to receive an abolition petition was laid on the table by a vote of 176 to 37, and Mr. Adams laid off in the affirmative. After referring to what was the opinion of the framers of the constitution on the subject of rescinding, Mr. J. resumed that he thought with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), that all abolition petitions ought to be rejected, because we have not the power to act on the question. In the course of his remarks he had dropped a sentiment which he would like to repeat, and that was, that men, which required a little qualification. He would say, however, that there are some men at the north who, although not partaking of the excitement, which ought not to exist here, on the subject of abolition, nevertheless press it in opposition to the feelings of the south, rather than come in contact with the violent abolitionists of their own districts. But, for the purpose of testing whether the house was willing to throw open the whole question of abolition, he would call for the previous question.

Some conversation here followed as to the effect of the previous question, under the parliamentary law; the speaker deciding that, if the previous question was ordered, the question must be taken on each amendment.

Mr. W. C. Johnson then proceeded to say that, on reflection, he would not call the previous question, although there were many gentlemen around him desirous that he should do so, because he did not wish the house to take a vote on a proposition which would be most injurious to the interests of the country. He believed that if this question should be brought up on the adoption of the rules, after a committee should have been appointed to examine them, its merits had been most fully and ably stated, and what action, if any, should be made in them.

Mr. Slade said he did not rise for the purpose of continuing the debate on the merits of the question, if, indeed, its merits had been actually reached in the discussion. He felt compelled to say that, so far as the question had been discussed with a reference to the agency which the respective parties in the last congress had in the adoption of the 21st rule, and the discussion had been mostly confined to that, he would not call for the previous question, as it would be of no importance to go into an examination as to the paterality of the rule. Whether it was a measure of the last administration or of its opponents, did not affect its true character. He could perceive no good that could result from bringing up these discussions. Its only effect would be to divert the house from the true question before it, and throw it off into an interminable sea of debate on points which had nothing to do with the question.

Mr. Slade said he had been, and still was, to refrain from discussing the twenty-first rule, or the subject of slavery, at the present session. When the proper time should arrive, he should have much to say on the subject of slavery, and, under the rule, should there be an attempt to adopt it. But he came here at the present session for a different purpose. He came with an express determination to present no abolition petition, and with a confident belief that nobody would present them; and, he would add, with a confident belief that the friends of the rule in question would refrain from pressing it, and that they would not force upon the house a question which must necessarily lead to a protracted debate, and trench upon time which ought to be devoted exclusively to the objects which formed the necessity for the extraordinary session. He had no belief that the friends of the rule would be so desirous of all necessity for it, undertake the experiment of gagging, six months in advance, merely for the sake of showing their power of doing it. The rule expired on the 2d of March last. He thought they would be willing to let the rule expire, and let the first regular session of the 27th congress; and that he might be permitted to enjoy the satisfaction of conscious freedom during the intervening period—especially as he had felt, when he had avowed, no disposition to exercise that freedom to the annoyance of any body.

To show the house what had been his views on the subject, and the course he had deemed it his duty to pursue, he would permit me to read to the house a communication which he addressed to the leading abolition paper in Vermont, touching this subject. A correspondent of the paper having suggested that petitions should be sent to congress at the extra session, he, (Mr. J.), in the reading of the twenty-first rule, (Mr. S. J.) had thereupon addressed the editor the following:

"I observe in your paper of the 24th, which I just reached me, a communication from Jesse Steadman, urging the sending of petitions to congress, at the extra session, praying for the rescinding of the 'infamous twenty-first rule' of the house of representatives."

"If petitions are to be forwarded, they should not pray for rescinding of the rule, as it is not now in existence. The rule of the last congress expired with that congress. None of them will have any force or effect until revived by the action of the next house of representatives. The petitions would therefore ask that no such rule be again adopted."

"I take this occasion to say that I do not deem it of any importance that petitions such as I have suggested should be presented at the extra session. It is utterly unnecessary, and, therefore, as above stated—that it should be confined to the legislation rendered indispensably necessary by the financial condition of the country. That will spread itself sufficiently to cover all the time that the representatives will be willing to spend, in an extra session. I presume that no representative will think of presenting, at that session, any such petitions as were in contemplation when the twenty-first rule of the last congress was adopted, and that in adopting the late rules, at the extra session, the twenty-first rule will, by common consent, be dropped. I do not say that there will be no attempt to adopt it at the next regular session in December; but its friends, I am sure, will be content of pressing it at the extra session, knowing, as they must, that its discussion will occupy time which, the urgent necessities of the country demand should be otherwise appropriated; and feeling assured that no necessity for it will exist at that season to keep out 'abolition petitions.' At the extra session in September, 1837, these petitions were withdrawn from presentation by common consent; and so, I presume, they will be at the extra session which is approaching."

"I am sure that the 'twenty-first rule' will be more 'infamous' than I do; but I do not think that any thing will be gained by sending petitions against its rescission at the extra session. Let it opponents reserve their strength for the regular session in December, when, if ever, an attempt may be made to revive it. Your obedient servant,

WM. SLADE.

"Middlebury April, 23, 1841."

In one particular, Mr. S. had been mistaken. In the course of his speech just read, his impression had been that abolition petitions had been withdrawn from presentation at the extra session of 1837; but upon examination of the journal of the session, he found that the following resolution had been adopted:

Resolved, That the action of the several standing committees of this house on all matters not embraced by the message of the president of the United States to the two houses of congress, and the consideration of all petitions on such suspended matters be also postponed to the period above specified.

Under this resolution, all petitions of every description, not coming within the scope of the pre-

The speaker then decided the resolution of Mr. Wise to be the next business in order.

Mr. Underwood moved the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That it is necessary and proper to create a national bank to act as a fiscal agent of the government, and to repeal the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, management, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue, approved July 4, 1840."

Resolved, That a committee—be appointed to prepare and report a bill or bills to carry into effect the preceding resolutions.

Mr. U. declared he had serious objections to calling on the executive departments to submit plans for legislation. It had not been usual.

Mr. Wise said that the very first movement ever made by this government upon a question of finance, after the constitution was formed, was a regular call on Alexander Hamilton, then secretary of the treasury, for his views or plan. So with Mr. Dallas, Mr. Crawford and Mr. Gallatin. And it was the express constitutional duty of the executive departments to recommend measures to congress.

Mr. Underwood had not gone so far back in what he said. He meant to say that, in his own experience, it had not been usual for the executive departments for plans of legislation, and he, for one, was not willing now to set the example.

He wished that a direct vote should be taken on this proposition. He did not wish to debate it; for twelve years it had been to be settled. For every discussion was opened, there would be no end to it, and he did not believe that a single vote would be changed by it. If this resolution should prevail, then the committee which might be raised might call on the department and inquire whether anything was to be expected at the hands of congress or not. If the resolution was decided in the negative, he should be willing to go home in a week. If it was adopted, there would be abundant opportunity, when the details of the bill came to be settled, for every gentleman to express his views. No difficulty on that score need be anticipated.

Mr. Wise raised the point whether the resolution was in order.

Mr. W. C. Johnson moved that the house adjourn until Monday next, at 11 o'clock.

The yeas and nays were asked and refused.

And the house adjourned until Monday next, at 11 o'clock.

CHRONICLE.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES. J. H. Stevens' forthcoming work on the ruins and remains of Central America is to be published the ensuing week. It will have seventy engravings, mostly on steel.

BALLOONS. We find the following in the Montreal Patriot: "An experiment of the highest interest was performed at the Chateau de Villeneuve, near Saint Dennis. M. S— and his son had for some time past announced publicly that they had succeeded in the means of directing balloons in the air, and several experiments on a small scale, in the courtyard of the Ecole Militaire, in Paris, had been attended with satisfactory results. The experiment had verified all their hopes. M. S— after rising to a height of about 350 metres with a balloon constructed by himself and his father, sent by their ingenious mechanism, and immediately the balloon proceeding to the west, northeast. He then returned and sailed about in various directions, the balloon rising or lowering at the will of the aeronaut, without the slightest use of any kind of ballast. The experiment lasted for three hours, at the expiration of which time M. S— descended at the point from which he had started, amidst the acclamations of the spectators."

RAILS. The memorial to congress for the establishment of a national bank has been unanimously adopted by the New York chamber of commerce, and is circulating for signatures—twenty thousand in all have been obtained—a committee have been raised to proceed with it to Washington.

The memorial of the New York chamber of commerce in favor of a national bank having been referred to a committee of the chamber of commerce in Philadelphia, that committee have unanimously

Resolved, That while the Government is decidedly in favor of the establishment of a national bank, or fiscal agent, they yet deem it inexpedient at present to memorialize congress on the subject.

The directors of the Hart and Knapp V. States of Pennsylvania have directed suit against the late president, Mr. Biddle. The officers of the bank have been employed for some time in procuring an exchange for carrying on per cent. interest, in exchange for his notes, as well as to such depositors as had funds in the bank at the time of its suspension. About $500,000 have been furnished in the way of interest, and the salary of the directors as creditors of the bank, either as note holders or depositors, will now draw interest.

BORROW. The ancient and honorable artillery company of Boston, under the command of general Appony Howe, celebrated in two hundred and thirty-third anniversary on Monday last.

HON. TARA W. CAHNS, late a member of congress from Louisiana, has been appointed president of the board of public works of Louisiana, vice genl. Joseph Bernard, resigned.

WILLIAM GILBERT CLARK, esq. editor of the Philadelphia Gleaner, expired on the night of the 18th inst. of a pleurisy, in his 41st year. "A scholar, a poet, and a gentleman. 'None knew him but to love him.' His health broke for a long time before failing. He died of a pleurisy, and every day for the last several years, upon which he doctored with a passionate and rapturous fondness had shaken his constitution, and eaten his strength. None but his intimate friends knew the influence of that and sufficient to form a physical frame. To the last his heart yearned over the dust of that lovely woman. In his death chamber, her portrait stood always before him on his table, and his loving eye turned to it with an earnest gaze, as though it was his living and only friend. The verses to her memory by her amiable husband, written soon after her death, we consider of the richest poetical gems in the language, though very inadequately expressive of the tenderness of the author's grief."

COTTON. The information brought by the Great Western has rather damped the ardor of purchasers of Louisiana cotton. Sales in New York, since the arrival of New York agents, former quotations viz. 3,000 Upland and Florida at 91½; 1,450 Mobile at 91½; 700 N. Orleans at 91½.

CROPS. A reasonable rain occurred at the close of last week, greatly reviving vegetation in this section of the country, and in the wheat fields of Maryland. Generally the public papers indicate the prospect of an abundant harvest. Almost the only exception we have observed is from a paper in the western States. The Floridian of the 6th instant, says that the cotton and corn crop in that region is very promising in appearance.

COUNTERTREY GOLD COIN. The St. Louis Fire says that a large amount of spurious gold coin has been put into circulation in the upper part of the state of Missouri. It is stated that in one case payment of seventy-five dollars was made in halfcents, not one of which was genuine.

DEAD LETTER OFFICE. The dead letter office, in the post office department at Washington, is a great repository. The dead letters are returned to the general post office, with the quarterly accounts from the 12,000 clerks of the post office. Five clerks are employed in the dead letter office. The envelopes are taken from the packages by one clerk, who ties a string round the contents and casts them into a basket—the next clerk removes the contents and compares them with the bills—sending the letters to a clerk to be opened—on opening, the letters containing no valuable incomes are thrown into a basket and destroyed. Those containing valuable incomes, are returned to the office where they were mailed, and sent to the owner if found. If not claimed, all money is placed in a separate fund, and the money is deposited, so that it may be paid to the owner at any future period if claimed. They open about two hundred and fifty thousand letters per quarter—there are now several cart loads in the office unopened. The work of opening and assuring is very tedious and laborious.

DEATHS. During the week ended the 14th instant, in New York 124, of which 29 were under two years of age, 23 died of consumption, and 11 of scarlet fever in Philadelphia 103, of which 27 were under two years of age, and 14 died of consumption; in Baltimore 43, of which 23 were under one year of age, 12 free colored and 31 white.

During the month of May there were 22 deaths in the city of Washington, of which only three were under two years of age.

ELECTIONS. Mr. Black, (whig), has been elected to congress in opposition to Mr. Samuel Smith, Democrat, in Pennsylvania, lately represented by the hon. C. Ogle.

The Van Buren candidates for congress from Alabama have been elected by a majority of 6,681 votes. The vote was very small on both sides. The Van Buren majority at the November election was 5,690.

EXCHANGE. Bills on London drawn at New York from 4½ per cent. premium on France 34 2½; 2½ New York and Philadelphia 31 a 3; Baltimore and Washington 31; Richmond, Petersburg, Norfolk, Raleigh, and Wilmington, N. C. 43; Charleston 31; Augusta 31; Mobile 31; New Orleans 61; St. Louis 31; Louisville 31; Cincinnati 9; Nashville 12.

A St. Louis paper states that one mercantile house in St. Louis, in the course of its business, paid last year upwards of $100,000 on exchanges.

GREENWICH'S STATE OF WASHINGTON. The ship Ser sailed from Muskegon, about the 1st of May, for the coast of Greenland, in the company of the Enterprise, for the expedition at Washington, and conveying it to the United States.

LEAD TRADE. The St. Louis Republican states that the quantity of lead received at that place during the months of April and May was 179,000 pigs of which 104,500 pigs were received during the last month. The average of exports this year is about a month later than last, and consequently the receipts have all been crowded within the two first months. The whole receipts exceed those of last year about 100,000 pigs. The receipts vary from 60 to 70 lbs. The whole amount in pounds may be set down at 12,104,000. At the average price which lead has sustained this spring to wit: market, say 31 cents, quantity of exportation is worth $422,160.

Which the largest part of the receipts have been forwarded, chiefly to eastern markets, but there is yet a large amount in hand, and the receipts will be large. The above estimate only embraces the lead of the Upper Mississippi. The lead of the Missouri and of the mines in the southern part of that state are not included.

MILITARY. Among the manœuvres exhibited at a review of French troops at Vincennes, were ordinary evolutions, with the gymnastic step—target firing, 17 balls out of 100 hitting the mark, at 1,500 feet, cutting down trees, six inches through, with aim, and firing volleys while the men lay on their backs.

(N. Y. Exp.)
MISSOURI BONDS. The St. Louis New Era says that a sale of Missouri state bonds, to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, was made at New York, on Thursday last, now in St. Louis. The bonds bear a theoretical interest of ten per cent.

THE MARSHES CAVE OF KENTUCKY. Dr. John Cogan, the proprietor of this wonderful cave, situated in Edmonson county, Ky., has opened a house for the place of public entertainment within it, about a mile from its mouth; where he accommodates visitors with lodgings and meals.

PARTY SPIES. The foam and spray that dash around the shores of republicanism, threatening to engulf her yet composed of the very elements that support and buoy her up.

PIRATICAL. The boarding officer at the Balize, mouth of the Mississippi, has captured a piratical schooner or smuggler, having a crew of seven men, well supplied with arms and ammunition.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS. Several aairs have been instituted against New York editors for extending their privileges beyond the letter of the statute, by transmitting circulars, &c., and packages of newspapers have been sent to the United States attorney, for having written within their envelopes, which offend subjects of a party to a penalty.

SILK. is cultivated with fair prospects of success in the valley of the Red river, Arkansas.

SPICE. Exports from New York from the 24th September, 1840, to 30th March, 1841, in silver $4,563,869, in gold $992,369. Since the last date the exports amount to about $1,000,000.

The Great Western mailer brought over $100,000 in gold—showing a turn of the tide.

ST. LOUIS. According to the report of the board of aldermen contains 23,063 inhabitants within the old limits, and 65,000 within the limits of the new charter. In 1820 the population of St. Louis was 6,352. The present amount of assessable property in the city is $9,691,675.

STEAMERS. The St. Johns N. B. Herald states that the English government is about contracting for an additional line of steamers to the North American colonies—this line, in accordance with Sir William Cullenbrock's wish will be likely to run direct to St. Johns—present line will continue to run to Halifax. Should the St. Johns line be established, we shall have a steamer weekly from Europe.

STRAVING. The steamboat Dorcas on the 5th instant—killed two negroes—sailing three men and the captain. The boat sank in seven feet water—the cargo all lost.

STOCKS. U. S. Bank shares are quoted at $21.50 nominal in London 16½; and selling at N. York and Philadelphia at 18½; Indiana fees at 52½; Ohio same 53½.

SCHOOLHOUSES IN ILLINOIS. The governor of Cuba has ordered the immediate erection of Sunday schools in Havana, where the children of all classes may be educated free of expense. The law is a liberal one, and demands 6,000,000 of the annual revenue of the casuarian system of teaching is to be adopted, governor Valdes in taking this important step, will earn for himself an enviable fame, and leave behind him seeds that will germinate and spring up into vigorous plants, bearing precious and goodly fruit. (N. Y. Express.)

TEMPERANCE REFORM. On Saturday last the Washington total abstinence pledge was signed by the officers and members of the society in number, of the revenue bureau, at Portland, Me.

MR. VATTERS after a sojourn of two years on this continent, during which he has been indefatigable in his mission and has made a very favorable impression, embarked a few days since on his return to France.

VERMONT. The council of session of this state are in recess, and probably will not meet again this session. One extends the term of members to three years—one third to be elected annually.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The steamer Columbia arrived at Boston on the 16th, bringing London papers to the 4th and Paris to the 3d inst. By this arrival we have dates from Bombay to the 3d of May—just six weeks back—and Canton to the 3d of April—only 77 days since. The overland mail of Bombay, May 3, reached London on the evening of the 2d June.

The principal feature in the news is, that the war has again broken out in China, because the emperor would not ratify the treaty. The British have captured Canton, and all the forts on the river, without the loss of a single man. The trade is open to Canton, the owners of vessels running all risks. Canton was taken on the 25th of February; on the same day Chusan was given up to the Chinese. High commissioner Keahen, has been disgraced and sent to Pekin in irons. The Chinese lost 400 men.

An American gentleman from Canton says the city is doomed to the flames. There are 200,000 Chinese starving in the neighborhood for want of employment, who are as ready to sack the place as the soldiers are.

The packet ships Cornelia and Roroe have arrived out at Liverpool. The independence had also arrived. The St. James had arrived at London.

The President steamship. The settlement of the risks upon the President entered at Lhy'd's was to have taken place to-day, but was postponed to the 11th instant, to allow further time for news respecting her.

(London Times June 3.)

Liverpool, June 4. We have a great many arrivals of vessels from foreign ports to-day, and among them the Fortitude, from Buenos Ayres; the captain (Arbutnot) of which states, that on the 27th May, at 5 A. M., lat 47° N, long. 21° 30' W., about 10 miles distant, he saw a very large steamer steering to the NE. without a funnel, a crippled foremast, and large paddle boxes painted a dark color, with large square topsails set on the masttop. Next, a topgallant-sail on the foremast, and with fore and aft sails. The steamer was making very slow progress.

This intelligence, communicated by capt. Arbutnot, has excited the most intense interest here, and many persons still hope that from concurrent circumstances it may be the President; and probably the steamer seen by the Portuguese brig Comde de Palma, on the 23d April, in lat. 31, and long. 40. Others suppose it may be the British steamer, from Halifax, but this impression is by no means general; towards the close of the day the opinion is very strong that the vessel seen by the Fortitude will prove to be the President; but it is at best mere conjecture.

Vol. X.—No. 17.

The London, Yarmouth, N. S., at Liverpool, May 9, lat. 43, long. 66, fell in with the Paragon, Liverpool to Halifax, in a sinking state, having been run aboard off by a large American ship the day previous, and took off the crew. May 12th, lat. 43, long. 50, the London struck an iceberg and lost her sprit, maintopmast, &c. and stove in her larboard bow. Shortly afterwards heard a crash, which was supposed to proceed from another vessel running against the ice, and it is feared sunk, but the weather was too thick to distinguish her.

The President. The vessel seen by the Fortitude, and supposed to be a large steamer, disabled, was in all probability the London, from Yarmouth, N. S., that arrived here yesterday—the description and position of the disabled vessel agreeing with that of the London.

(London paper, June 4.)

The Britannia steamship. The non arrival at England of this vessel, which ran on the rocks at Halifax, has occasioned great uneasiness in London.

Liverpool, 6, 16 h. m. The impression gains ground every hour, that the steam ship seen by the Fortitude is the President.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Parliament. Nothing important has been done in either house. The debate on Peel's "no confidence motion" commenced on the 27th of May, and was continued next night. The adjourned debate was opened by sergeant Talford on the 2d June.

Lord Stanley has withdrawn his famous registration bill for the present session.

Dissolution of parliament. We learn from the best authority that the dissolution of parliament will take place about the 12th of this month. The proclamation is ready, and only waits the queen's signature. The new parliament is to meet on the 4th August. We trust that the conservatives in this district will be fully on the alert, but the remark is almost unnecessary, for the very best spirit prevails all through the country.

(Hertford Journal.)

Trade of all kinds is still dull. Money was scarce. The funds were flat; tea rose 3d a pound. The cotton market was dull, and without any change of importance in price.

The British iron company has compromised with Mr. Atwood by paying him £350,000. The property of the company, including back debts, is estimated at £883,604, and the annual value of the estate at £45,000.

Captain Fayer has been appointed to the command of the steam frigate Forth, one of the splendid ships belonging to the West India steam navigation company.

FRANCE.

Paris, June 2. On Saturday the trial of Darnes and his supposed accomplices, before the chamber of peers, was brought to a close. Considerable was acquitted, Duclos delivered over to the ordinary tribunals, and Darnes condemned to death.

The sentence of the court of peers was carried into effect this morning on Darnes.

AUSTRIA.

An Austrian corps of observation is to be formed on the frontier of Turkey, in consequence of the insurrection which was becoming universal through the European provinces of the Turkish empire.

GERMANY.

The Constitutional publishes a letter dated Frankfurt, 22d ult., which announces that the British charge d'affaires to the German confederation had fled from that city with an English lady, a married woman, and the mother of 11 children. The Constitutional adds that this scandalous affair had caused a great deal of sensation at Frankfurt. It was not known what direction the parties had taken. The husband of the lady had pursued them to Belgium.

HANOVER.

Since circumstances have given rise to an expectation of a tory government, the king of Hanover has declined to proceed with the negotiations for reducing the Stadt tolls. His majesty anticipates from lord Aberdeen he will be able to obtain a greater license for plundering merchants and distracting trade in the Elber, which lord Palmerston has refused to sanction any longer.

RUSSIA.

Accounts from Moscow to the 10th of May, mention that the hopes already entertained in central Russia, of the coming harvest, had led to a fall of twenty per cent on the price of corn.

(Prussian State Gazette.)

SPAIN.

Madrid, May 27. The chamber of deputies met to-day, but transacted no business of importance. It is expected that a decree ordering the disbarring of 20 battalions of the provincial militia, would shortly appear in the Gazette. This reduction in the effective force of the army, at a moment when money is so scarce, produced a favorable effect, as it shows that the government has become aware of the necessity of introducing a system of economy into every branch of the administration.

A good deal of business was transacted on the Bourse. Speculators evinced more confidence than on the previous days. The operations in the five per cent annuities to 25,000,000 ris, and were done at 27½ for cash, and at 27 15-16 at 60 days.

PORTUGAL.

Frontiers of Italy, May 17. The negotiations with Don Miguel at Rome, with reference to his entire renunciation of his claims to the throne of Portugal, on the condition of receiving a suitable pension, are still proceeding, and are favored not only by the Austrian court in concert with Russia and Prussia, but likewise by the papal see.

ITALY.

According to private letters from Naples, of the 17th ult., it was contemplated to construct a railroad between that capital and Manfredonia, which would establish a communication between the Mediterranean and the Adriatic. The king had declared his readiness to grant a guarantee of 4 or 4½ per cent. interest to the company who should undertake to execute it. The whole expense was estimated at 14,000,000 of ducats, (£3,440,000). The king and queen, accompanied by the young princess and all the royal household, had returned from Caserta to Naples.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, May 18th. Accounts from Belgrade state, that the insurrection in Bulgaria had been suppressed. It was believed at Constantinople that, although the dispute with Mehmet Ali had not been brought to a final settlement, no danger existed of peace being again disturbed. The tribute paid by the pasha to the porte had, it is said, been fixed at 90,000 purses (£122,000). He had obtained a loan of 6,000,000 dollars, on a deposit of produce.

The Anglo-Balkan Gazette, under date Ancona, 18th ult., states that the christians of Macedonia were fortifying mount Athos, in order to render it impregnable. The insurgents were supported by the monks.

The insurrection in Candia. The Anglo-Balkan Gazette, under date Trieste, May 20, states that up to the present period Mustapha Pasha, the governor of the island of Candia, had acted with the greatest moderation, and that in consequence, no blood had as yet been shed. The force of the rebels was estimated at 20,000 men, of whom but 5,000 were armed. The news of the sailing of the Turkish fleet from Constantinople, under the orders of Tahir Pasha, had caused much uneasiness amongst the Christians of the island. A Greek named Kalamattaris had arrived there, bringing with him a great number of his countrymen to reinforce the islanders. It was considered that in case of a general engagement the result would be doubtful, although the Turks would have a decided advantage on account of their artillery.

The news of Bulgarian insurrection created a great alarm in the Turkish capital, and the sultan proposed sending Hussein Pasha, the destroyer of the Janissaries, to quell it. But after some deliberation, the grand vizier thought best to send a deputation of Bulgarian Christians to the insurgents, with the strongest assurances of pardon, and a full redress of grievances. Tahir Pasha, who commands the expedition against Candia, is a man of a most cruel and ferocious disposition, and is more likely to foment than to suppress rebellion.

PERDIA.

The intelligence, via India, is pacific. It is said that the British agent was about to return to Bushire, and amicable relations were to be renewed on the basis of a treaty by which the British will consent to evacuate Karack, and the Shah cedes the fort Gorian to the Shah Bamaran, and arrest his expedition to Herat. These stipulations are doubted, and it is thought that Karack will not be given up.

CHINA.

Arrival of the overland mail by express. Malta, May 26, 1841. The Oriental arrived in port early this morning, from Alexandria, and brings a mail despatched from Bombay on the 1st instant, by the Berenice, which arrived at Suva on the 18th. Capture of the Begus forts and the city of Canton by the British. The intelligence received from China during the past month is of a highly interesting and important nature. Our latest news from Macao is of the 31st March. Keshen's continued procrastination having at length exhausted captain Elliot's patience, the Nemesis steamer was dispatched from Macao on the 14th February, with the draft of a treaty for the approval and ratification of the imperial high commissioner.

The commander of the steamer was ordered to wait at the Begus for a reply until the 18th, and in the event of his not receiving one by that day, to return immediately to Macao. This he accordingly did on the 19th, Keshen not having made his appearance. A circular was then published, stating that the squadron were then moving towards the Bocca Tigra. On the following day captain Elliot received a message from Keshen, in which the latter stated his willingness to sign the treaty, and excused his delay in not coming to the Begus when the steamer was there, by alleging that he had been detained by some physical ailment.

This appears to have been a mere ruse to gain time. On the 24th of February a notification of the renewal of hostilities was issued to her Britannic majesty's subjects.

Towards the close of the morning of the 25th of February, three howitzers and a party of Sepoys were landed at Chuen-pee, from the Nemesis and the boats of the squadron. The Chinese kept up a desultory fire while the darkness lasted. Before the dawn of day a battery had been erected with sand bags and the guns got into position. From these at noon as it was sufficiently light, the British returned the fire of the Chinese.

At 11 A. M. the tide served and the signal was made for the squadron to weigh. H. M. S. Calliope bearing the broad pendant of the commodore, led the attack against North Whanning, followed by the Hamango, Druid, Walsley, Sulphur, and Modeste.

The Blenheim, and Melville, with the Queen steamer, opened their fire on the fort at Chuen-pee. By noon the action had become general, and the firing constant and heavy on all sides. In the meantime the Nemesis and Madagascars steamers, with numerous boats in tow, ran in close to Ty Cok Tow, and landed the troops under the command of Major Pratt.

Shortly afterwards the whole of the force were in possession of the British forces. Official notifications were issued in the course of the day; one by the plenipotentiary, intimating the capture of the fort, the other by the commodore, authorizing merchant vessels to proceed to the Begus.

The number of prisoners taken at Chuen-pee is estimated at 1000, and the killed and wounded on the side of the Chinese are said to be very numerous.

The island of Chuen has been evacuated and delivered up to the Chinese, orders to that effect having been transmitted by captain Elliot, when he was laboring under the unhappy delusion that the Chinese were inclined to fulfil their promises of indemnity. The British who were detained prisoners at Ningpo were released as soon as the evacuation of Chuen was completed.

We have abstracted various items of Chinese intelligence from the Calcutta paper of the 30th of April. On the morning of that day, the Queco steamer, from Macao the 31st of March, arrived at Calcutta with commodore sir James Gordon Blumer. His excellency is said to have come to India, for the purpose of consulting the governor general, and obtaining re-inforcements.

The British troops have possession of the factory at Canton, but it would appear there is a provisional Chinese government in the city. The Calcutta Courier states that the forcing the passage between the Begus and Canton was most gallantly effected. The Chinese lost 490 men. The English had only six wounded.

We have been favored with private letters from Singapore to the 10th ult., Macao to the 28th, and Canton to the 26th March. From these we learn that Canton was almost deserted. The Hong merchants remained on the spot, but said that the people were afraid to trade whilst the men-of-war remained in the river. The Chinese at Canton now believe that no traffic of importance can be carried on, until the whole question is definitely settled.

Proclamation of the chief superintendent. To the first proclamation, dated 6th of March, 1841, capt. Elliot says—

"People of Canton.—"Your city is spared, because the gracious sovereign of Great Britain has commanded the high English officer to remember that the good and peaceful people must be tenderly considered."

"But if the high officers of the celestial court, offer the least obstruction to the British forces in their present stations, then it will become necessary to answer force by force, and the city may suffer terrible injury."

In another dated the 20th of March he says—"A suspension of hostilities at Canton and in the province, has been this day agreed upon between the imperial commission Yang and the undersigned."

"It has further been publicly proclaimed to the people under the seals of the commissioner and the acting governor of the province, that the trade of the port of Canton is open, and that British and other foreign merchants who may see fit to proceed there for the purpose of lawful commerce shall be duly protected."

These are the most important facts in the proclamation of captain Elliot.

Canton is in possession of the British troops, and a truce had been agreed upon between the new commissioner and captain Elliot; the trade is to be reopened at Canton, pending the imperial decision.

The accumulation of goods outside Canton is immense, and will, without doubt, be thrown on the market. Prices will run very low.

It appears that after captain Elliot's notice of the re-opening of the trade, nine American and fourteen British ships proceeded to Whampoa, but in a few days, new obstacles were thrown in their way, it being intimated that the Chinese traders were all armed, as the ships of war were so near Canton, and that no trade would be carried on until they were removed.

It is said captain Elliot was inclined to yield this point. Before however, any arrangements could be made, the reply of the emperor to the despatch announcing the destruction of the Bogus fort was received, which was fierce in the extreme, and orders of a war of extermination to be carried against the English. The notices posted by the Canton authorities on the walls, announcing the opening of the trade, were pulled down, and all communication with the English ordered to be cut off.

Another letter says, "all the factories in Canton are occupied by our troops. The Chinese villagers render every assistance in their power to the steamer Nemesis, in removing stakes and other obstructions to the river, between Macao and Canton. Hur, April 20."

Public notice. Notice is hereby given that British and foreign vessels have permission to proceed to Whampoa, all consequences arising from the possible and sudden resumption of hostilities of course remaining at the risk of the parties.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

PROPOSED BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The following is a report of the select committee of the senate on the currency, &c., of which Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, is chairman, as read by him in the senate on Monday.

The committee to which was referred so much of the president's message as relates to a uniform currency, a suitable fiscal agent capable of adding increased facilities in the collection, and disbursement, and security of the public revenue, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That, after the most attentive and anxious consideration of the state of the currency, and the finances of the government, in all their interesting and important bearing, the committee have arrived at the same conclusion with the secretary of the treasury, that a sound and just policy requires the establishment of a bank of the United States with as little delay as practicable.

The committee have neither time nor inclination to enter into a discussion of the question of the power of congress, under the constitution of the United States, to establish a national bank. After all that has been said and written on that question during the long period of half a century, nothing remains to be added that would be likely to shed much new light upon it. It ought, in the opinion of the committee, to be regarded as a settled question, settled by the approbation and judgment of the people, by the authority of the legislature, by the sanction of the executive department of the government, and by the solemn adjudication of the judiciary. If it be not regarded as a decided question, when, in the collisions and conflicts amongst men, arising out of diversity of opinion and judgment, is a controverted matter to be considered as terminated and quieted?

Nor do the committee deem it necessary to discuss the question of the expediency of establishing such an institution as a bank of the United States. On this there is even less contrariety of opinion than on the former question. On both, it is the deliberate conviction of the committee that a vast majority of the people of the United States concur; and that they are now looking, with anxious solicitude, to the deliberations of congress, under the confident hope that a bank of the United States will be established at the present extraordinary session of congress.

Passing by, therefore, those two questions as being unnecessary to be further argued, and assuming, what the committee verily believe, that a national bank is indispensably necessary, they will proceed, at once, to the particular form, powers and facilities with which it may be required to invest such an institution as a bank of the United States. And here the committee have no hesitation in saying that, confiding in the experience of forty years, during which the nation has enjoyed the benefit of a national bank, and during the greater part of which it has realized every rea-reasonable hope and expectation in the operations of such an institution, they came to the conclusion that it would be wisest to dismiss all experiments, and to direct to experimenters the last charter granted by congress as the basis of a new bank, entrusting upon it such restrictions, guarantees, amendments and conditions, as have been found necessary by actual experience.

The secretary of the treasury came to a similar conclusion; and in his report, and the draught of a bill which accompanies it, he has taken as his model the charter granted by congress in 1816. On that he has suggested a great many valuable improvements, most of which the committee have incorporated in the draught of a bill which they now report to the senate. On this draught they wish to offer to the senate some brief explanations and observations.

The committee have adopted Washington city, proposed by the secretary of the treasury, as the place of location of the principal bank. They believe the place of its location is a subordinate question; but there are many advantages from the proximity of the bank to the government. The distribution of the capital of the bank among the several commercial cities, in proportion to their respective wants and magnitude, is what they naturally desire, and what will doubtless be done. But to guard against the exercise of any undue government or political influence, or the imposition of any undue transactions, the committee have thought it expedient to deprive the parent bank of all power to make any discounts or loans whatever, except loans to government, authorized by express law. In order to ensure the command of the best financial abilities of the country, the bill provides that the directors of the parent bank, which is to consist of nine members, shall be paid for their services by the corporation, and all compensation to the directors, in the usual form of bank accommodations, is utterly prohibited.

Thus, the directors of the bank at Washington will become a board of control, superintending the branches, supplying them with a currency, and discharging exclusively the agency of their offices of discount and deposits.

The capital of the bank, proposed by the secretary, is retained; but a power is reserved to congress to augment it by the addition of twenty millions, for the aggregate amount ultimately fifty millions of dollars, if that should be found to be necessary.

To guard against undue expansion of the currency by the operations of the bank, various restrictions and securities are introduced.

1. The dividends are limited to seven per cent. per annum; and, after accumulating a reserved fund of two millions of dollars, to cover losses and contingencies, the excess beyond that seven per cent. is to be paid into the public treasury. And, whatever excess remains at the end of the charter, beyond the reimbursement to the stockholders of the capital stock, is also to be paid into the treasury. If the dividends fall below seven per cent. during any year of the charter, the deficiency is to be made good out of the surpluses previously paid into the treasury. The effect of this provision is, to make a permanent and invariable seven per cent. bank stock, assuming that the administration of the bank is conducted with integrity and ability.

2. The debts due the bank are required not to exceed the amount of the capital stock actually paid in, and 75 per cent. thereon, which is a greater restriction than usual.

The total amount of debts which the bank is authorized to contract, over and above the deposits, is not to exceed twenty-five millions of dollars, which is also a greater restriction than was placed upon the late Bank of the United States.

3. The publicity which is required of the general condition of the bank, and the full and complete exposure to committees of congress, and to the secretary of the treasury, which is amply secured, of all the books and transactions of the bank, including private accounts.

4. The prohibition of the removal of any loan; thus putting an end to all mere accommodation paper, as far as practicable, and confining the bank to fair business transactions.

And 5. The bank is prohibited from making any further discounts or loans whenever its notes in circulation exceed three times the amount of specie in its vaults.

To protect the community and the stockholders against mismanagement of the bank, several provisions have been inserted, which it is hoped may be effectual.

1. No paid officer of the bank is to receive loans or accommodations in any form whatever.

2. Securities are provided against abusive use of proxies, such as that no officer of the bank can be a proxy; no proxy can give more than 300 votes; no proxy to be good which is of longer standing than ninety days, &c.

3. A provision against the corporation's transacting any other (than legitimate banking business) excluding all dealing in stocks, and all commercial operations.

4. A requirement that a majority of the whole aimed at the board of directors shall be necessary to transact the business of the corporation.

5. Ample power to make the most thorough examination into the condition and proceedings of the bank, down to the accounts of individuals, by totally removing from the secretary of the treasury and committee of congress the veil of secrecy.

And 6. By denouncing and punishing as felony the crime of embezzlement of the funds of the bank when perpetrated by any of its officers, agents or servants.

Concerning entirely in the sentiment expressed by the secretary of the treasury, that many wise and patriotic statesmen, whose opinions are entitled to consideration and respect, have questioned the power of congress to establish a national bank; and that it is desirable as far as possible to obviate objections and reconcile opinions, the committee have attentively and earnestly examined the provision, incorporated in the draught of the bill of the secretary, in regard to the branching power of the bank, and they have been happy to find that they could be reconciled to it in their sense of duty to adopt it. But, after the fullest consideration, they have been unable to arrive at that result.

It was not without some hesitation that the committee agreed to the location of the bank in the District of Columbia. This they did because they believed that the utility of the bank did not so much depend upon the place of its location as upon the capital, facilities, and powers which should be given to it. But to isolate it in that District, without giving it any other branching power than such as might derive from the consent of particular states, would be to create an enormous District bank, devoid of effective national character. Such a bank would be a bank only of the District of Columbia, and its offices of discount and deposits would be nothing more than banks of the states which might allow them to be planted within their respective limits. For all national purposes congress might as well enlarge the capital of the existing District bank, enlarge its capital, and give it authority to establish offices of discount and deposits in any state that would permit it to do so.

The committee believe that the capital of a bank so constituted would never be taken; and, that, if taken, the institution would be wholly unable to accomplish the great and salutary purposes for which it is desired and should be designed.

But the question of establishing a bank thus to be restricted and circumscribed involves higher and graver considerations than those of mere expediency. The general government has or has not the power to establish a national bank. If it has the power, it derives from it the existing grants in the constitution of the United States. The committee believe it has the power and ought to exercise it. But for a contest during the last ten or twelve years in respect to the constitutional power of congress, which has been marked by so much animation and bitterness, a forbearance to exercise the power would be a tacit admission of the power of the states to be created, whose operations within the limits of the states were dependent not upon the will of congress, but upon the will of each state, separately announced, the creation of such a bank would add another and a more dangerous dependence upon the states, tantamount to a relinquishment of the national power, and it could never be resumed.

The power of the federal government is only to be found in the grants of the constitution. If they are inadequate to the fulfillment of the great purposes of establishment, they can only be increased in the mode of amendment which the instrument itself has prescribed. They cannot be augmented by the grants or consent of any state or states short of the number of two thirds, whose concurrence is necessary to the validity of an amendment. The concentration of power to the general government from the consent of particular states would be unbecoming in principle, and the committee apprehend dangerous in practice. Admit such consent to be a legitimate source of establishment, and they would operate equally in all the states, and the constitution, losing its uniform character, would exhibit an irregular and incongruous action.

Entertaining these deliberate views, the committee are fully of opinion that a bill for the establishment of a bank in the District of Columbia, will be effectual which does not contain a clear recognition of the constitutional power of congress to establish branches wherever, in the United States, the public wants, in its judgment, require them. They cannot consent that a bank, emanating from the will of the nation, and imperatively demanded by the necessities of the government and of the nation, shall be wholly dependent for its useful operation upon the will of each and every state, distinctly expressed.

Accordingly, in the draught of a bill now reported, the issue is asserted to exercise the branching power of the bank, independent of the assent of the states. The committee dare not allow themselves to believe that this bill is free from all defects, but they do hope that these, in a spirit of liberality, will be corrected by the representatives of the senate and of the house, and that the present session will be signalized by the establishment of a national institution, which has become a desideratum to the general prosperity.

The advantages which will flow from such an institution in both our domestic and foreign relations, are manifest and incontestable.

It will give the people a sound currency of uniform value throughout the union, which is just as necessary to the successful operation of all branches of business as pure air or water is to the preservation of human life or health.

It will revive and extend commercial intercourse, which, for the want of a common medium, has been almost suspended between different parts of the nation.

It will reduce domestic exchange from the enormous premiums and discounts now frequently paid, to the moderate standard growing out of the mere cost of insurance on the risk of transporting specie from one part of the union to another.

It will, consequently, save hundreds of thousands of dollars, now annually lost, in transactions of exchange.

It will essentially benefit the manufacturing interest by establishing it to realize sales and the proceeds of sales.

It will powerfully contribute to the resumption of specie payments by the banks, whose existing delinquency is the greatest source of all prevailing pecuniary and financial embarrassments.

It will greatly tend to prevent and correct the excesses and abuses of the local banks.

It will furnish a medium common to all parts of the union, for the payment of debts and dues to the government, and for the discharge of duties and taxes uniform in fact as well as in name.

It is indispensable to the convenient and successful financial operations of the government in all the departments of collection, safe keeping and disbursement of the public revenues.

Such are some of the domestic benefits which the committee fully believe will be secured by a national bank. Those which appertain to our foreign relations are also worthy of serious consideration.

If it be true that money is power, its concentration under the direction of one will, sole or collective, must augment the power. A nation, without such a concentration of power, maintaining extensive commercial intercourse with another nation possessing it, must consider that intercourse on a condition of inequality and disadvantage. National banks, in other countries, begot the necessity, therefore, of a national bank in this country, in like manner as national governments in foreign nations have been created by a national bank in ours.

Accordingly, we have seen the influence exerted by the Bank of England upon American interests, when those interests were exposed to the action of that bank, and were left without the protection of a bank of our own. The committee do not wish to be understood as intending to express any approbation of the commercial operations in which the Pennsylvania bank, assuming the name of the Bank of the United States, engaged, when that state of things arose.

But they mean to say that the interests and dignity of the United States demand that they should not be exposed, beyond the necessary and legitimate influence of monetary and commercial operations, to the action of a foreign banking institution. They believe that, without a complete bank of the United States, foreign national banks may and probably will exercise an undue and possibly pernicious influence upon our interests.

In this view of the case, the question is, whether it is better that we should be liable to be materially affected by a foreign institution, in which we have no interest, over which we can exert no control, which is administered solely in reference to foreign interests, or we shall have an American bank, the management of which will be subject to American authority, and animated by American interests, feelings and sympathies?

The committee could not entertain a doubt in such an alternative. And, in reference to the foreign as-ject of the bank, the committee thought it expedient to allow it to deal in foreign bill of exchange, which are the barometer of the state or our foreign trade.

In conclusion, the committee think it proper to say that they have given due consideration to the various memorials referred to them, and to the instructions moved by a senator from Mississippi.

The subject that wherever, in this report, the committee is mentioned, a majority of the committee is to be understood.

All which is respectfully submitted.

THE ARMY.

Major general Scott has returned to his residence at Elizabethtown, N. J. after an absence of upwards of three months on duty.

Brig. gen. Armistead, U. S. A. has arrived in Washington from service in Florida.

We regret to learn from him that sickness prevails to a great extent among the troops now in Florida.

[Nat. Intell.]

THE NAVY.
Board of examiners. The Philadelphia United States Gazette says, "the naval board for the examination of midshipmen of the date of 1835, convened at the naval asylum on Monday. The board consists of commodore Biddle, Ballard, Conner and Reid. Commodore Biddle acting as president and commodore Ballard, Conner and Reid as the examiners. There are at present about 25 or 30 midshipmen awaiting their examination."

Commander James Armstrong has been appointed to the command of the sloop of war Cyane now lying at Norfolk.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 9. The president of the senate communicated a letter from the treasurer of the United States, containing a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the post office department for the year 1840.

After the presentation of memorials and petitions, several resolutions were offered by Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, Preston, Woodbury, Smith, of Indiana and Dixon, which will appear in their progress.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill for the repeal of the sub-treasury law. This bill having had its third reading, the question was, "shall it pass?"

Mr. Woodbury said it had been his misfortune to be in a minority when this bill was considered in committee. He had there stated at that time his objections to its passage, nor had those objections been since removed, but on the contrary, greatly strengthened. As the bill went to change the entire system of collecting, keeping and disbursing the public money, he felt himself bound to present to the senate those objections he had urged against it in the committee. He was aware that much impatience was felt by the majority, under remarks of this kind, but he could not feel himself excused without presenting his views upon the subject. The measure, which, however, he should do as briefly as possible.

And in the first place he would remark that when the senate had resolved to change the system which was in existence previous to the adoption of the sub-treasury law, they had nevertheless suffered that system to continue in force until a substitute for it was matured and agreed upon, so that the treasury was not left during any interval without the control of law, nor was the law of the department thrown upon its own merits or the provisions of the law of 1789. The senate at that time had deemed it expedient to defer the repeal of one system of fiscal management until a substitute was provided.

Mr. C. could not see any sufficient reason for passing an act simply to repeal the sub-treasury law without inserting in the same act some provision as a substitute for it. This course had been pursued in 1836, and he could not perceive any sufficient reason, why it should not be adopted in the present instance. The gentlemen themselves who urged the present bill had adopted this course at that time, and Mr. W. now invited them to enact a single precedent were a great system of fiscal operations had been abolished without either providing a substitute beforehand or inserting such provision in the act of abolition itself. This had been done on two former occasions, except in reference to the charter of the second Bank of the United States, and even then an express clause had been inserted, directing that the public funds should be transferred to the bank, and that, until this was done, they should remain under the control of the system then in force. But here the bill provided for the isolated measure of repeal, without making the least provision for a substitute to be adopted. The effect of this would be to throw back the treasury on such resources as it could obtain by construction of previous laws. We had had an ill-fated deal of that within the last few years. It was proved, that this system of things produced little probability endue but for a very short time; but he insisted that it ought not to be suffered to exist for a day or for an hour. No high officer of the government, not the executive himself, should be allowed to control the public funds according to his own discretion or any doubtful or constrained interpretation of obsolete laws. There was no great public emergency at this time to require a dictatorship, with, at absolute power over the public funds. Why, then, insist upon a measure like that? Why not do what is expedient to repeal until the subject should be agreed upon? Why leave the whole treasure of the country at the discretion of the executive, under old laws, which were held to be revived by construction? The bill before the senate did not declare that the sub-treasury system was its opinion. Its whole effort was to pull down the edifice now existing, without placing by its side any a log cabin or a shanty, leaving the inmates to seek shelter and security as they might. There was no crisis which required this urgent haste. It would just as easy to order the final repeal of the present provision had been deemed the most effect, and thus avoid all those difficulties which must now accompany the measure. It was no answer for gentlemen to say that they intended to provide some other measure to take the place of the sub-treasury system, in case they should be denied that short time, since in that intention, but they might avoid the difficulty altogether. Let him tell gentlemen that the senate had recently had an example of this intention to postpone action only for a short time, and want to show how easily that short time came to be extended. When this senate has been organized on the 4th of March, the gentlemen now in the majority had insisted that it was necessary, in order to a proper organization of the body to remove the former printers from office. And why? Because they were about to be re-elected, and they wanted somebody to supply their place. Who at that time so much as dreamed that the body would remain to this day without a printer, and thrown upon the absolute discretion of its president and secretary, to print any body and any paper, at any prices they chose to give, to execute the printing of the body? The arguments of gentlemen looked very well; they did but remove the printer for a short time; a substitute was immediately to be provided, yet three or four months had elapsed, and there was no printer yet. This act, which gentlemen held to be indispensable to the organization of the body, had not been performed to this day, and the printing was done through agents whom the officers of the senate chose, and not the senate, and it was just as easy to order the final repeal of the members of this body. Just so it might be after destroying the independent treasury. The country might be left three or four months, possibly for as many years, without the adoption of any measure as a substitute for the present system, and the public money would be left under a more unlimited discretion than the public printing was left now.

After presenting these remarks, in opposition to time proposed for the work of abolition, Mr. W. asked the senate to give leave to the chairman of the measure itself. They came here to do a great public act on behalf of seventeen millions of people and twenty-six states of this union. Ought they to do this without duly considering what was the duty required of them? And what must be the effect of their act, whether it effected only temporary or permanent? Without this, they could not act discreetly in abolishing an important existing system. Mr. W. would readily admit, as some gentlemen had suggested, that there had been much to be gained by the sub-treasury system, but he had no experience. It had been greatly abused and grossly misrepresented, but he was not prepared to admit that there had been any verdict of the people against it. Was the repeal of the continuance of the law the only issue made before the people at the late election? Was the result of that election a verdict on that issue alone? The senator from Kentucky had said that they had come here for judgment—to carry into execution the verdict of the American people, but he would ask that senators for whether the result of that election was to be held as a decision by the people on all the questions which had been discussed before them? If so, how did it happen that they were sitting there in that splendid hall, fighting for the same issue, the same candidates were before them? If not, it not been decided that there should be no extra session with all its unavoidable expensiveness? That gentlemen must not eat out of gold spoons, but must use bread? That they must not indulge themselves in the luxury of champagne, but must drink out of brass cups? It not the verdict of the people cover all that? It was easy for gentlemen to talk about issues being decided by elections, but he asked, what had been the issue in 1829, and what had been the verdict given at that time?

The senator had some experience in such matters. Did he believe that the people had passed a verdict on all the questions which had been mooted during that election? No; nor did Mr. W. They had different questions arising; they had had the question about sales water furnished at public expense, about billiard table paid for out of the public money, and other grave issues of the like character. Did the senator hold that the people had delivered their verdict on all these important questions? Why cut out the sub-treasury from all the other subjects agitated at the late election, and say that the verdict of the people had been given on that issue? But, admitting that it had, some of the gentlemen on the other side of the hall would have been obliged by express written instructions from their own constituents. Much less, then, were they bound by a verdict given on five hundred issues, given at cross roads, given at grog-shops, and on the hustings. There was nothing in this argument. It answered very well to talk about political effect, but the people decided no issues but such as they put on record. The issue they decided was, that they elected this man as their chief magistrate, and not that man. That was an issue by which all were bound, and which all must respect. But the evidence needed no further. For that reason it was that he addressed arguments to gentlemen, and entreated them not to throw themselves on imaginary or uncertain issues. He asked them what they were abolishing? What was their reason for abolishing it, and what were the evils of the case? The system which it was now proposed to destroy was one which had been matured with great caution, after prolonged consideration and sound debate. Was it because it was a system which would retard the progress of civilization and refinement of modern times? Because it was not marked with all the graces and beauties of the credit system, and was not ornamented with all those classic figures which came with the graces of the British Bank of the United States and the bank of Calcutta?

He admitted that the system was somewhat antiquated; it had been tried for two or three centuries in every country, and it was at this time in vogue in many parts of our civilized world. It could not, indeed, boast of all the modern polish and trimming and flourish, but it was a system which had been tried, and had worked well. Some other refinements had also been tried, and had not worked well. Let gentlemen look around them, and let them see the general crash which had prostrated so many of our moneyed institutions. This was the effect of the much admired and beautiful credit system, which was the system of the day. It was much admired, but it had worked well, and it had been tried, and would work well again whenever the trial should be repeated.

Gentlemen were, besides, abolishing a system which they knew to be constitutional. The constitutionality of the sub-treasury was never in question; it pretended to dispute. Was this no excellence? This system had been the first offspring of the constitution; it existed in its essence in 1789. In the next place, it was a system independent in its operation of the name of "independent treasury," given to it by its friends, was not a mere word or empty sound. The system was independent, because it was not controlled by the force of law, and did not depend either upon states or individuals to make it effective. All other systems were essentially dependent in their character; they were conducted by officers who were appointed by bank stockholders and the act of private individuals. Another great excellence of the independent treasury system was, that it was perfectly safe. There was one remark in the report submitted by the present secretary of the treasury which had struck Mr. W.'s attention. The secretary talked of the insecurity of the sub-treasury, but, instead of supporting this position by a statement of what aums had been lost under that system, the report went back twelve years to losses which had happened previous to its adoption. The secretary could not show the loss of a single dollar under this much abused system of conducting the fiscal concerns of government.

[Mr. Clay here said, speaking across, "the accounts have been well settled yet."] Mr. W. repeated the assertion that there was no evidence of the loss of one dollar by the sub-treasury. In contrast to which statement he pointed gentlemen to the general wreck which had attended the employment of banks. There were losses everywhere, and the currency was everywhere depreciated, but such losses were effectually prevented by the sub-treasury system, which, when perfected, went to provide a currency subject to no depreciation. What would have been the loss suffered by government had it employed the currency of the present Bank of Pennsylvania? There was admitted loss of four or five millions from the depreciation of bank paper. A committee of the other house had estimated the total loss to government from the employment of banks at thirty-two millions of dollars, the system now to be destroyed was one eminently free from executive influence.

[A laugh on one side of the senate.] Mr. W. said that he was well aware that the sub-treasury system was not perfect, but that the sub-treasury system was subjected to executive influence in a greater degree than any other. But let them come down to facts. Could the executive put his hands into the vaults of the sub-treasury and take out a single dollar of the public money? He said he would be to the peritany? Would he not be indicted as a robber? Not a dollar could be drawn out but by warrants and drafts. Neither the president nor his secretary of the treasury could take from its custody enough to buy a pen, nor could they loan out the public money for purposes of speculation or gambling. If they attempted such a thing, they would be convicted of embezzlement and sent to prison. Was this the case under the bank system? Could not the executive, or the secretary, in person, or through their friends, be accommodated with loans by the Bank of the United States or by the pet banks? Had not the public money been lent in thousands and hundreds of thousands to friends of the banks, both out of congress and in congress? But when had a dollar of the public money been loaned under the sub-treasury? The thing could not be done without burglary and theft. And yet, strange to tell, the community seemed impressed with the idea that the sub-treasury system was the best system, and the secretary of the treasury could take and use for their own purposes just as much of the public money as they pleased.

Now, as to the executive influence over the public money. How could the money be so easily possible way in which the money could be reached, did not the president select the pet banks? Did not the secretary do the same? Was there any check on the executive discretion? Did not the bank stockholders elect their own cashier and president? Had either house of congress any control over that matter? But how was it under the sub-treasury? Did the president select the receivers general or the treasurers of the mints? No more than he could select his own secretary, or his own clerk, or his own adviser without the consent of the senate. Executive influence was limited, not extended, by that system; it brought the public money under the control of congress. It gave to the executive no new powers, for the power of removal had been exercised since the 4th of March, 1840, in the removal of the secretary of the treasury, and had been so free from removal than before that time. What had become of the receivers general at N. York, at Boston, Charleston? They had been disapproved, and others had been appointed in their place. It had been urged that the executive could control these receivers through the power of removal, yet it did so happen that none of them had been so removed. So much for the argument on executive influence.

But the sub-treasury system had yet one other and infinitely greater excellence. It did not stimulate the spirit of wild and reckless speculation by loaning out the public money. The terms were, by that law, strictly prohibited, and declared to be felony, and it was an acknowledgment and homage paid by the senator from Kentucky to the excellence of that law, that, but as he was on destroying the system, he returned to that feature of it, and incorporated it in his own bill. That system provided no stimulus for over-trading. On the contrary, its effect was to subdue and quench that destructive fire which had consumed the prosperity of the country. It kept the public treasure where it could be had when it was wanted. Every receiver general, every treasurer of a mint, must be ready to hand over every dollar of the funds in his hands on its demand by government. But was this the law under the pet banks? Far from it. When the money was wanted by the government, it was not wanted by the banks alone. But Mr. W. would not retract these remarks; he could not, for his life, see anything in the system itself to justify or excuse any easy and precipitate effort to get rid of it at a blow.

But, in the next place, he was compelled to look at what must succeed this system when it was destroyed, whether it was to succeed temporarily or permanently. That would succeed if temporarily? Nothing was more certain. The bill itself, by which he held under a sound general principle of law that, when an act repealing a previous law was itself repealed, the previous law revived ipso facto. Now, if the sub-treasury was destroyed, what law would be revived by its repeal? The act of 1836 was not. We were to have the act of 1836, with all its acknowledged imperfections in its train. Would this be a better system? Wise men did not pull down one thing to substitute another, unless that other was a better one. The act of 1836 was not without some excellencies. It contained a provision which restrained the secretary from removing the deposits from a bank where they had been placed, provided that bank continued to redeem its notes in specie; and it provided for the depositing of the public money in non-specie banks, and in banks issuing notes under five dollars. Some approved of the pet bank system in its abstract, because it was a system which could be regulated by law. When president Jackson had been forced to remove the public deposits from their former depository, and there existed no regulated system for the safe keeping of them, he had implored congress to pass a law for that purpose, and they passed the law of 1836, which had these excellencies. But they were counterbalanced by defects which broke it down in twelve months, and it was now a dead letter. One gentleman had suggested that it was destroyed by faults in its administration, and not in the system itself. This suggestion had been made by Mr. W. would not say whether it was the case or not, but he saw ample cause for its failure without this. It provided that the twelve or thirteen millions of dollars which had been deposited in safe banks should be taken out of them and divided among the twelve or thirteen other purposes to give each of them the benefit of its possession. A bank was to be selected in every state, and the effect was general stimulation of the community to every form of speculation and gambling. It was a system which was to pay interest for the money, at least for all they brought over a given proportion, and they consented to pay the money obviously because they expected to loan it out. Was not this in itself sufficient to break down any set of banks in any way? Had congress an operation be accomplished without infinite distress? To force twelve or thirteen millions of dollars out of the channels of trade, and to put it in entirely different depositories, was an operation which Mr. W. insisted must be the true cause of the commercial ruin which followed. That alone was sufficient to account for it; but if on the back of this, there was superadded the requirement to collect within nine months $6 millions more, and pay it over to the states, was it any wonder that the most ruinous and disastrous speculation had followed? The execution was left to the secretary; the time was fixed by law, and, should he fail to obey, he was liable to be impeached, and was actually threatened with impeachment. He had actually done. He had collected the money, and he had paid it out to the states in specie, or in specie worth, and it was emphatically said at the time that every infatuated in the payment of this money was a new turn of the screw. The pressure rose from rheumatism to gout, and from gout to convulsion. All this suffering had been attributed to the executive and to the treasury department, as though it were their wrong, when, in fact, they had but carried out the law of Congress. Then came, in addition to all the rest, an unexpected reversal, which was produced by the course of the Bank of England. American credit was suddenly cut off by millions at a blow. Yet all this, too, was charged upon the treasury. And here he would relate an amusing anecdote. In compliance with the regulations of the law, deposits of specie were made in North Carolina, which carried it out of the usual course of trade. The order to transfer the funds was given in advance, payable in North Carolina. This was strenuously objected to, and the secretary asked why he did not make the order payable in New York? The secretary was acquainted with the operations of trade, and knew that the order could better be made in North Carolina than in New York, because New York was then drained of specie, and specie was scarce there and insisted that the drafts should be made payable in New York. He did so, and the holders immediately went to New York and demanded the specie, and found themselves so completely embarrassed that there was not a man of them that was not glad to get his draft after he had got it. It reminded Mr. W. of the Irishman who was ordered to be flogged, and when he was flogged long down went to be flogged higher up; but when flogged higher up, wanted to be flogged lower down. Mr. W. had then asked whether he was the law, or not; what it would, and let those who made it be answerable to posterity, that just tribune whose judgments, though often slow, were ever according to equity. As might naturally have been expected, the treasury was then flooded, flushed with the possession of their twelve or thirteen millions of dollars, speedily disgorged this treasure upon the community, for they had been obliged to pay interest for it, and were glad to loan it out as soon as possible. The consequence of this was that the bank and which usually realized from two to three millions of dollars were swelled to twenty-four millions in a single year. The banks which had loaned their money to individuals instead of to the government, when called upon by government to collect it, found the law, and the natural consequence was that they all went to wreck—suspension was inevitable. But these lamentable consequences were not to be charged to the administration of the pet bank system, but to the provisions of the law. The banks were then called upon now to revive such a system as this! Must the secretary of the treasury scatter the public money among eighty banks and revive again the scenes of 1839? It could not be done. The country then, though nominally thrown back on the law of 1836, would in fact end in truth be cast on the unlimited discretion of the treasury department; for the law having been rendered impracticable by the change of times, the department must necessarily be thrown back on the law in force before this was enacted. Mr. W. would undertake to say that there could not now be five banks found in the whole United States such as that act required deposit banks to be; and the act itself declared that, in that case the treasury must revert to the previous law. Those who would allow the law enacted to be placed in banks which did not pay specie; and to place it there; not merely on special but on general deposit. Nor was this any thing new—this very thing had been done by secretaries of the treasury for years together, and it must be done again.

There were other consequences which must also follow. The secretary would not merely be compelled to use banks of this description, but he would be stripped of every facility in the business of his department until he did make his selection among the banks, and place the money there. He invited gentlemen to put inquiries to the secretary of the treasury, and see what answers they would get. The moment the secretary was asked, the receivers general, and the banks, were dead—the secretary could no longer draw on them. Where must he put his money? What must he do with his drafts? In New York immense sums were coming into deposit at the rate of one hundred and a hundred and fifty thousand dollars a day. The secretary could not arrange with a bank to receive this money under less than a week, and in the mean time the collector or the receiver general might have half a million of dollars under his lock and key, and be at the same time out of office and be liable to no man? Not his sureties, for their liability expired with his office. In the more distant parts of the country, each a state of things might exist for a whole month. That time must elapse before the receiver knew that his office was abolished; but the secretary here would know it, and could not draw upon him. What, then, must be the result? In one portion of the country he would draw on collectors; in another portion he must act under the law of 1836; and in still another he must be left at the discretion, under a construction of the old law. Here would be three or four fiscal systems in operation at one and the same time; and all this state of confusion must ensue because gentlemen would insist upon repelling one plan before they had provided another.

Another question arose as to what money the treasurer should receive. It was contended that he would be under the act of 1836. If so, then all public dues must be paid in gold and silver. There was not a bank in New England which did not issue bills under the act of 1836. He was prohibited from receiving their notes, though redeemable in specie and therefore, instead of receiving his dues one-half in convertible paper and one-half in specie, he must have the whole amount in hard money, or violate the law. The gentlemen, indeed, might like the measure on this account, but would it be of any benefit to him in this view of its effects?

Again as to the effect on public sentiment, he could tell gentlemen, if congress adjourned without providing a substitute for the sub-treasury, it would be found that the act of 1816 was not imperative. Its language was not, that paper of a certain description should be taken, but that it ought to be taken. Yet, it ought. But supposing the secretary could not get it, how then? What had been the bill under 1836, that provided that certain bills then current, and what had been called the ten cent rebellion in Boston had been gotten up, because specie was demanded by the collector. The secretary said he could not get convertible notes, and the secretary said he could not get specie, and must take depreciated paper. By this state of things, all specie and specie paying banks must go by the board. Discretion was said to be the law of tyrants; yet now the treasury was to be left loose again, to use, at pleasure, the paper of its specie-paying banks; and thus the secretary could not avoid, if he respected public opinion.

But it was said that we should soon have a substitute. Some great fiscal agent was to be provided, or else an old-fashioned bank of the United States would be created. The secretary would not say with him the time was gone by; but he would ask the members of the senate whether they were ready to repeal the existing law, to re-establish such an institution as the old bank of the United States. If they were ready to do so, well, he would not say whether such a plan had been matured and was to be presented. Why not wait till then?

It was said, however, that we were to have a bank that would not be unconstitutional: it was to be free from all objection of that kind. He was glad to hear it; but what was the plan? Had not gentlemen better wait till they saw whether it did avoid all constitutional difficulty or not? Surely they would act thus in their own affairs, why not in the affairs of the public? What was this bank to be?

If it was a mere fiscal agent not imperative, then it was a government bank, and he said to gentlemen that they were abolishing just such a bank, though without the name. All they had to do was to call the sub-treasury a fiscal agent, and the thing would be done. He would not say that the secretary gentleman contended that the bill of 1840 went to create a treasury bank? Yet they were now for destroying that, only to make another. Here Mr. W. quoted the title of a speech he held in his hand, "The sub-treasury system, as it is, and as it should be, under a government bank, of which the president of the United States was to be president, cashier and teller."—All they had to do was to give the secretary power to issue small drafts, and the sub-treasury would be a government bank.

Mr. Clay here interposed to inquire of Mr. W. whether he rightly understood him as now admitting that the sub-treasury was a bank. Mr. Woodbury replied in the negative. He had replied that it was a bank only under the supposition that the secretary could cut up his drafts into small sums, and use them as bank notes.

Mr. Clay, Well, and could he do it? Mr. Woodbury. He did not do it. I admit that the argument itself is a fair one, but he did not do it, could it have been done without sanction of law.

Mr. W. concluded by observing that though much more might be said, he should add no further remarks.

Unknown wished before the vote should be taken, to offer a few words on this bill. One fact had struck him during this discussion, viz: that there was a large majority in the senate who were utterly averse to leaving the treasury under an unregulated state bank system. He need not refer to the individual gentleman who had expressed this opinion—the fact was unquestionable. Now he asserted that these gentlemen had done by their vote of yesterday just what they had said they would not do. They had first voted down Mr. C.'s amendment to the amendment of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. C. had said that the amendment would remove the disability arising under the law of '36, and without which it would be utterly impracticable to carry that law into effect, for the want of banks which paid specie and which issued bills under the denomination of $5, a large portion of the union being absolutely destitute of banks of that description. The object of Mr. C.'s amendment had been to remove this difficulty and make the law practicable; but gentlemen, after voting in its favor as an amendment which moved by the senator from Kentucky, had voted down a bill amendment, and left the act of 1836 in a condition utterly impracticable. How would this operate? The government would be obliged to go back to the alternative of either keeping its own money, or to issue its own paper banks such as the law declared it should not use. There was another result: it would be compelled, unless it violated the law, to collect its dues wholly in gold and silver; which would in fact and practice carry out the sub-treasury system more rigidly than the law had done. The secretary must either do this, or he must purposely violate the law. Yet gentlemen say they abhor leaving the country under a state of things unregulated by law. Mr. C. called upon them to answer him, or, by their silence admit the truth of what he said.

The whole of this proceeding had been most extraordinary. Gentlemen said that the voice of the American people demanded the courts they were unregulated, and that the secretary should be their voice but condemned the sub-treasury; but that voice had been uttered in an infinitely louder key against leaving the public money unregulated by law. By inference, then, it was manifest that they were about to do as they were infinitely more opposed to the will of the country than any other. They had been told that this was to be a reform administration. Now the only possible reform worthy of the name was a conformity to the law and to the constitution. His supposition it was an intention to do as they were doing, and the printing of the senate had been left to their moment unregulated. Who was the prior to the senate? Did any gentlemen know? What were the prices fixed for printing? Could gentlemen tell? Who fixed the rates of the treasury? Did any gentleman reply? Well, the next reform was as to the currency; and in that department of reform they left the government either to violate openly the laws of the land or to come back to the sub-treasury system in its most rigid form. Was this to go to the American people, and would gentlemen still remain silent? Mr. C. certainly was willing that it should. He desired that it should. In less than three weeks or a month avarice man in these United States would know in what condition the treasury was left, and that that condition was worse than ever before.

But they were told that this posture of things was to be temporary only. Was this so certain? Were the gentlemen so perfectly united among themselves that they would not be so far from the truth? Would not many startle at constitutional ground and oppose a bank of the United States? And if that was laid aside, what was their next plan? Could there be found an intermediate ground between the sub-treasury and a bank of the United States? But he asked what it was? Mr. C. said he was no enemy to existing bank capital, but he acknowledged that he had no faith in any bank of circulation and issue. He had long said that the banks that were now in the country were a curse, and that they acted as friends to the banks by repelling the sub-treasury? According to his belief, whether they created a bank of the United States or not, it was indispensable that the country should coin its own currency of gold to protect the United States from the ruin which would run down if it commenced a paper currency. There would be expansions: nothing could prevent it; and the bank would, sooner or later, be swept by the bank unless some provision was adopted which was quite as strong as the bank itself. All great bank expansions had commenced in England, and would again; their paper system was the same with our own; their banks and ours were but different parts of the same steamboiler; and if there was an explosion it would be the same. The weakest and weakest—we must be the first to suffer. The strongest possible provision should be made to keep the specie in the country in order to meet this emergency. But he saw plainly that gentlemen would have their way, but time would show who was

Evans, Graham, Henderson, Hopington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Wadsworth, Woodbury.

The question was now called for, and about to be put, when

Mr. Wright rose to address the senate. He said he had been disappointed, after witnessing the course pursued by gentlemen on the other side, that they had the good sense to leave the entire debate on their side of the house. He considered it fortunate, because they should now be beaten by numbers if not by argument. Mr. W. was aware that power was usually more vigorous to execute than to reason, and a wise man would not divide with a weak man. This might or might not be the conduct of their opponents here, on the present occasion. They might possibly have reasons enough to give, though they did not choose to give them. They showed at all events an absolute disposition to act. Still, painful as it might be to others, and as it certainly was to him, he could not discharge his duty without throwing himself before the senate before the final question should be taken on the bill. He was aware that it was a subject with which the senate were well acquainted, and in regard to which the country was also exposed to be well informed. Still there were many things which it was proper and necessary to state for the information of the country, if not for that of his highly respected opponents. He said he would be very painful to him to detain the senate on this occasion, because he well knew the impatience of gentlemen on the other side, and was fully aware that they had determined on their course, and resolved to make no reply.

Mr. Clay. Proceed, sir, we will listen to you with patience.

Mr. Wright replied that he expected no less from the gentleman's courtesy. He then proceeded to observe that the argument of the senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Woodbury) had saved to him nearly all the time which the honorable senator had consumed in the delivery of his remarks. He had anticipated much which Mr. W. had intended to say, and he should repeat as little as may be of the remarks so ably made by him.

He should start with the metaphor which had been employed by the honorable senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay). That gentleman had assumed in the outset of his remarks that it was proper for the senate to adopt the course of a wise architect, who pulled down an old building and removed its rubbish out of the way before he proceeded to the erection of a new edifice. Mr. W. admitted that this course was some times necessary, but asked how far such necessity could be supposed to grow out of the present state of the question. He appeared to that honorable senator to say what he should think if he saw the head of a family proceed to pull down an old house in which he lived, and place his family on the side-walk which ran in front of it, while the timber for his new building was yet growing in the forest, while the bricks of which its walls were to be composed were neither burnt nor shaped, but lay yet in the bank of earth, and while the money which was to pay for the building had yet to be earned or else to be borrowed wherever it could be obtained. Would the honorable senator consider this as a wise procedure? Would such a man tell his family that he preferred to do this, as the only way of securing connection to his mind that they wanted a new house? If that was his reason, if he knew that they never could be brought to that opinion till their old house was knocked down, and the alternative lay between a new house and none at all, the Mr. W. could see a reason for the course. But he should not tell them that his new house was not to stand upon the old foundation, but was to be erected in another place, might they not reasonably ask, why, then, did you pull down the old house before you had provided for us under other circumstances than the present case. The gentlemen told the senate that their new building was not to stand on the foundation of the old. Be it so. Every body knew that the old house called the independent treasury rested on the broad basis of the constitution. Its walls were deep and strong, and their resting-place was sure; but the new building was to be put up on the marbles of that sacred instrument. They were to rest on questionable ground, at least, and not, like the sub-treasury, upon that solid and unshaken rock, concerning whose solidity no man held, or pretended to hold, a doubt. The necessity, therefore, supposed by the senator did not exist. The old building was not in the way, and therefore first need not be removed out of the way. The new edifice might, indeed, be more solid in its architecture, more glittering and showy in its appearance; let, however, the old house still stand, unless though it might be, and unattended, as was the practice of some of our enterprising brethren in the west, when their increasing means enabled them to erect more costly mansions, were want to leave the old log cabin still standing near as a memento of their humbler circumstances. Let gentlemen follow the same course towards this sub-treasury; let it remain as an annunciation of times of less ardor and luxury. It could do no harm, and it was only the annoyance which the old building might present to the eye which required that it should be taken down before the form or even the location of the new building was agreed upon.

As it was impossible that the country should go on without some substitute, Mr. W. should assume that a substitute would be provided, and that it would be in accordance with the senator's avowed wish—that was, a bank of the U. States in form or other, local he cared not to state. This substitute, be its details what they might, must possess, as none could deny, at least these two distinctive properties: first, the right and duty of collecting, keeping and disbursing the public money; and, secondly, of supplying a paper currency, promulgated by law, he receivable at the treasury. If the new institution was to possess these two qualities, it was immaterial to Mr. W.'s argument what might be its other attributes.

Another reason given for the instant repeal of the independent treasury bill, was the will of the American people. Gentlemen affirmed that the popular voice had ordered this to be done, and that in resisting the measure its opponents were resisting the mandate of the people. Was this so?—Mr. W. did not intend there to rest his case. If it were so, was it not as truly so in regard to the proposed substitute? What was the history of public opinion on that subject? And what were the decisions of public sentiment, so far as these could be gathered from the result of popular elections? The last of these elections was insisted on by the gentleman as expressing a decision of the people against the independent treasury. It might be so; but Mr. W. would take this occasion to say that it might as well be argued, and with better evidence, that the decision of the people by the last election had required from the respected individual whom the act of the people had placed in the splendid mansion at the other end of the avenue, that he should abandon that dwelling as too large and magnificent for the necessities of the people, and might now be seen standing in the street; that he should put out of his possession that rich and glittering furniture of his table, and procure for himself horn spoons and wooden plates. Would any man stand up and say that this was the decision of the people? No, sir. Mr. W. might apply the argument to a thousand other absurd and ridiculous things which had been agitated during that election, and call them, too, the decisions of the people. And he would have the courtesy to suggest to the gentleman who had affected to consider the result of that election as a decision of the nation against an independent treasury, and in favor of a national bank. In the course of that election Mr. W. had, for the first time in his life, traversed a large part of his own state, during which progress he had frequently addressed large assemblages of people, and he did not remember a single occasion when he had not endeavored to convince his audience that the policy of the party opposed to him would certainly have the effect of increasing the number of slaves he had done this a single instance when intelligent and worthy whigs had not afterwards privately assured him that in that view he was entirely mistaken, and did not know what were the real motives of the party he was attacking. He affirmed in the strongest and most decisive terms that a national bank was not to be one of their party measures. As these gentlemen have given him credit for sincerity in the ground he had taken, so he would have the belief that they were equally sincere in their opinions. A short time would be sufficient to prove which of the two was mistaken. He was willing, however, to assume that the result of the last election had been a decision of the people against the independent treasury. He asked, then, whether their decision was in relation to national bank? The question had been more than once tried. But he referred gentlemen to the decision given in 1832. Had there ever been a popular issue more clearly and distinctly tried, and had the result been more clearly and more decisively in favor of the party than that day? He knew that now and then isolated individuals had openly declared their preference for such a measure, but the party, as a party, had forbore to present it before the public eye, and had avowed that before doing so, they should wait till the popular opinion had had time to change. How had it been in regard to the state bank system? That question had never been submitted to the people. But the failure of the currency had been so manifest, and the legislative action indispensable to the issue had been made up between a sub-treasury and a national bank, and the people had decided in favor of the former, and against the latter.

And how had parties stood since in reference to the bank? The friends of that institution had been few indeed, whether in the halls of the two houses of congress or throughout the several states. Then, as the president in his message had truly and manfully said, all three of the great fiscal systems of the country had been consumed by the people; and, if so, could it be said that the necessity was laid upon the senate, in obedience to the popular voice, to sweep away one of these systems, and to put in its place one or other of those remaining, such of which had been equally repudiated and condemned? Not so. He might not to have said equally repudiated and condemned, for that was not the case. The country had been during forty years under a bank of the United States. Of this period the first twenty years expired in 1811, when the people pronounced law by law he receivable at the treasury of extending its charter. In 1832, four years before the expiration of the charter of the second bank, that mammoth came to congress and demanded a renewal. Congress voted to allow it. The friends of the bank voted against it, and the veto the question went down to the people, and was by them distinctly adjudged against the bank. Nor had Mr. W. until last November, ever heard that the party in favor of the bank ever ventured to show its head and an election. Under this state of circumstances, it would surely seem that there existed no imperious necessity to destroy the sub-treasury in order to make room for a bank. If the ground was not wanted for the erection of a new building, where was the necessity of such violent haste in knocking away the present structure?

But destroyed it was to be, although, as an experiment, it was almost untired, having been adopted but eleven months ago. What were its prominent features, and what its tendencies in reference to the great question now in agitation in the country, when compared with those of its substitute, a national bank? What sort of currency was that which the independent treasury law now provided, or would, when its action should be perfected, provide? The currency was to be a manufacture of paper, the only currency known to the constitution; a currency of inherent, intrinsic value; a currency not exposed to contraction or expansion at the will of any private association of men; a currency whose value did not suffer rise or depreciation, but by the act and decree of congress; a currency which was the standard of value for the world, and which was governed only by those laws which govern the trade of the world. What currency, on the other hand, would a bank of the United States establish? A currency of gold and silver, a currency of itself; a currency which it could manufacture at pleasure; a currency of no intrinsic value whatever; a currency which never was the representative of money; a currency susceptible of rise and depression, of expansion and contraction at the will of government, and according to the interests of the stockholders; a currency not subject to the laws of trade alone, but to the interests and caprices of all who were concerned in issuing it. Which of these two descriptions of currency ought congress, setting aside the mere question of the manufacture of paper to prefer, as promoting the permanent interests of a great and growing country? The currency introduced by the independent treasury was as stable and unchangeable as the national standard of weights and measures. The other was as changeable as the same clause of the constitution which gave to congress the power to establish a uniform standard of weights and measures. The one was as equal, as stable, and as uniform as the other. It rested the arm of government alone, and not upon the fluctuating interests of a set of private stockholders.

Another great interest of the country was incidentally affected by the question now before the senate. He referred to that of a public debt. This was a matter which in their talks here and elsewhere they were all wont to excite as one of the greatest national evils, and a thing ever to be avoided, if to avoid it was possible. Now, what were all the natural tendencies of the independent treasury system? Upon the one hand, it was to establish a barrier to the contraction of a permanent national debt!—They must from necessity be against such a measure. The public officers connected with such an institution had no possible interest in the existence of a public debt. If large, it would become unwieldy in its management, and none of their trans-nest man, he might have the money in his strong box ill the secretary should send for it; but if he desired to accommodate himself without any other liability than a civil suit for money had and received, he might put the money in his pocket and go just where he pleased. So at Charleston, so at St. Louis, save the difference between the accumulation of ten days and that of two days. It had indeed been suggested that, for the date of the signing of the law, no officer who paid away money to such receiver was relieved of his liability, because he paid it against law to one not authorized to receive it. And this, no doubt, was technically true. But would it be beneficial? Would it not be like the conduct of the Roman tyrant who stuck up his laws on a column so high above the heads of the people that no man could read them, and then punished every one who was guilty of an infraction of the law?

Such would be the condition into which the country would be plunged by repeating at this time the sub-treasury law, to which it must be added that the providing of a substitute was a clear contingency which might or might not happen. They would have nothing to hang to but a miserable remnant of the law of 1836 until they should get a bank in operation. In the meanwhile the treasury would be placed just where it had been when the honorable senator from Kentucky declared with such force and eloquence against the union in one hand of the purse and the sword. Whereas if gentlemen would exercise a little patience and endure the sight of the old house but for a short time longer, they might have a new house to move into without any of the degradation or inconvenience of sitting down in the street.

Mr. Tallmadge said: I do not rise to debate this question. It has been, heretofore, fully debated in these halls; in the legislative halls of the several states—before the people in their primary assemblies—and by the people themselves, until the subject has become so thoroughly worn out that even my honorable colleague cannot advance a single new idea upon it, and until it has become perfectly nauseating and disgusting. I rise for the purpose of expressing my extreme regret at the pain which my honorable colleague tells me he feels from the haste and manner in which this question is pressed to a decision. I am the last man in the world that would, unnecessarily, glaze the eyes of the people more especially to be so sensitive as that gentleman. He never inflicts pain, even of this sort upon his political opponents, unless from a high sense of imperative duty. And from what has fallen from him on this occasion, I am sure that he is sensible, enabled to appreciate the pain he must have experienced on the original passage of the sub-treasury law through the senate, and which we now propose to repeat. It was pressed, on that occasion, with such "hot haste" to a decision, that, to sensitive mind like his, the honorable gentleman's "sufferings," like those of his illustrious predecessor on another occasion, must have been "intolerable." Nothing but the most imperative duty and the most elevated patriotism could have compelled him to the course which was then taken. The bill was on its passage. It had been discussed, but not fully discussed. There were gentlemen waiting to be heard in opposition to it. The day had been exhausted; the session had been protracted to an unusual hour. Night had already begun to throw her sable mantle over the senate chamber, when an adjournment was asked to enable gentlemen to give their views on the morrow, free from the exhaustion of that day's arduous labors, and the honorable senator from Maryland (Mr. McKim) was forced into the debate at a late hour, and without some of the necessary statistics which he wished to use in the course of the very able argument which he made. After he had concluded, an adjournment was again an honorable senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Davis) to give his views on the subject. This also was denied, and he was compelled to proceed, late in the night, and, under a burning sense of the injustice done him, made one of the ablest speeches ever delivered on this floor. The bill was then passed, and sent to the other house, before I had an opportunity to reach Washington, and to record my vote against it. I had just been re-elected, and was then on my way in company with an honorable senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster), to take my seat. The state of New York was thus deprived of the only vote which truly represented her interests and her feelings on this floor, upon this great public measure which she had already thrice examined. I repeat, therefore, Mr. President, that my colleague, from his pain on this occasion, must have been in a perfect agony upon this.

The honorable gentleman objects that the sub-treasury ought not to be repealed until a substitute is provided, and has attempted to alarm us by some imaginary difficulties. There are no difficulties. The act of 1789, the joint resolution of 1816, and the act of 1836, which will be revived by this repeal, were ample provisions for the purposes of the treasury until a substitute shall be provided. And even if there were no such provisions, I would not hesitate one moment about the repeal of this odious and trifling, say, four-times condemned measure. I have been on this floor before the people that it would take anything or nothing in preference to this sub-treasury scheme; and, before I would hesitate about its repeal, I would see our finances go once more into chaos, as they were when the mighty hero of Hamlet was called to preside over them; when:

"Confusion heard his voice,
And wild uproar stood round."

But, Mr. President, what excites my "special wonder" is the intimation of my honorable colleague that the people have not decided against this sub-treasury scheme. One would suppose that, in reference to his own state, he could entertain no doubt on that subject. The man must have been blind indeed who could not see the onbrakings and feel the pinpricks of public sentiment for the last four years. "Empire State," and while all should my colleague doubt as to what that sentiment was. He must have been an attentive observer. He easily made up the issue for the people. I remember perfectly well, when I first expressed my dissent from the destruction of the measure at the late administration, that my colleague deprecated any collision of opinion between us on this floor; and, with characteristic self-complacency, and with a seeming confidence of anticipated triumph, proposed to submit all our differences to our common constituents, and to abide their decision. I accepted the issue. We went down to the people in 1837, and they found against him. Nothing daunted, he asked another hearing, and was again overthrown in 1838. He was indicted, with a third trial, and again beaten in 1839. And in 1840, like Napoleon, he took the field in person. He traversed the whole state. I did the same, sometimes in advance of him, and sometimes on his trail. We selected every subject, every thing but the sub-treasury, although my colleague occasionally gave a token in defence of Mr. Poinsett's standing army. But the sub-treasury was the burden of the issue. It was against that the people fought, and at this great hour, when his battle with my colleague was "horse, foot and dragoon," and was compelled to surrender at discretion.

After all this, he gravely utters his "ambitions givings out" that the people of New York have not decided against the sub-treasury. Why, sir, let me ask him, what was the issue? Was it the sub-treasury? Every newspaper on that side of the question had at the head of its editorial column, in glaring capitals, "INDEPENDENT TREASURY"—"NO NATIONAL BANK." This was the motto every where inscribed on their banners—under it they fought and under it they were conquered. And still my honorable colleague tells us, if any decision was made by the people at the late election, it was a decision in favor of "log cabins, coon skins and hard cider."

In the same breath he tells us that, during the administration of general Jackson, the people decided against a national bank. On that subject I might with much greater propriety assert that it was decided in favor of digging up the dead roots and maintaining in the ground by the burial of them.

Mr. President, if ever a felon was condemned by a court and jury and deserved to be hanged, then has this sub-treasury been condemned by the people, and ought to be repealed. They gave their verdict against it, and are impatient at our delay in awarding execution. Let us, then, forthwith enter our judgment, and simply say "off with its head; so much for Buckingham."

Mr. Wright made a brief reply. He said it was difficult for him to say, if he should be so unwise as to enter into the lists with his honorable colleague, whether he should not be overthrown. He believed he had explained once before to reply to the accusation of a want of courtesy towards his colleague. That honorable senator spoke of matters which he did not personally know, and the statement did Mr. W. great injustice. He was fully aware that the feelings of his colleague were very strong, and their personal intercourse had been only that of courtesy and kindness.

Mr. W. had so implied no denial that the people of the state of New York and of the United States had given their verdict against the Independent treasury. On the contrary, he had expressly declared that he did not stand up to deny that such was the case. All he had intended to say was that there was no evidence in the result of the late elections that the people had decided in favor of a national bank. If his colleague would say that, in addressing the people of their state, he had advocated the constitutionality of a national bank, he would say something very different from that which Mr. W. had always heard stated by others.

Mr. Tallmadge replied that he had been too much occupied in speaking against the sub-treasury to have any time left for talking about a national bank.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, expressed a desire to present his views on this subject, but it was now late in the day, and his strength was exhausted by a constitutional case of a national bank. To ascertain the mind of the senate, he would make an adjournment.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, hoped the senate would adjourn.

Mr. Calhoun demanded the yeas and nays. They were ordered by the senate, and, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 19, nays 27.

Mr. Benton then took the floor, and went into a long and very animated speech in opposition to the bill.

"The question was at length obtained upon the bill, and it was passed by the following vote:
YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bass, Bevel, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Evans, Fox, of Kentucky, Fox, of Tennessee, Gales, Nye, Garrison, Miller, Morris, of Kentucky, McKim, of New York, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, &c.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Nicholas, Poinsett, Smith, of Connecticut, Surgenon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young, &c.

June 10. The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Evans, two memorials from citizens of Portland, Maine, asking the passage of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Prentiss, from a number of citizens of Sumterville, Alabama, praying for the enactment of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Young, from citizens of Illinois, in favor of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Buchanan, from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that a duty may be imposed on imported lands.

By Mr. Bates, resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

By Mr. Henderson, from the president and directors of the Grand Gulf rail road company, asking a renewal of duties on rail road iron.

Mr. Clay, on leave introduced a bill making appropriation, for a limited time, of the proceeds of the public lands of the United States; and for granting lands to certain states.

Mr. Henderson, pursuant to notice given yesterday, introduced a bill establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy; and moved that it have its first and second reading this day, and be then referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Walker wished an expression of the view of the senate as to the propriety of acting on this subject during the present session. His own vote was peculiarly desirous that it should be disposed of. A bill had been passed once and the expectations of the nation generally would not be disappointed should nothing be done in regard to it. The refusal of the late administration to act upon the subject had done more than any thing else to cause their defeat; and should the present administration follow the example, they might expect disastrous results. Mr. Henderson, in answer to the demand of deliberation action in the matter; they wanted, in a word, to know their fate.

Mr. Berrien (chairman of the committee on the judiciary) expressed himself as anxious to see the session from the Missouri could be to see some definitive action on the subject, but did not desire the subject to be pressed at this time, unless there was some well grounded hope of a satisfactory result.

Mr. Sevier was in favor of the reference of the bill. He hoped it would be reported on, and then debated; and this for an obvious reason: The senate, at the called session, had five or six important matters before it; and if, as seemed probable, it could not be decided on at these five days, they would soon be cut off work; and, as he considered it the root of all evil, he hoped the subject of a bankrupt bill would be reserved by gentlemen as a subject of amendment for their leisure, but that the present session should be closed in disposing of the business sent down to them by this body.

Mr. Clay would here take occasion to make a remark for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension which seemed to have taken place in the country in reference to some opinions entertained here. Mr. C.

was perfectly ready to vote for any reasonable bankrupt bill, although his own state had as little individual interest in such a subject as probably any other state in the union. He had some time since expressed the opinion that a bankrupt bill could not at the present pass the senate; that opinion had been founded solely on the experience of the last session. The subject had undergone some discussion, but the friends of the bill considered its fate so very doubtful that they forbore to press the question on the passage of the bill. From what had been said just now, it was obvious that they could not get a test question now as to whether the subject would be finally acted on at the present session. He would suggest to the honorable member from Missouri, whether it would not be best to let the bill be referred to the judiciary committee; let them perfect its details; and by that time a better judgment could be formed whether it could be taken up at this extra session and discussed without too far extending the time devoted to the subject. If this was found impracticable of execution, then let the bill be published to the world, and it could be taken up and acted on at the regular session. Although Mr. Clay considered a bankrupt bill part of a system of relief for the country, yet he could not consent that it should start out at the head of that list of measures of relief which it was desirable to perfect during the present session; important as it might be, he could not consent to having it displace the subjects of a Bank of the United States and the distribution of the lands of the public lands among the states—he could not place the importance of a general bankrupt bill in comparison with that of measures like these. After they should have been disposed of, he was entirely willing the other should be taken up. He hoped the bill would be referred.

After some further remarks from Mr. Henderson, not distinctly heard by the reporter, the bill was read a second time, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Rives moved to refer so much of the president's message as relates to foreign affairs to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Buchanan thereupon rose and addressed the senate, observing that when he first read the correspondence between the British minister, Mr. Fox, and the American secretary of state, he had at once determined to make, upon the first opportunity, some observations upon that correspondence in the face of the senate, and the course he had regretted that, in finding a fit opportunity, there had, contrary to his own inclinations, been so much delay; but having at length found it, he would accomplish his original purpose, and would do it with as much brevity as possible; premising, however, that he should not have those of such a proceeding upon this mere motion of reference, had not the example been set and precedent established at the last session of congress by the present secretary of state.

He must be permitted to make one remark by way of preface; and that was, that if he knew himself, he was not actuated, in this matter, by any thing like party political feeling. He trusted his construction of some portions of the correspondence in question might prove incorrect; for though he acknowledged himself to be a party man and strongly influenced by party feeling, it had been his endeavor never to carry that feeling with him into the committee on foreign relations, (of which he had for many years been a member,) and the course that he had given sufficient evidence of this by his course in that committee. Yet, as he was firmly convinced that a proper regard for the American character, both at home and abroad, required that some commentary should be made on these matters, he had, upon reading them, determined, at once, that that commentary should be made by him without fear, but with a respectful regard to the feelings of all parties.

It had been asked, what objection could be made to the letter of the 24th of April last, lately published from Mr. Webster, our secretary of state, to Mr. Fox? There was little, indeed; much, very much, that it contained had his cordial approbation; but, unfortunately, that letter had little or nothing to do with the substance of the case. It did not make its appearance until nearly six weeks after the important business between the two governments had been transacted. It was the letter of the British minister of the 12th of March, and the instructions of the secretary of state to the British minister, general of the United States, of the 15th of the same month, which contained the true merits of the case. It was that letter of instructions, a copy of which had doubtless been communicated to the British minister, and had been open for some time to the British parliament; it was those instructions, especially, which lay at the root of the question. On these two papers of the 12th and 15th March, public opinion had been formed as well in England as here; and what came limping along, six weeks after, however just and however eloquent it might be, could exert but little or no influence either in Europe or in this country.

To understand the merits of the case a brief recapitulation of facts was necessary. A rebellion, said Mr. B. or, if you please, an attempt at revolution, existed in Canada, during the course of which, the possessions of Navy Island, in the Niagara river, A British militia force of two thousand men was embodied at Chippewa, on the Canada side of the river. The American steamboat Caroline, after having carried provisions to the insurgents on Navy Island, (for I believe that was the fact), together with probably a single cannon, lay at anchor, after her trip, fastened to the wharf at Schlosser, a small village notoriously within the jurisdiction of the United States, under the sacredegis of our protection. And the country must be recreant to itself and to its citizens, which would not, until the very last, maintain and vindicate its own exclusive sovereignty over its own soil against all foreign aggression.

I shall not dwell in American waters, under the guardianship of our sovereignty and of the American flag, but this afforded her no protection. What happened on the night of the 26th of December, 1837? Colonel Allen McNab, a name famous in history, and in command of the Caroline, and Captain Drew, of the British navy, who I believe has since been pensioned for his gallant exploit, undertook to raise a body of volunteers, and, by way of characterizing the nature of the service they were to perform, declared that they would do it in the way of a party. They should be ready to follow him to the devil. Under the command of this colonial McNab, now Sir Allen McNab, (for I understand he has since been knighted, by queen Victoria), this body of men passed down the Niagara river at the dead hour of midnight, without previous notice, and while the people on board of the Caroline lay reposing under the protection of American laws, and made an attack on unarmed men who were private citizens, not engaged in any way with the British government, authority, and murdered at least one of their number within the American territory. These barbarians, regardless of the lives of those who may have remained on board, unmoored the boat, towed her down the river, and, with the assistance of a small and irresistible current soon buried her down the falls of Niagara, and to this hour it is not known how many American citizens perished in that fatal night. This is no fancy picture.

Now, as to the principle of the law of nations which applies to such a case, that pure patriot and amiable jurist, John Marshall, has expressed it with great force and clearness. He says that "The jurisdiction of a nation, within its own territory, is exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of that restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction."—7 Cranch, 116.

And again: "Every nation has exclusive jurisdiction over the waters adjacent to its shores, to the distance of a cannon shot, or marine league."—1 Gallis, C. C. R. 32.

Now, as to the principle of the law of nations, if the Caroline had been a vessel of war, on the high seas, belonging to the insurgents, and after an engagement with a British vessel had been pursued within a marine league of the American shore, our national rights, as a neutral power, would manifestly have been covered here, and a hostile act could not have been fired against her without offering us grounds for just complaint. If, for example, the British and French nations had been at open war, and a French vessel, in flying before British pursuit, had been driven within a marine league of the American coast, all further acts of hostility towards her must instantly cease, or the neutral power would be wounded in the most sensitive point, namely, that of its sovereignty.

I shall not here venture to press the case in this there has been a gross violation of our national sovereignty, because on that point no gentlemen, I am sure, does or can entertain a doubt. That being clear, the American government at once retracts all her former position, and uses the following terms, through our minister abroad. The letter of Mr. Stevenson, on that occasion, does him great honor, indeed. Repeated attempts were made to induce the British government to answer the demand, but it refused to do so. It has been stated in the British house of commons, by one of the British ministers, that the American government had finally given up the question, and did not intend to insist upon an answer. The pretence for making this statement has most probably arisen from a custom too common among us of publishing diplomatic correspondence, whilst the negotiating states are still engaged in the matter. Stevenson, in his letter to Mr. Forsyth of the 24 July, 1839, employs this language:

"I regret to say that no answer has yet been given by my note, in the case of the Caroline. I have not deemed it proper, under the circumstances, to press the subject without further instructions from your department. If it is the wish of the government that I should do so, I pray to be informed of it, and the degree of urgency that I am to adopt."

To which Mr. Forsyth replies under date of September 11, 1839, as follows:

"With reference to the closing paragraph of your communication to the department dated 2d of July last, it is proper to inform you that the instructions are at present required for again bringing forward the question of the Caroline." I have had frequent conversations with Mr. Fox in regard to this subject, one of very recent date, and, from its tone, I presume that the British government will answer your application in the case, without such further delay."

The senate will thus perceive that there is no foundation in this correspondence for the pretext that the British government had abandoned the pursuit of this question, unless it may be gathered from the note of Mr. Forsyth and suppressing the sentence which I have just read.

Whether the administration of president Van Buren pursued its commitments with sufficient fidelity, I cannot say for sure, although I believe it did, but that forms no part of the question now before the senate. It seems that, from the conversation of Mr. Fox, Mr. Forsyth was induced to believe that a speedy answer would be given.

On the 11th of September, 1839, this unfortunate man, Alexander McLeod, came voluntarily within the jurisdiction of the United States. I am induced to believe that the vain boasting of this man, as to his presence and participation in the attack on the Caroline, has occasioned all the difficulty which now exists. I do not think he was present at the capture of that vessel, and this fact, if it had been wisely used, would have afforded the means of adjusting the difficulty to the satisfaction of both parties.

But, as it came upon the case, and, in the company of American citizens, openly boasted that he had belonged to Drew's capturing squadron. In consequence of these assertions, he was arrested by the local authorities, and indicted for murder. This state of things gave rise to a correspondence between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth, from which I intend to read a brief extract. The correspondence resulted in this: that Mr. Forsyth expressed it as his opinion, and that of the president of the United States, that under the law of nations the avowal by the British government of the capture of the Caroline, should such an avowal be made, would not free McLeod from prosecution in the criminal courts of the state of New York. Its effect was mere cumulative. It did not take away the offence of McLeod, but added thereto, and made it a national as well as an individual offence. The legal prosecution of McLeod, and the application to the British government for satisfaction, were independent of each other, and might be separated from each other, purely and simply. But whether this were the true principle of nations, law or not, Mr. Forsyth very properly said that the question must be decided by the judiciary of New York, and that, if the position of Mr. Fox were well founded, McLeod would have the full protection of that justice before the court. He stated, and pleaded that his act had been recognized by the British government, and if the plea were allowed, he would be set at liberty. That was the position of the business at the close of Mr. Van Buren's administration, and it was the position of the question for the American rights and even for the honor of England, also, could not have been desired. When the trial came on, McLeod would have two grounds of defence: first, that he had not been guilty before the court of the crime; and, next, that this capture had been recognized by the British government as a public act, done under its authority. If, in this state of things, there had been a little prudent delay, the question would soon have been settled, and the peace of the two parties. But inquiries had been addressed, in payment, to the British ministers on this subject, and a high excitement had been produced throughout the British nation. This can always be done in any country on any subject, and it is the consequence of the question never appearing in their public journals. I have been for years in the very strange to governor Seward to find the authorities of the United States thus actively and ardently engaged in defending McLeod, whilst the authorities of New York were enlisted with equal vigor in his prosecution.

The defence of this man, who had no claim to peculiar favor, except what arose from an earnest desire to please and satisfy the British government, became the object of the secretary's peculiar solicitude, and this, too, in the face of a plain, palpable menace from that government.

The next thing we might hear would be a bill of cost and counsel fees against this government for the defence of McLeod; it having been imposed as a duty on our attorney general to see that "he had skillful and eminent counsel."

Now there are features in this transaction any thing but creditable to our national character. I think that sufficient decision and firmness have not been displayed by the American secretary of state. It will ever prove a miserable policy to attempt to conciliate the British government by concessions. It was the maxim of general Jackson that in our foreign relations we should ask only what was right, and submit to nothing that was wrong; and, in my judgment, the observance of that maxim is the very best mode of preserving peace. When a nation submits to one aggression, another will soon follow. It is with nations as it is with individuals. Manly and prompt resistance will secure you from a repetition of insult. If you yield once, you will be expected to yield again, and still again, till at length there is no end to submission. I do not pretend that Mr. Webster has done wrong intentionally; all I mean to say is, that, in my judgment, he has not, in this instance, displayed a proper and becoming determination to resist. He has yielded a little longer before he prepared his instructions to the attorney general; if he had taken time for reflection before he despatched that officer crumpling to New York, his conduct would probably have been different. According to the practice of diplomacy, a copy of these instructions was doubtless at once sent to Mr. Fox. It is certain that they were known to the British government before the 6th of May, because no that day they were referred to by John Russell in the floor of the house of commons as a document in possession of the British cabinet.

I shall now offer a few remarks on the question of public law involved in this case, and then close what I have to say. I sincerely believe the administration of Mr. Van Buren is perfectly correct on this doctrine, as laid down by Mr. Forsyth. If I had found any authority to induce me to entertain a doubt on that point, I would refer to it most freely. I now undertake to say that the only circumstances which has produced confusion and doubt in the minds of well-informed men on this subject is, that they do not make the proper distinction between a state of national war and national peace. If a nation be at war, the command of the sovereign power to invade the territory of its enemy, and do battle there against any hostile force, always justifies the troops thus engaged.

When any of the invaders are seized, they are considered as prisoners of war, and as having done nothing but what the laws of war justified them in doing. In such a case they can never be held to answer, criminally, in the courts of the invaded country. That is clear. The invasion of an enemy's territory is one of the rights of war, and, in such an occasion, the law is justified by the laws of war. But there are offences, committed even in open war, which the express command of the offender's sovereign will not shield from exemplary punishment. I will give gentlemen an example. A spy will be hanged, though he be taken up and ordered under the express command of his sovereign. We might cite the case of the unfortunate man Amire. He was arrested on his return from an interview with Arnold, and his life being in danger, the British commander-in-chief (Mr. Henry Clinton, I believe) made an effort to save him by taking upon himself the responsibility of his act. But although he had crossed our lines, whilst the two nations were in a state of open and flagrant war, in obedience to instructions from his commander-in-chief, yet Washington, notwithstanding, rightfully hanged him as a spy.

Now, let me tell whoever shall answer me, (if indeed, any gentleman will condescend to notice what I have said,) that in this case the laws of the house are to do all the speaking, and they all the voting; that all the authorities concur in declaring that the law of nations protects individuals whilst obeying the orders of their sovereign, during a state of open and flagrant war, whilst it has been solemnly declared, or not, whether by general or partial. These authorities go no further. But, to decide correctly on the application of this principle in the case before us, we must recollect that the two belligerents here were England on the one hand and her insurgent subjects on the other, and that the United States were a neutral power, in perfect peace with England. But what is the rule in regard to nations at peace with each other? This is the question. As between such nations, does the command of an inferior officer of the one, to individuals, to violate the sovereignty of the other, and commit murder and arson, if afterwards recognized by the supreme authority, prevent the nation whose command has been outraged from punishing the offenders? Under such circumstances, what is the law of nations? The doctrine is laid down in Vattel, an author admitted to be of the highest authority on questions of international law, and the very question, foliis, which arises in this case, is in his book stated and decided. He admits that the lawful commands of a legitimate government, whether to its troops or other citizens, protects them from individual responsibility for hostile acts done in obedience to such commands. But he says that in open war. In such a case, a prisoner of war is never to be subjected to the criminal jurisdiction of the country within which he has been arrested. But what is the law of nations in regard to criminal acts committed by individuals in a state of peace, and under the sovereignty and jurisdiction of another, they being at peace with each other, even if these criminal acts should be recognized and justified by the offender's sovereign? This is tried for the first time in the case before the court. The subject is treated by Vattel, under the head "of the concern a nation may have in the actions of her citizens," book ii, chap. 6, page 161. I shall read sections 78, 74 and 75.

"If the offended state has in her power the individual who has done the injury, she may, without scruple, bring him to justice and punish him. If he has escaped and returned to his own country, she ought to apply to his sovereign to have justice done in his case." Can anything in the world be clearer? The author puts the case distinctly. The nation injured ought not to impute to the sovereign of a friendly nation the acts of its individual citizens; but if such friendly sovereign shall recognize the acts as his own, it then becomes a national concern. But does such a recognition wash away the guilt of the offender and release him from the punishment due to his offence under the jurisdiction of the country whose laws he has violated? Let Vattel answer this question. He says: "If the offended state has in her power the individual who has done the injury, she may, without scruple, bring him to justice and punish him." There is the direct, plain and palpable authority. And here permit me to add, that we can prove that according to sound reason, the principle is correct; and that the question would now be so decided by our courts, even if the law of nations had been silent on the subject. This not only settles the question, but it settles the principle.

Mr. Webster, in his letter to Mr. Fox of the 24th of April, tells the British minister that the line of frontier which separates the United States from her Britannic majesty's North American provinces "is long enough to divide the whole of Europe into halves." This is true enough. Now, by admitting the doctrine of Vattel to be incorrect and unfounded, on what consequences are we forced? I beg senators to consider this question. The line which separates from the British possession is a line long enough to divide Europe into halves. Heaven knows I have no desire to see a rebellion in Canada or the Canadian provinces annexed to the United States, but I do not want to see the United States so that those provinces are destined to be ultimately separated from the British empire. Let a civil war come, and let every McNab who shall then have any command in the British possessions along this line be ordered to march to the aid of the expedition into the territory of the United States wherever he shall believe or pretend that it will aid in defending the royal authority against those who are resisting it, and was between Great Britain and the United States become inevitable. A British subject, mutinying under the orders of his superior officers on this side of the line is seized in the very act. Well, what is to be done? I suppose we are to wait, until we can ascertain whether his government choose to recognize his hostilities, and then, if not, before we can inflict upon him the punishment which he deserves for violating our laws. If it does, the jail door is immediately to be thrown open; the offender, if may be the murderer, takes his flight to Canada, and we must settle the question with the British government. Such is the doctrine advanced by the British government and our own secretary of state. This principle would, as I say, lead us inevitably into war with that power. What can be done in a state of war? What can the laws of war provide that persons invading our territory who are captured, shall be considered and treated as prisoners of war. But while the two countries continue at peace, a man taken in the flagrant act of invading our territory cannot be made a prisoner of war. McLeod, however, is not to be treated on this principle, and punished under our laws if he be guilty, lest we should offend the majesty of England. The laws of New York are to be nullified, and the case sent to the British government.

But if the principle laid down by Vattel be sound and true, all difficulty at once vanishes. If such an offender be caught in the perpetration of a criminal act, he is then punished for his crime. Let him be guilty of murder, and he is then punished for his murdering circumstances in his case, for the sake of good neighborhood let him escape. There will thus be no danger of war from this case. Let me suppose a case. Suppose colonel Allan McNab should take it into his head to invade the territory of the United States a conspiracy against the British government and should believe that he could unravel the whole plot by seizing on the United States mail in its passage from New York to Buffalo. He places himself at the head of a party of soldiers, overruns the mail, and seizes the mail; but in the act he is overtaken and arrested, and he is indicted before a criminal court of the United States. Will it be maintained that, if the British government should say, we recognize the acts of this man as his own, as we have already recognized that of McNab, would Mr. Webster be justified in directing a habeas corpus to be entered in his favor, and thus suffer him to go at large?

I do not say that the British government would act in this manner; but I put the case as a fair illustration of the argument. There was one case in which something very like this might have happened, and it was even thought probable it would happen. It was reported that an expedition had been planned to seize the person of McLeod, and to carry him off to Canada; and I believe that a very distinguished and gallant general in the United States service, (general Scott)—an officer for whom, in common with all his fellow citizens, I cherish the highest respect and regard—went, in company with the attorney general, to Lockport; and it was conjectured that he had received orders to hold McLeod and defend the Lockport jail against any incursion of sir Allen McNab or any other person.

Suppose now that such an expedition had been set on foot; that it had succeeded, and that McLeod had been seized and carried off in triumph, the two nations being still in profound peace. The rescue of a prisoner of war by force of arms, if it had not already been done with McNab if he had voluntarily come within our jurisdiction and been arrested. If he could be indicted and tried and punished before the British government should have time to recognize his acts as his own, and then, at the moment of such recognition, he would be free. The principle of Vattel, rightly understood, absolutely secures the territorial sovereignty of nations in times of peace by preventing them from punishing any invasions of it in their own criminal courts, and his doctrine is amply calculated to preserve peace among all nations. War has its own laws, which are never to be extended to the intercourse between nations at peace.

The principle announced in Mr. Fox's letter is well calculated for the benefit of powerful nations when contending against their weaker neighbors. (But in saying this I do not mean to admit that we are a weak nation, or that we are comparable with England. We do not, indeed, wish to be so weak as to be so confident in the belief that whatever we might suffer during the first period of such a contest would be amply compensated by our success before we reach the end of the first year.)

Let us suppose that the empire of Russia were a weaker state, a contemptible nation, which is comparatively weak. A Russian colossus, during a season of

Mr. Ingersoll was understood to suggest to the house that, under the decision of the speaker, the previous question was open to debate, and that thus the whole subject might be discussed.

Mr. Briggs submitted that the speaker certainly could not have made such a decision.

The speaker said he had not. He had merely decided that the propriety of the previous question was debatable.

Mr. Mallory moved that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Morgan asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 66, nays 149. So the house refused to adjourn.

At the request of Mr. Wise, the speaker stated the exact position of the question.

Whereupon Mr. Slade withdrew his motion that there be a call of the house.

And the question then recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. W. C. Johnson inquired of the chair whether, if the amendment were adopted, abolition petitions would not be received by the house.

The speaker. It will strike out the 21st rule from the rule of the house.

Mr. Johnson. And thus let in abolition petitions.

Mr. Rencher asked the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 132, nays 89.

So the house refused to adjourn. The main question should be now taken. And the speaker having announced the main question to be on the modified amendment of Mr. Adams—

Mr. Dawson rose to dissent from the decision of the chair; and contended that the main question was on the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise], and that it never could be on the amendment. By our rules, it was true, it had been decided that the main question should be on the amendment; but that question had been settled otherwise by the parliamentary law. Mr. D. supported his position by reference to that law, page 66, &c.

Mr. Fillmore inquired of the speaker whether an appeal had been taken from his decision?

The speaker replied that he so understood.

Fillmore submitted that the very authority which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] had read in support of his own views sustained distinctly the decision of the chair.

Mr. Fillmore then moved that the main question be expressly stated to the house, before the main question was ordered, as being on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams].

He [Mr. F.] hoped the gentleman would withdraw his appeal.

Mr. Dawson said he had not taken an appeal from the decision of the chair.

Mr. Gilmer contended that some gentlemen had voted under a misapprehension as to what the main question was.

The question was then stated to be on the modified amendment of Mr. Adams, to strike out the words "except the 21st rule."

Mr. W. C. Johnson inquired if a motion to lay the whole subject on the table would now be in order.

The speaker said it would not.

[Cries of "question, question," "let it come, let it come,"]

Mr. Slade asked the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment; which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows:

YAS.—Messrs. Allen, S. J. Andrews, Avery, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Beeson, Bradsley, Briggs, Boardman, Burden, Buns, Bowne, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Brown, Brown, Jeremiah, Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Chase, Chittenden, J. C. Thompson, Trippe, Trowbridge, W. W. Warren, Lewis Williams, Weisbro, James W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Wood—194.

So the amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. Wise, as thus amended.

Mr. Wise, after remarking that under the preliminary law the previous question applied only to the amendments, proceeded to say that he was constrained now to vote against the resolution, because it was his desire to despatch business; and he was satisfied that if this rule were taken away, and if a flood of abolition petitions should be poured in upon us as heretofore, we should do nothing else upon this question, but discuss abolition petitions. There were various steps yet to be taken in relating this movement. The vote (Mr. W. was understood to say) was too striking for him not to admit that there was a majority in this house in favor of receiving these petitions. He gave notice that he would be object to move to lay the question of reception on the table. He would not, dared not, yield one inch of ground ever occupied by the south on this question; and, therefore, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Fillmore rose and said that, when he had said a few words as to laying the subject on the table, he had not understood what the decision of the speaker as to the main question was. He now understood the speaker to have decided that the main question was to be discussed on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Was it so? The speaker said it was.

Mr. Fillmore. That being the case, without stopping to inquire whether the chair is right or wrong, I will move the shorter mode of arguing at which I have in view to move the previous question again on the main proposition. And I submit that that motion, under the parliamentary law, takes precedence of a motion to lay on the table. And I submit to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] that it is impossible to place this question in a shape where it will better enable the members of the house on all sides to express their opinions by their votes than as it now stands. I submit whether it would not be better to go on and take the vote on the main question, and thus at once proceed to business.

Mr. Wise suggested that if it was true, as the gentleman had stated, that the motion for the previous question superseded the motion to lay on the table, there was no necessity for submission to him. On this question of abolition petitions he conceded nothing, he yielded nothing; he knew what obtrusiveness would do, and he was taught to know what he was to expect.

Mr. Briggs asked the chair to decide which of the two motions had precedence. The speaker decided that the motion for the previous question had precedence.

And the demand for the previous question was then seconded. And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Chapman, remarking that this question was one on which the state of Alabama (whose representatives had not yet arrived) ought to be heard, moved that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. Briggs asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken were: yeas 91, nays 102.

And the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. Wise, as amended—Mr. W. asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

After some conversation on a question of order—Mr. Rencher asked a division of the question on the resolution, the first division to embrace so much as applied to all the rules of the last house, and the second so much as related to the 21st rule. The question was then put on the parliamentary law, and the question was not divisible.

And the main question (being on the resolution of Mr. Wise, as amended), was then taken, and decided in the affirmative; yeas 125, nays 91.

Mr. Briggs moved that the house now take up the resolution heretofore offered by him, in relation to the appointment of standing committees.

Mr. Wise submitted to the speaker that the business first in order was the unfinished business of Thursday last, to wit: the resolution of Mr. W. calling on the secretary of the treasury for his plan of a fiscal agency which would obviate constitutional objections, &c., and providing for the appointment of a select committee of nine members thereon; (with the substitute proposed by Mr. Underwood, and the question of order raised in relation to it). Mr. W. modified his proposition by withdrawing so much thereof as provided for the appointment of a select committee.

A discussion, directed to the priority of business, took place, in which Messrs. Briggs, Wise, Everett and Underwood participated; (Messrs. Briggs and Everett contending that the resolution as to the appointment of the committee was a matter of priority, because it had reference to the organization of the house).

The discussion was brought to a close by a motion submitted by Mr. Trippe to lay the resolution of Mr. Wise, with the amendment or substitute of Mr. Underwood, on the table; which motion prevailing, the whole subject was laid on the table.

The resolution of Mr. Briggs then came up in the order of business; it is in the following words: Resolved, That the several standing committees of the house, as provided for by the rules of the last house of representatives, be now appointed by the speaker.

Mr. Sergeant moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the words, "and that a select committee of nine members be appointed on the subject of the currency, and the establishment of a suitable fiscal agency capable of adding increased facilities in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues, and rendering their custody more secure."

Mr. Briggs accepted this as a modification of his resolution.

And the question being on the resolution as thus modified—Mr. Proffitt inquired if it was customary to legislate on a subject which was not even in embryo? Was it proper and customary to call upon a secretary of the treasury for his plan? He was willing to do so, and when it should come in he was willing to refer it to the committee of ways and means if that committee should be so organized as to suit his views, or not bring so, to a select committee. But he protested at this time against any gentleman assuming without deliberation or consultation with the body of whig members, to know what the wishes of that party were. Let them hold a consultation among themselves; let them see the plan, and then they could decide whether it should go to a committee of ways and means, or to a standing committee. For his own part, he would set upon no subject without first knowing what the views of the majority were.

Mr. Stanley moved the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. McKen asked a division of the resolution: first on the appointment of the standing committee, and then on the appointment of a select committee. And the division was ordered.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was decided as now taken. And the first branch of the main question, to wit: on the appointment of the standing committee, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative without a division. So the first branch of the resolution was adopted; and the standing committees were ordered to be appointed by the speaker.

Mr. McKen asked the yeas and nays on the second branch of the main question, to wit: on the appointment of a select committee, which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 125, nays 90.

So the second branch of the resolution was adopted. Mr. Wise moved that the house do now adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow; assigning as his reason for the hour named, that the speaker might have as much time as possible to select his committee.

Mr. Morgan asked leave to introduce a resolution providing that the daily hour of the meeting of this house should be 12 o'clock until otherwise ordered. Objected to.

And then the house adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Tuesday, June 8. Some inaccuracies having occurred in the list of committees, as published in page 289, it is deemed proper to make the following corrections:

District of Columbia—Mr. Habersham substituted for Mr. King.

Naval affairs—Mr. Calhoun substituted for Mr. G. Davis.

Territories—Mr. G. Davis substituted for Mr. Pope.

Treasury department—Mr. A. L. Foster substituted for Mr. McKen.

On the rules—Messrs. Calhoun, Lewis Williams, Habersham, Hopkins, A. L. Foster, T. J. Campbell, Lawrence, J. W. Williams and Banks.

ERROR IN STATEMENT OF STATE EXPENSES.

In the REGISTER of the 15th May, page 165, of this volume, we inserted a table from the Tusculum Monitor, purporting to give the expenses—executive, legislative and judiciary—of the several states of the union. The data from which that table was compressed, in some instances at least, must have been very erroneous—or not very recent.—The state of Maryland, for instance, is put down—

For executive	$10,930
Judiciary	23,300
Legislative	15,840

Whereas the treasurer's report, for 1840, shows that he paid for—civil officers, who may be termed

The executive	$14,682 48
Judiciary	40,322 35
Legislative	60,632 01

Some of the other states, we fear, are inserted in that table with as little claim to accuracy.

NORTH EAST BOUNDARY SURVEY. The N. Y. Commercial says: "The accuracy of col. Bouchette's survey of 1817, has been questioned by the report of Messrs. Featherstonhaugh and Mudge; but in a recent elaborate report on the subject of the boundary, col. B. not only vindicates the correctness of his operation, but establishes the total inaccuracy and fallacy of the statement of Mr. Featherstonhaugh. The report is, we understand, now in the hands of her majesty's ministers.

This paragraph appears as a note to a biographical sketch of col. Bouchette, in a late Quebec Gazette. We suppose there never was a more unworthy, deceptive and untrue public document than that same Mr. Featherstonhaugh's report; certainly never was one more speedily and effectually annihilated by demonstration of utter worthlessness. Even the English papers seem to have soon become ashamed of it. Since the first week or two after its production in parliament we have never seen it quoted or even mentioned."

The Commercial does not place too low an estimate upon the report of Mr. Featherstonhaugh—Mr. F. never put foot upon much more than a tith of the territory which he disposes of in his report with a mere dash of the pen. It must have disgusted every honorable Englishman, and is regarded as impudently and ridiculous in the United States.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION OF THE UNITED STATES. The Madisonian learns from the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States, communicated to the senate by the secretary of the treasury, that the imports during the year 1840 amounted to $107,141,519, of which three were imported in American vessels $92,802,382, and in foreign vessels $14,339,137.

The exports during the same year amounted to $132,085, of which $113,895,634 were of domestic, and $18,190,312 of foreign articles. Of domestic articles, $20,030,898 were exported in American vessels, and $21,864,736 in foreign vessels. Of the foreign articles, $12,591,359 were exported in American vessels, and $4,598,953 in foreign vessels.

Shipping. During the same year 1,576,946 tons of American shipping entered, and 1,646,000 tons cleared from the ports of the United States. Of foreign shipping, 712,383 tons entered, and 705,484 tons cleared during the same period.

ARMY.

Col. Worth in Florida. This officer, who has just taken command in Florida, has issued an order suspending all negotiations with the Indians, and revoking all passports, except, we suppose, a laissez-passer. The Savannah Republican, in noticing his arrival in the territory, says:—Col. Worth commences his campaign at a most inauspicious season, surrounded by all the difficulties with which his predecessors have contended, with no less than 1200 men sick and the number increasing. Under these circumstances it would be unreasonable to expect much for the present, for it should be remembered that those soldiers who sicken at this season are almost invariably disqualified from doing more than garrison duty for the remainder of the summer.—The experience of the five last years abundantly proves this assertion.

NAVY.

The U. S. ship Ohio and Preble sailed from London on the 8th inst., the former for the United States—the latter for Mahon.

The general award court martial convened at the navy yard, Brooklyn, on the 4th instant, adjourned on the 10th. The person tried was Henry Garbutt, leader of the band of the ship North Carolina, on charges of "disobedience of orders" and "mutinous conduct."

The court was composed of the following officers: captain M. C. Perry, (president,) Benjamin Cooper, William D. Sater, commodore Silas H. Stringham, Hiram Paulding, J. D. Williamson, Jas. McIntosh, Phil. Hamilton, judge advocate.

United States exploring squadron. The New York Journal of Commerce says:—The United States naval system will forward letter bags for the United States exploring squadron in a few days.—

Letters, postage being paid to New York, will be taken from the post office and duly forwarded.

The Rassels, at Boston, from river of Platte, touched off Montevideo 3d ult., and reports U. S. ship Concord, capt. Borum, all well. The R. left at Buenos Ayres, April 29, U. S. schooner Enterprise, commander Goldsborough, all well.

Lieut. Hunter's invention. The German. We notice with great gratification the arrival at the navy yard in this city, of the experimental steam-vessel of lieut. Hunter in thirty-two hours from Norfolk.

The German, as she is most appropriately named, is propelled by lieut. Hunter's submerged propellers, of which our readers have before seen some notice taken in our columns.

We cannot too highly estimate the value of such an invention as this, and of that of Ericson, recently tested on the ship Neptune on her passage outward to Havana and homeward. Should they prove successful, as we have for some time past believed they would, their value to the nation as a means of extinguishing effectually the whole steam armament of the ordinary construction of any nation which may attack us, will be beyond computation.

Too much credit cannot be given to the secretary of the navy for the prompt manner in which he has sought to secure to the country the benefits of these inventions, by sending an experienced naval constructor (Mr. Rhodes) to New York immediately after the return there of the Neptune, that he might possess himself of the facts relative to the operations of Ericson's propellers during her trip, and by the means adopted to bring into the public service the invention of lieut. Hunter.

The German performed the trip from Gosport yard to Washington in 32 hours, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, or three-fourths—and making at times nine miles per hour.

This is but a germ, it is believed, of what she can do. The invention, it is believed, will also prove invaluable to the inland commerce of the country, as no greater water or swell is produced by the action of this propeller than by the motion of an ordinary boat, propelled by sails or otherwise, at the same speed.

The German is believed to be the smallest steam vessel ever sent to sea, being but 9 feet bent at the water line, and of 50 feet in length, drawing but 2 feet water, and possessing 6 horse power. Her propellers are 5 feet in diameter, superficial of each paddle 3 square feet.

In passing through Hampton Roads against a heavy head sea and in the face of a strong N. E. blow, her engine performed the usual number of revolutions, and worked as steadily as in smooth water, giving conclusive proof of the safety and fit adaptation of these propellers for sea navigation.

The well established fact, that the speed of a vessel is accelerated by an increased diameter of the paddle wheels, leaves no doubt that a vessel on lieut. Hunter's plan may be propelled as rapidly as one of equal size by the propellers now in common use.

This little steamer is indeed a "germ" of great promise. It was presented to the notice of the hon. secretary of the navy soon after he assumed the duties of his office in March last, and by his characteristic discrimination and promptness of action, he has, within the short period of three months, at trifling expense to the country, constructed and put in operation this vessel, and thereby practically tested this important invention. [Madisonian.]

Steam revenue cutters. The Boston Daily Advertiser is strongly urging the propriety of employing steam cutters in the revenue service, and addresses an ample list of instances in which that species of vessels could have rendered most important, nay, invaluable services in the cause of humanity, and been instrumental in saving not only life but property to an immense amount. There can be no doubt that the Advertiser is right, and none whatever, that its suggestions should be adopted by the Government.

DEBATE ON THE MCLEOD CASE.

IN SENATE, THURSDAY, JUNE 10.

The question before the senate being the motion of Mr. Rice, to refer to such of the president's message as relates to our foreign affairs to the committee on foreign affairs, and Mr. Buchanan having concluded his remarks on the subject—

Mr. Rice rose in reply, and commenced by observing that, as a member of the committee on foreign relations, it was fit and necessary that he should offer some remarks on the subject which had thus been urged on the notice of the senate.—Nothing could present a more striking example of the least of efforts to recall the attention of our public bodies to assume a proper character, than the remarks of the honorable senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan), which had just been submitted to the senate.—The gentleman had commenced by a disclaimer—"I am not here to say that Mr. R. had no doubt of the influence of anything like party feelings in what he should say; and yet he had boldly entered upon the threshold of his subject, when the dishonest and unconscious bias of a party man, as the senator fairly avowed himself to be, exhibited itself in a manner too unequivocal to be mistaken.

All who have had occasion to treat, in our legislative halls, questions such as that now presented to the notice of the senate, must have felt how difficult it often is to reconcile the impulses of an American spirit with the measure and reserve which might seem to be due to the natural susceptibilities of foreign powers. In the view taken by the honorable gentleman of the aggravated character of the outrage perpetrated in the destruction of the "Caroline," Mr. R. said he heartily concurred. The gentleman had not uttered a word in reprobation of that transaction to which his heart and his judgment did not respond. But the very terms in which the senator characterized the character of the aggression, made it a national wrong, to be redressed by national means, and not to be avenged by visiting the responsibilities of this public offence on the head of such an instrument as Alex. McLeod, if, indeed, as we all well all agree in the scene, there is every reason to believe he was not.

Mr. Rice said he should endeavor, in the outset, to recall the discussion to its true merits—to the question of international law, which the senator from Pennsylvania had endeavored to omit from the scope of his remarks. He should place it in the foreground of the argument, because by it only can the conduct of the administration, in the particular in which it was now impugned, be fairly tried and judged. He would not go on now to recapitulate the story of the controversy respecting the destruction of the Caroline, further than to show the new position which the question assumed immediately upon the accession of the present administration to power.

This was an arduous charge, involving a violation of the national sovereignty over our territory, as well as the destruction of the lives and property of American citizens, was committed in December, 1837, and aroused a general feeling of indignation throughout the union. Our minister at London, under the instructions of the government here, addressed, in May, 1838, a representation to the British government on the subject, to obtain a "disavowal and disapproval of the act, and also such redress as the nature of the case required." Notwithstanding the solemnity of the outrage, as pointed in this very communication of our minister at London, drawn up in conformity to instructions from Washington, the late administration, the senator's political friends, in whom he thinks there was no want of energy in presenting the demand for redress, actually slept over this national injury from May, 1838, to March, 1841, when they went out of power! And so profound was their slumber that, in a late debate in the house of commons, the British secretary of state for colonial affairs (lord John Russell) stated that the complaint of the American government was, for a long period, considered as dropped. It is true, that Mr. Stevenson, who could not but feel the awkward contact between the lofty tone of his communication to lord Palmerston, in May, 1838, and the patient acquiescence which followed the long continued silence of the British government, did, in July, 1839, write to Mr. Forsyth to know if he should renew the subject with lord Palmerston, and, if so, the degree of urgency he should adopt. To which Mr. Forsyth replied:—"the president expects, from the tone of Mr. Fox's conversation, that the British government will answer your application in the case, without much further delay." But in point of fact, no answer was given by the British government down to the period of the late administration's exit from power.

All this while, then, the destruction of the "Caroline," stood unexplained and unavowed by the British government, and there was nothing of a conclusive nature to determine, whether it was to be viewed as an authorized act of an individual or as the public act of the British authorities. In this state of things, McLeod, in November last, came into the state of New York, and having, from his side, and, as is now universally believed, false boasts, incurred the suspicion of having been a guilty and conspicuous actor in the destruction of the Caroline, he was arrested and indicted upon a charge of murder and arson. Mr. Fox, on the 13th of December, demanded of the government of the U. States the liberation of the accused, on the ground "that the destruction of the steamboat Caroline is well known to have been a public act of person in her majesty's service obeying the order of their superior authorities." Their demand was refused, because the government of the U. States has no right to interfere with the judicial tribunals of New York, which had taken cognizance of the case; and in regard to the declaration of Mr. Fox, Mr. Forsyth stated that "if the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, the fact has not been before communicated to the government of the U. States by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the court, when he takes up the question, to decide upon which McLeod is charged to decide upon its validity, when legally established before it." Mr. Fox, recurring to the same subject, in his letter to Mr. Forsyth of the 29th December, 1840, stated that "the act of the Caroline was not a public act of her majesty's government upon the remonstrance which had been addressed to it by the U. States against the act in question."

Thus stood the question at the accession of the present administration. The destruction of the Caroline had not as yet been avowed by the British government as a public and authorized act. But on the 12th of March, eight days after the inauguration of president Harrison, Mr. Fox addressed a letter to Mr. Webster, secretary of state, informing him that he was then instructed by his government to state that "the transaction" (the destruction of the Caroline within the territorial limits of the U. States), "on account of which McLeod was arrested, was a transaction, public in its character, and executed by persons duly empowered by her majesty's colonial authorities to take any steps and to do any acts which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories, and for the protection of her majesty's subjects, and, in consequence, that those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction were performing an act of public duty, for which they cannot be made personally and individually answerable to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country." Upon these grounds, he was instructed to demand again from the government of the United States the immediate release of Alexander McLeod.

This communication of the British minister gave us new respect to the subject, and presented for the consideration of the American cabinet a grave question, of the first importance in the intercourse and responsibilities of nations. The destruction of the Caroline, for a supposed participation in which McLeod had been arrested and indicted in the courts of New York, was now avowed by the British government to have been an act of public military force, planned and executed by the competent public authorities, in alleged defence of her majesty's territories, and in the protection of her majesty's government at home. However unwarrantable the act, from that moment it could be viewed only as a national wrong, the full responsibility of which was assumed by the British government, and in which the individuals engaged were but irresponsible instruments, acting under orders which they were implicitly bound to obey.

Under these circumstances, the present administration was called on, within the first week of its existence, to decide upon what to be in accord with the national honor in this new attitude of things—"They could not but admit that, by the principles of public law, as recognized and sanctioned by the usage of all civilized nations, persons engaged in military or naval enterprises, under the orders of their lawful superiors, could not be held individually responsible for what was done in the execution of those enterprises. McLeod, however, was in the hands of the judicial tribunals of the country, and by regular judicial process only could he be discharged. The executive authority had no right to trespass its arm for his release. What, then, was the answer of the administration to the communication of the British government? It was such as Mr. R. has several times stated to be in accord with America with the honest national pride of every American bosom. It was, in substance, this, for he had not the answer of the secretary of state then before him: "You (the British government) now avow the destruction of the Caroline as a public act of military and naval force, done under your authority. Henceforward McLeod and others, who acted under your orders, must stand excused in the eye of the law. Let the courts, in the exercise of the jurisdiction which of right belongs to them, allow his plea of insanity, and discharge him, who held him responsible in his place, through all those modes of international redress which the code of nations has provided for the prosecution or vindication of national rights. The American people, (and betwixt war and Mr. R. I use the very words of the answer returned by the secretary of state), "not distrustful of their ability to redress public wrongs by public means," is incapable of the poor revenge of pursuing an individual for a national offence, in which it was but the instrument of its government.

Mr. Rives appealed to the senate—"to the sentiment of American pride—to that Roman spirit which, he believed yet survived in the bosoms of his countrymen, to say whether such a reply was not worthy of the country and the government—"Parcere subjectis et debellare superbis" was the dictate of a lofty and magnanimous spirit, whether in individuals or in states. Historians have recorded the conduct of the Roman senate on the occasion of the capture of the Gauls, killed at the battle of Demetrius, one of the most powerful princes of antiquity. Demetrius delivered up the perpetrators of the act to the Romans; but the senate, respecting that he had been convicted or encouraged, the senate refused to receive him back into the empire, and, notifying Demetrius that they would hold the sovereign, and not the subject, responsible. It is in following the example of that proud republic that the honorable senator from Pennsylvania finds a ground for the adoption of the attitude which he assumes. "McLeod," said he, "is a man of his own nation and his own spirit!"

But the senator tells us, also, that he disents entirely from the views of the administration in regard to the principle of international law involved in the correspondence between Mr. Rives and the secretary of state. What is the principle thus denied? He cites it, as the honorable senator did, from the letter of instructions to the attorney general. It is there laid down in the following words:

"The law, therefore, now in force, not only declares that the attack on the Caroline was an act of public force, done by military men, under the orders of their superior officers, and is recognised as such by the queen's government." That an individual engaged in such an act of public force, and in the authority of his government, is not to be held answerable as a private trespasser or malefactor, is a principle of public law, sanctioned by the usages of all civilized nations, and which the government of the United States has no inclination to dispute.

The senator from Pennsylvania contends that this doctrine is applicable only to a state of open, formal and declared war. In this I beg leave to differ from him. It is applicable to every case of military force, whether it be authorized by the government in obedience to their superior authorities, whether it be in a state of general and formal war or not—"What is the reason of the thing? Let us not stick in the letter, but look to the considerations to which the rule is founded. Why are soldiers and military men not held responsible for acts of violence and trespass committed, in military operations, on the persons and property of citizens of another nation? Because in those acts they are the mere instruments of the government, and they are bound to obey the allegiance to yield their services at the call of the constituted authorities of their country, and to obey implicitly the orders of their commanding officer. It is not for the soldier or the volunteer (for they are not volunteers) to question the authority, the justice or legality of the orders he receives. His duty is obedience, while the responsibility for his orders is with his sovereign, or the superior officers who issue them. And here I beg leave to refer to the question of the Caroline, as stated by Mr. Vattel, from which he read an extract, which I shall presently show completely sustains, when properly understood, the position he used it to assail. The passage I am about to read refers to the case of a "state of general war, or of a declared war, or to expose the sovereign who wages it to the unanimous reprobation of the whole family of nations."

On that there says:

"But, as to the reparation of any damage, are the military, the general officers and volunteers obliged in consequence to repair the injuries which they have done, not of their own will, but as instruments in the hands of their sovereign?" "It is the duty of subjects to suppose" the orders of the sovereign "just and lawful." "When a sovereign has ordered their assistance in a war which afterwards found to be unjust, the sovereign alone is guilty—He alone is bound to repair the injuries. The subjects, and in particular the military, are innocent; they have acted only from a necessary obedience."

"Government would be impracticable, if every one of its instruments were to weigh its commands," &c.—Vattel, b. iii, c. 11, sec. 187.

In this passage, both the rule and the reason of it, respecting the immunity from individual responsibility of persons engaged in military operations, are laid down in the most comprehensive terms. They are regarded as mere instruments in the hands of the sovereign or superior authorities; as much so, in effect, as the bayonets they ply or the cannon they discharge. "The rule, too, is expressed in terms so large and comprehensive as to apply to every kind of war, in regard to its character for justice, and to every degree of war, in respect to formality, duration, and extent. There are many forms and varieties of the state of war. In general, a declaration of war is required, to constitute a solemn or formal war. But "defensive war requires no declaration, nor even, on urgent occasions, an express order from the sovereign." (Vattel, b. iii, c. 4, sec. 60.) So as to reprisals, and partial acts of hostility. They are not accompanied with a declaration of war, and yet they are public wars, though of the imperfect sort. Rutherford, an able writer on the law of nature and of nations, has become notorious as the vigorous decrier and denouncer of war. He says:

"If one nation seizes the goods of another nation by force, upon account of some damage, &c. such restraints by force are reprisals. There may be reprisals on other nations, and these nations are the contending parties. But, as they are confined to some particular objects, they are of the imperfect sort, &c.—B. i, c. 9, s. 10.

Of these informal and imperfect wars, neither accompanied with a declaration of war, nor extending into general and continued hostilities, the examples in modern times are very numerous. Not to speak of the memorable attack on Copenhagen, we have but, in our own day, repeated instances of these informal, partial and interrupted hostilities, extending nevertheless, during their continuance, to a state of war, and carrying with them all the legal consequences of that state. One instance was too fresh in his recollection, Mr. R. said, having occurred during the late war, and he was anxious to illustrate and furnish too apt an illustration of the principle under discussion, not to justify a passing notice. While the tyrant Don Miguel was on the throne of Portugal, he practised the grossest atrocities, not only on his own subjects, but on foreigner residents in his kingdom. The subjects of France came in for a large share of these injuries and indignities. Failing to obtain suitable reparation for them by negotiation, France resorted first to reprisals on the Portuguese coast, and afterwards, to the capture of Roussin, she dispatched a squadron under admiral Kousin, which forced the entrance of the Tagus, and passing through the fire of the fortress which line its banks, and anchored within gunshot of the royal palace. The required concessions were speedily yielded to this vigorous display of force, and admiral Kousin returned in a few days to Brest, with the whole Portuguese fleet in his train, as the trophy of his sudden and successful coup de main. Here, we find admiral Kousin, too, he is in an isolated act of force. And yet will any one contend that if a sailor of admiral Roussin had been afterwards found in Portugal, he could have been made personally answerable for the loss of life or destruction of property, which he would have aided the operation in which he bore a part?

But Mr. R. said he would hasten to present to the senate a most respectable authority on the laws of nations, which is direct and explicit to the point in question. Before doing so, he has already promised that the legal effects attributed by publicists to a state of war related, first, to the impunity of individuals for any injury to person or property they might commit in the execution of military operations, and, secondly, to the right of property acquired in goods taken by one belligerent from another. The passages he was about to read from Rutherford would show that both of these consequences applied as well to imperfect and informal wars, to reprisals, and to isolated acts of hostility, as to wars of the more formal and solemn kind. First, he says:

"The external lawfulness of what is done in a war, in respect of the members of a civil society, extends to reprisals, and to isolated acts of hostility, as to reprisals, or to other acts of hostility," &c.—Rutherford, b. ii, c. 9, s. 15.

And again he says:

"Neither the reason of the thing nor the common practice of nations will give them any other impuonly, or allow them any otherwise to obtain property, or what is taken, while war has been declared, than in the less solemn kinds of war, which are made without a previous declaration," &c. "In the less solemn kinds of war, what the members do, who act under the authority of the nation, is not a crime in them; they cannot, therefore, be punished consistently with this law for any act in which it considers them only as the instruments, and the nation as the agent." Mr. B. ibid. 9, s. 18.

Mr. R. said he would put one more case, and only one more, in order to bring more immediately home to the senate the principle we have been discussing. He referred to the attack upon the frigate Caroline. It occurred in a time of profound peace, on the bosom of one of our great estuaries, and within the jurisdiction of his own native commonwealth. Would gentlemen have held this saloon and marines of the Leopard personally answerable to our laws, and avenged the national insult upon them? I presume not.

Mr. Benton, speaking across: I would have hanged every one of them.

The senator from Missouri, we all know, said Mr. R. loves a summary mode of proceeding, but would such an act have been recommended by civilized nations, and approved by the general sense of mankind? For the sake of rescuing the conduct of war from the cruelties and bitterness of personal revenge, the principle of individual immunity has been established; the code is, "I shall not think that the senator himself, upon reflection, would have pursued a nobler course. He would have obeyed the suggestions of a loftier civility, and directed his demands for redress to the officers of the government, and not have wreaked his vengeance upon an involuntary instrument and an unconsenting victim.

Mr. R. said he would now proceed to show that the passage read by the senator from Pennsylvania from Vattel, and which he so confidently relied upon to overthrow the position assumed by the administration in relation to the principle of public law involved in the case of McLeod, was, in truth, an authority directly and expressly sustaining that position. Let us again read the passage, which Mr. Buchanan cited from the author, b. ii, c. 6, s. 24 and 25. It consists of two sections. The first is in the following words:

"But if a nation or its chief approves and ratifies the act of an individual, and the act becomes a public concern, and the injured party is to consider the nation as the real author of the injury, of which the citizen was, perhaps, only the instrument."

Now, this describes identically the case of McLeod, in reference to the burning and destruction of the Caroline. The act has been approved and ratified by the British government, and consequently, in the words of Vattel, it "then becomes a public question" between nation and nation, in which the government of the individual is the real and only responsible party. But the honorable senator passed slightly over this section, and dwelt with particular emphasis on the 25th section, which immediately follows, and is in these words:

"If the offended state has in her power the individual who has done the injury she may, without scruple, bring him to justice and punish him. If he has escaped and returned to his own country, she ought to apply to the sovereign to have justice done in the case."

The senator from Pennsylvania read this section as if it applied to the case of McLeod, and in the preceding section, to wit: where the act has been approved and ratified by the sovereign. But it is perfectly evident from the last sentence of the section that it does not; for it would be idle and absurd to apply to a sovereign to have justice done in a case subject, when he had already ratified and approved the act of that subject. This section, therefore, must necessarily contemplate the case where the act of a foreign subject has not been approved or ratified by the sovereign. It is a principle, therefore, that, in such case, the offended state may, by virtue of her jurisdiction over all persons within her territory, punish the offending individual, though a foreigner, if she have him in her power. It does not concern, in any manner, the principle laid down in the preceding section, that, where the act has been approved and ratified by the sovereign, he is responsible for the injury, and the individual is to be regarded only as the instrument. It is an universal rule of international law, where there is an apparent conflict between parts of the same authority of law, such a construction shall be made, if possible, as will give effect to both. The obvious explanation given above of these two sections of Vattel sustains this rule, as well as the plain import of the text.

The senator from Pennsylvania put a case which he seemed to suppose would fairly test the principle of international law involved in this discussion. He asked if, said McNab should, under the orders of the colonial authorities of Canada, seize and rob the mail of the United States, could he set up his orders as a bar to a prosecution for such an offence in the American courts? The case put has not the remotest analogy to the case of McLeod. Such a proceeding would be a contempt, felony, incapable of being defended under any plea of military obedience. The duty of a military man can never lay him under the obligation of becoming a highway robber. The capture and destruction of the Caroline, on the other hand, however unjustifiable upon any sound application of the principles of international law, is shown by the all the correspondence and documents relating to it to have been a military and naval operation, governed by all the rules and discipline of military service and subordination.

I come now (said Mr. R.) to notice some of those topics of party discrimination which the honorable senator from Pennsylvania, notwithstanding his usual parliamentary courtesy, scattered upon the floor of the senate in his progress of his remarks. He told us of some mysterious picture, which seemed to have seized upon the minds of men in regard to our relations with England, extending to government and people. The gentleman said the picture was that it was the duty of this nation that the attorney general was despatched with fiery speed to Lockport, attended by a gallant and distinguished general officer of the army, (major general Scott), to assist McLeod from impending danger. In order to complete this fancy picture, the honorable senator, for the want of other material, brought in the precipitate return of the Mediterranean squadron as the effect of the same panic at Washington. If the public journals have not greatly exaggerated the facts connected with this affair, the return of the Mediterranean squadron was owing to communications addressed directly to its commander by the American minister in London; and if there was any panic in the case, the picture that fix it in the memory of the nation at Washington. So far was the government from bringing pity to this movement, that the Brandywine, the avant-courier of the returning squadron, had sooner dropped her anchor within our waters, than she sternly and promptly ordered back her station.

Mr. R. said he did not exactly apprehend for what purpose the senator from Pennsylvania had referred to the mission of major general Scott to the frontier in company with the attorney general; but there seemed to be an intimation that it was to protect McLeod from the anticipated violence of popular excitement.

Mr. Buchanan promptly disclaimed any such allusion.

Mr. Rices. I am happy to find myself mistaken in what I supposed in have been the meaning of the honorable senator. It gives me pleasure to inform him, from a document now before me, (a letter of governor Sewall to the secretary of war, dated 17th March last), for what purpose this gallant defender of his country in war and guardian of her honor in peace was sent to the frontier. It was for an object strictly in accordance with his own noble calling, to meet the possible contention of an invasion of a portion of our territory from the adjoining province—a calling to which, I must be permitted to say, that distinguished officer, already covered with glory by his deeds in arms, has added a new intonation by his gallant and successful defence of the frontier. The British minister intimated that he would maintain the tranquility of our frontier, and to preserve him from interruption, as yet this peace of two great and kindred nations.

Mr. Rogers (said Mr. R.) to ask the senator from Pennsylvania, in what proceedings of the government he finds the evidence of an unbecoming spirit of concession to the demands of the British government? The British minister, "in the name of government," formally demanded "the immediate release of Alexander McLeod—Was the demand granted? No, sir; it was firmly refused, and that refusal victoriously placed on grounds intimately connected with the sanctity of American institutions. The British minister intimated "that it was of vital importance to the tranquillity of the United States that her majesty's government is 'of opinion that the capture and destruction of the Caroline was a justifiable employment of force for the purpose of defending the British territory from the invasion of the United States by a band of American privateers, who, having been permitted to arm and organize themselves within the territory of the United States, had actually invaded and occupied a portion of the territory of her majesty." The senator from Pennsylvania said, "By contending every point in the justification, intervening in the course of the reply, a new, just and powerful defence of the high moral character of our legislation and policy on the subject of neutral obligations, and 'inditing up the mirror,' to the British government, reflecting the aggravations and enormities of the destruction of the Caroline in a slight and colorful, as it is to be read, it is hoped, to a reconsideration of that act, revolving alike to humanity and to our national sensibility and honor.

The honorable senator complimented our minister at London for the able and eloquent manner in which he had presented this subject to the British government. Far be it from me to abate a 'jot or tittle' from the praises bestowed by the senator upon this distinguished citizen of my own state, but, without detracting from his merits, I may say, that, before he was so powerful and graphic a picture of that outrage, speaking to the moral and almost to the bodily sense, been exhibited as in this following extract of the reply of the secretary of state to Mr. Fox:

"It must be shown that admonition or remonstrance to the persons on board the 'Caroline' was impracticable, or would have been unavailing; it must be shown that day light could not be waited for; that there ought no attempt to be made between the innocent and the guilty; that it would not have been enough to seize and detain the vessel; but that there was a necessity, present and inevitable, for attacking her in the darkness of the night, by the aid of the British troops, and while armed men were asleep on board, killing some and wounding others, and then drawing her into the current, above the cataraict, setting her on fire, and careless to know whether there might not be in her innocent with the guilty, or the living with the dead, committing her to a fate which fills the imagination with horror."

Was there any want of American spirit in all this? No, sir. The destruction of the Caroline being at first sought by the British government as a public act, the administration could not but feel that it was unworthy of its own character and of the character of the nation, to dignify a miserable and subordinate instrument who may have been employed in it, by making him the selected object of national vengeance. It could not but feel also that the principle of public law which exempts these subordinate instruments from individual responsibility for acts done in obedience to the commands of their superiors, is a principle founded in reason and humanity, and recognised by the universal practice of civilized nations. What, then, did it become a high-minded and honorable government to do, under these circumstances? Frankly and unreservedly to admit that it could not but feel itself in the right—and to do whatever should devolve on it as a moral and responsible power, to fulfil and maintain the right. It had a higher game—a nobler mission than to make war upon McLeod.

It was not a country that he desired to release him, for that was not of its province; but thinking that the courts, in the exercise of their own proper jurisdiction, might to release him, and charged with the international relations of the country, I felt myself called on, without interfering with the functions of an independent department of the government, to contribute its moral influence in support of a great principle of international intercourse, on the due observance of which the harmony of nations depends. I felt that the attack upon the Caroline of the United States was, therefore, furnished, from the archives of the government, with authentic evidence of the avowal by the British government of the destruction of the Caroline as a public act done unlawfully, and that the attack upon the Caroline of the United States was, therefore, furnished, from the archives of the government, with however earnest this language, I must say I see more of depreciation than of menace in it. From what school of deplomy the honorable senator has drawn the sensitive and fastidious standard he applies to this communication, I know not. But I have thought that, in its practice, and whatever age, nations so proud and so subtletized had given place to directness and simplicity of speech, and that an appeal to the candid red-cution of a foreign government on the consequences which might ensue from the omission or performance of certain acts, if made in a tone of courtesy and friendly expostulation, was always held to be admissible, and sometimes, indeed, proper.

It is a little remarkable that language almost identical with this, in a letter of Mr. Fox to Mr. Foxworth, of 29th D.ember last, should have passed without arousing, in the slightest degree, the jealous sensibilities of gentlemen. In that letter, Mr. Fox says to Mr. Foxworth:

"I cannot but see the very grave and serious consequences that must ensue if, besides the injury already inflicted upon Mr. McLeod, of a vexatious and unjust imprisonment, any further harm may be done him in the progress of this extraordinary proceeding."

But I must say, Mr. President, that punctilio like these are not of substance sufficient, in my opinion, to occupy, in this age of the world, the grave discussions of a body like the senate of the United States. The indignities which a man like Foxworth is not prone to be astute in imagining or suspecting itself. It is ever well-poised and collected respecting on the sense of its power, and the justice of its cause. Such, I trust will ever be the attitude and bearing of that gallant republic of ours. Least of all will it permit itself to be restrained from doing what is right by the most unworthy of all fears—"the fear of being thought afraid."

The senator from Pennsylvania, seems to have forgotten the illustrious and honored man who was at the head of this government when its course was taken in regard to the affair of McLeod. He indulged himself in painting to the senate the baseness and indignant defiance with which he supposed Andrew Jackson would have treated the demand of the British minister if he had still held the reins of power. Though the hero of New Orleans was not then in the chair of state, one, his compeer in boldness, in fearlessness, in dignity—no, he was not less familiar with the use of the sword in the field, and was not to be daunted by the reflection of terms, real or imaginary, in the cabinet—one whom the people of America had selected for his military and civil services in fill the seat which Washington had occupied, a veteran who never shrank from a contest with British power, late to face, was there. Does the gentleman suppose that he, too, was panic-stricken?

The senator from Pennsylvania may dismiss his apprehensions, but the honorable gentleman will be compromised in the hands of those to whom the nation has entrusted its keeping. The chief magistrate, who now so worthily fills the place of the illustrious Harrison, has given, in a life of honorable and patriotic service, pledges on which his country can repose. He has announced the maxims of his policy towards foreign powers in terms which cannot but commend the universal assent—to render justice to all, unwilling to injure from now; and which solemnly enjoin such as these: "We have an amity with the rest of the world, extending it—his most imperative duty to see that the honor of the country shall remain unblemished." To these sentiments of the president, we have a faithful echo in the language of the secretary of state in the following letter to Mr. Fox: "This republic does not wish to disturb the tranquility of the world. Its object is peace, its policy peace. But still it is jealous of its rights, and among others, and most especially of the right of the absolute immunity of its territory from aggression abroad; and these rights it is the duty and determination of this government fully, and at all times, to maintain, while it will at the same time as scrupulously refrain from infringing on the rights of others." In sentiments such as these, we have an abundant guaranty that nothing will be done or suffered by the present administration which shall wring us from his high rank among the nations where the virtuous struggles of our ancestors have placed us, and that it will steadily pursue the noble and comprehensive rule of action laid down by one of our only and most illustrious presidents, to merit the character of a just, and to maintain that of an independent nation, preferring every consequence to dishonor and hostility.

FRIDAY, JUNE 11.

Mr. Choate refrained to be obliged to consume a moment of the crowded time of the senate in a discussion which could produce no practical results. But the subject was forced upon the friends of the secretary of state and of the administration; it possessed a good deal of interest intrinsically, and therefore, holding a place upon the committee on foreign relations, to whom it might be thought appropriately to belong, he visited it about a few thoughts upon committee, and he considered that he could have wished. He feared he could add little to the splendid and masterly speech of the senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives).

It is needless (he proceeded) that when I read, a few days since, the letter of the secretary of state to Mr. Fox, on which the senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan) has commented, it seemed to me written with much ability, and that it ought to and would satisfy the judgment and feelings of the whole American people. The values it presented I thought sound, clear and some of them new; the manner not an unimportant consideration; good, frank, decided, not rude, not boisterous, not timid; and the whole tone, temper and spirit elevated, national, American—worthy of the cause, the cause and the country. The objections taken to it in this debate seemed to me to be its essential merits. By conceding just what he did, and by denying just what he did, he had gone far, I thought, to withdraw this debate from the arena of the Carolina. He had taken it rest upon; and to place it on such grounds that it may be adjusted with ease and honor, or, if we must fight, that war carry into battle the approbation of our own consciences, and the supports of a just principle.

So the letter struck my mind. Other gentlemen, and, at least, one other, regarded it differently. And to the first place a doubt is instilled by the distinguished senator from Pennsylvania whether the concession of the secretary that a person in the asserted pretence of McLeod is entitled to immunity, assumes an accurate position of international law. He argues that it does not; and he holds the opinion that we may well enough hang the person on the charge of piracy and murder; that we may do this in entire conformity with the received ameliorated codes of international law of the nineteenth century, and without justly bringing on ourselves a murmur of disapprobation from any of the families of sons, or of the families of daughters, of any family of nations for a moment on this great question of the nations.

What is the concession of the secretary of state? Why only and exactly this: that a soldier or sailor—no, a sailor—of a regularly equipped and armed naval enterprise of force, under the authority, in obedience to the command of his government, and keeping himself within the scope of that authority, is not guilty, as the law of nations is administered to day, of a crime against the municipal code of the country upon which he thus helps to carry war; that he is not punishable as for such crime by that country; and that the responsibility rests upon his own government alone to answer, as nations answer for the crimes of their subjects, the responsibility. He does not deal at all with the case of a soldier straggling away from his colors to commit a solitary and separate murder. He does not deal with a case of alleged excess of authority. He supposes him to obey the precise directions of his government, and, so doing, he declares him clothed with a personal immunity.

It has been said in some of the discussions of this subject, although not here, that McLeod left the territory of the United States, and that he had been accomplished, and committed an unnecessary and distinct and malicious murder on shore. I can say only to this that no such fact forms any part of the basis of the opinion of the secretary of state. He either never believed it, or he assumed that the courts of law or the attorney general would allow its proper inference to a discriminating circumstance so important.

He then turned to the fourth page of his letter you may see that the murder for which he supposes McLeod is indicted was "a murder alleged to have been committed in the attack," forming an inseparable, very painful part of the entire military violence required to capture and destroy this vessel, and not succeeding. For the purposes of the concession, he takes for true the express declaration of Mr. Fox, "that the transaction on account of which Mr. McLeod has been arrested and is to be put on his trial," including the homicide as an unavoidable incident to it, "was a public transaction" conducted by her majesty's government.

Such is the concession. I have the honor to submit, first, that the concession is right in point of interest; and then, that it was the duty of the secretary of state to make it, and of the government to act upon it, exactly as it was made and acted upon.

In entering on this investigation, then, you observe that, to a certain distance, we proceed on all sides of the senate harmoniously together. Thus, it is admitted by the senator from Pennsylvania, and by every body, that persons taken fighting, or for having fought, in the battle of an open, general, regularly declared war, are not responsible as for crimes committed in the act of fighting, against the country which they devastate and wrap in mourning and blood. They become technically prisoners of war. As such, on a principle of policy, as a mode of prosecuting war, they are subjected to restraint; imprisonment, held to ransom, exchanged, and otherwise disposed of, with more or less indulgence and humanity, according to circumstances. But criminals, robbers, murderers, by the act of fighting, although the act involved the destruction of property and life, they are not, by the theory or practice of any civilized state of men.

Thus far we proceed together. On this admitted principle we all stand; and from this we all take our departure. The truth is, the nations have agreed, and that agreement makes the law of nations, that it is a duty and a virtue in the individual citizen, his first duty, his highest virtue, to be obedient to his own government. They have agreed to regard him, as our own Decatur, the eldest Decatur, said of his children, as the property of his country. Whether he lies down to sleep in bed, or whether he goes to battle, he lies down to sleep in battle, in obedience to his sacred and parental command, it is, as the general rule, not imposed to him for crime at all. His nation, his country, his blood, his honor, his duty, his answer is not on the high places of the world, and to the whole extent of the undesirable responsibilities of war.

If, therefore, Mr. McLeod had been one of these bodies of troops which during the last war, occasionally passed the line of neutrality, and were sent to fight and killing our people, and had been taken even at the time, and with the red hand, he could not have been declared guilty of a crime against any law of a state or of the union.

Setting out on this admitted principle, the real question is, whether the special circumstances under which McLeod's vessel was sent into our waters, was a soldier or sailor, de facto, for the time, for the act, in a military and naval expedition of force, planned and sent abroad by his own legitimate government, having the right to exact his service to the last drop of his blood, no broad, not a drop, but, as it represented to him when it called him out of his bed, and disclosed its purpose, to do an act for the defence of the country he lived in against invasion. This expedition was a single act, not preceded or followed by any other; it was preceded by no declaration of war, and, in this circumstance, it was unjustifiable. Such were the circumstances; and the question we debate is, do they withdraw him from the principle of personal responsibility?

Let me say, then, first, that in proceeding to determine whether that principle shall or not be applied to a given special case arising in the ever-varying developments of things, the inclination of civilized states will be, and ought to be, to take the principle of the nations, and to apply it to the individual, and of exclusive national responsibility. Every motive which operated to introduce the principle into the law of nations at first, is a motive to an enlarged and benignant construction and application of it to the rights of the individual, and to a vast advance on the atrocious system of what we call natural society. It was a grand triumph of reason as well as humanity. Policy and wisdom carried the world up to it, as well as right feeling. It is a duty to relieve the world of its horrors while it lasts; to make it easier to go back to it, which is the true condition of man; to ameliorate the stern lot of the millions whom, in one age and to one country and another, force or patriotism crowded to the stake of the individual, and to lift them out of a vulgar and dreary business of general butchery to a service of glory, in which great souls may engage without degradation and without deterioration. These were the motives in which the law of nations was made part at first of the law of nations, and every one of them is to give it the most expanded application in the light of this better day. Sur, it is one of the brightest glories of civilization. Do not cause it to be dimmed by a prejudice or an affectation of severity, and to do so would be to misconceive the direction in which the world is moving. I do not know when was shall wholly cease, but I believe, I trust, that as the world comes nearer to that time, it will regard war more and more as a crime as an enormous evil if a necessary evil, and will desire to relieve it more and more every day, by the offices of Christian and of chivalrous forbearance towards individual actors, struck down, disarmed, and unresisting.

Giving, then, to the law of personal immunity that enlarged effect which the time and the country demand, let us attend to the special circumstances, one by one, which mark the case of McLeod, and see if they do or do not leave him the protection which is thrown round the captive of ruin, regular war.

In the first place, observe that the expedition on which he went out was an expedition of a regular kind, as an expedition to rob the coast, or to rob a merchant, or to throw an assassin or spy into an enemy's camp, by which happy analogies we have had illustrated. It was an enterprise of war; undertaken under the iron responsibilities, surrounded by the insupportable duties of war. Its exact legal denomination is informal, insouthern hostility. Let us call things by their right names, and hold England and hold ourselves up consistently to this view of the transaction. Look at it. There was a forcible temporary occupation of our territory, and armed forces, body, acting in organization, sent across by a foreign government, as a government, not for plunder, but as an alleged grave measure of state policy—for the alleged defence of its own soil and its own law against revolutionary invaders from without. What sort of act is that, sir? The mover is a government; the inducement a high reason of state; the instruments and the effects such as ordinarily do, and mark the giant tread of war. Armed men violently assail a neutral nation, to which we are friendly by our citizens, repelling, as we allege, beneath the protection, not forfeited, of the folds of our flag. It is the cry of brief, but actual battle, which rises above the murmur of that onward, unreturning stream. The peace of our territory was disturbed; its sanctity was violated, the chartered life of an American citizen was taken in flight, the property of an American citizen, itself part of the general wealth of the community, was destroyed. This, sir, in the language of the publicists, is "information" against the United States, and the responsibility of England who ordered it to be committed, and the immunity of the soldiers who enforced the order with the bayonet and cutlass, result, of course, according to the principle on which, as I have said, we all take our oaths, to which all publicists agree. I do not say that by this act England intended to begin a war on the United States or to impair our strength, diminish our treasure, or insult our flag as a nation. Certainly not. But the act which she did was to invade our territory, and to do so, fully, for the purpose of reaching and destroying the property of one of our citizens, which she had no right so to reach and so to destroy, and to effect that purpose by military violence and by shedding innocent blood in battle. And this act was committed, because our rights are outraged, and they are outraged by the methods and the processes, and according to the forms of war; and because every nation and every man must be held to intend the acts which he does, and their necessary consequences. How you distinguish this proceeding from the attack on Copenhagen, in 1800, to which the senator from Virginia alluded last evening? What was that transaction? England, eternally no hostile feeling against Denmark. Sir, for Denmark, likewise, was actually in arms against the emperor of the French, conceived a fear that that ancient, gallant, but in which case her sixteen ships of war would become his—a formidable accession to the strength which he was now gathering for the purpose of universal subjugation. Thereupon the great admiral Gambier to Copenhagen, bombarded it, killed and wounded above a thousand persons, and carried off the whole Danish fleet. That is, she forcibly invades the Danish territory for the purpose of possessing herself of divers ships, of which, as against Denmark, she had no right to take possession; not for the purpose of weakening or insulting her, but to prevent her becoming, in other hands, the instruments of annoyance against herself. She takes possession of our territory with military force, for the purpose of possessing herself of a vessel, of which, as against us, she had no right thus to take possession; not to weaken or insult us, but to prevent its being, in other hands, the instrument of annoyance against herself. The case is alike cases of informal war against the nation whose national rights are invaded. In the affair of Copenhagen, the object of the invasion was the capture of the Danish government ships. If, instead of that, it had been the Danish merchant ships, instead of the Danish merchant vessels, the codfish of France, or to transport French munitions of war, would this act have been at all the less an act of hostility against Denmark? Nay, if Denmark had been neutral, and the object had been to cut out a French ship which had fled to Copenhagen for shelter, it would still have been a hostile aggression against Denmark herself. The attack upon Copenhagen was upon a grander scale than that upon the Caroline; more ships, more men, greater names, a more picturesque arrangement of the spectacles of war. But the essential character, the legal name, the legal consequences, national and personal, were the same. Sir, if you government trespasses on the rights of another by the employment of warlike instruments, it is, to the extent of the trespass, war on the injured nation.

It is no excuse to a second and far more important circumstance. The expedition in which he served was the act of a government competent to compel him to serve. Independent of, and prior to any knowledge or approval of the act by the mother country, it was so. I wholly reject the suggestion that this daring enterprise was at first an unauthorized proceeding of individuals, and that it subsequently became the act of a government by ratification. From beginning to end it was the work of a government, and of a government having a right to exact McLeod's obedience to the last drop of his blood. Who sent and conducted the attack? The colonial authorities. Such is, for substance, the explicit declaration of Mr. Fox. Such is the legal conclusion from the facts stated by Sir Francis Head in his dispatch of the 20th January, 1838. So the matter stands exactly thus. The colonial authorities, especially empowered col. McNab to defend her majesty's territories and to defend her majesty's subjects. Such is the concurrent statement of Mr. Fox and Sir Francis Head. For this purpose, they expressly empowered him to adopt all useful defensive measures, and they thereby clothed him by inevitable implication with the discretionary power of judging what measures were needful. In the exercise of that discretion, he judged this measure to be needful, and he adopted it. Now, for the protection of the soldiers by whom it was achieved, it is precisely as if the colonial authorities had directly and in person planned and commanded it. Col. McNab for this purpose conclusively represented them. How could it be otherwise? Suppose, for instance, that the judgment of the official representative was erroneous? Sir, he had the right, and was bound to assume it to be the judgment of the colonial authorities. And who were they? Why, as between the mother country and the colonies, they were the question of individual immunity as between McLeod and ourselves, they were his rightful and only government. Nice questions may be moved on the complicity of a colonial government from its supposed negligence in the neglect to send a foot an enterprise of war. But it is every where conceded that such a government may undertake defensive war. The mother country, by the act of establishing it, clothes it with the power and imposes on it the duty of defence, and, until she has done so, she is the party of judging for itself in the first instance how that duty shall be done. When, therefore, it resolves that a particular measure of war is necessary for its defence, and that the crisis requires a blow to be struck at once, and without waiting for advice from the paramount power at home, it may call the whole colonial population to arms by day or night, and obedience to such a call is as rightful as unavoidable, and as effective for individual immunity as the obedience of a conscript to an imperial summons. Such was the case with McLeod to say that the colonial authorities misjudged on the question of necessity? They told him the defence of the territory and of the constitution of Upper Canada required this act. Did he conceive that he could command a soldier to disobey? Could he have held all the elements of a sounder opinion? Consider that to the colonial residents the colonial government is every thing. It is all of majesty, of monarchy, of aristocracy that he ever sees in his life. To that government he is bound to obey, and consider, too, that the spirit of this grand principle of individual responsibility is, that doma fide obedience to his actual and lawful government on a requisition of warlike service shall never be reckoned an impeachment of his conscience.

You have before you, then, the case of a government commanding a subject, who was bound to obey, to shoulder his musket for the defence of his country. It is true, the senator from Pennsylvania tells us, that McLeod was a volunteer. But he deceives us. Direct coercion from the local power at home, because he remembers that, by the admitted doctrine of international law, no distinction is recognized between volunteer and any other soldiers. He will remember that Vattel, at page 401, is a direct authority in this. In the case of a volunteer, there can be no distinction. The regular enlisted soldier engages voluntarily, at first, for a longer term and for all service; the volunteer engages for a shorter term and for a special service. But both alike go forth to execute an authoritative public will, and both stand, therefore, on the same plain of immunity and hazard. Therefore, sir, in a great number of all nations, it is, and of ours more than all others, to hold a rule of international law on this subject that shall make their inhabitants willing and ready to leap to arms, at half a moment's warning, at the midnight cry of host country.

You have then, I repeat, the case of a government commanding a subject to go forth to an enterprise of war. Why is he not, then, within the terms and spirit of the great principle of immunity which we all agree surrounds the soldier in formal and public war? What are the peculiarities that distinguish this particular service from the general trade of war? Why, sir, they are said to be these: that it was a single act of hostility, not preceded nor followed by any other, not preceded by a declaration, and wholly unprovoked. This is all true; but for the objects of this inquiry it is wholly immaterial: sir, publicists and the practice of nations recognise various modes, kinds and degrees of hostility. War is not always general or "perfect," nor is it always preceded by a declaration. It sometimes begins and ends with one single crushing blow. Such was the attack on Copenhagen, in 1801, and that in 1808. It may be limited to one single act of reprisals, by a single individual, under a license commencing with his blood. It may be limited to the loss of his ship. When our government gives him letters of marque to help himself to another. In point of fact, too, war often begins without any declaration at all, at home or abroad. The bolt outruns the flash. Modern history is full of such examples; but I spare you the rehearsal of them. Now, sir, what I would say, is, that, for the purposes of immunity to the soldier and sailor, all these modes, kinds and degrees of war come exactly to the same thing. They are all and alike modes of governmental action, involving only governmental responsibility. In many things they certainly differ one from another; some of them are more chivalrous, more magnanimous, more conformable with a strict and punctilious proceeding and a technical law of war than others; some of them afford less ground of complaint to the government assailed than others. But, for the purpose of personal irresponsibility, they are all one and the same thing. In reason it must be so. Consider that a leading object of this principle of immunity is to secure to the individual soldier and sailor, in his position and patriotism who furnish the rank and file of war. It is to protect the common soldier. And what an unavailing, uncertain, enfeebling thing it would prove for him if his title to it depended on such a trifling and so uncertain ground. How can he know whether the way to which you bury him away from all that is dearest to him in the world is just or unjust? How does he know by what heralds of declaration it has been preceded? How does he know whether the death might be the death of an enterprise, or whether it is designed to kindle the fires of a war that shall encircle the world? Sir, he knows only that his own government, in obedience to which he was bred, that the land of his father's graves, bids him go forth; and that, if he shrinks for a moment from his post when the storm of battle rages highest, he dies by the hands of his officers; and he goes forth relying on the armed but mainly justice of civilized war.

And so are all the authorities. The senator from Virginia recited them so copiously to you last evening that I shall spare you the repetition, and content myself with a reference or two. The senator from Pennsylvania, in his speech of the 10th of January, that the attack on the Caroline was unjust. But look into Vattel, on pages 380 and 383, and Rutherford, 2d volume, page 446, and you find that they concur that the injustice of the war does not affect the soldier's title to immunity. If, if it did, the nation would at once return to the murder of prisoners; for was there ever a war in which each belligerent did not think his antagonist in the wrong?

But you say this was only a single act of hostility; broken out in a time of general peace, unprovoked by any injury. Sir, was not? But Rutherford expressly declares that this does not withdraw from it the law of immunity. I read at large the passage from page 448 of his second volume, and command it the meditations of the senator from Pennsylvania. It is a doctrine, sir, that, in respect to the members of a civil society, extends to public wars of the imperfect sort, to reprisals, or to other acts of hostility.

Such is the doctrine of this publicist, vindicated and illustrated by the history of the real and approved by the heart and judgment of universal civilized man. Against this authority there cannot be placed one solitary act of a Christian nation for the last five hundred years, nor one word of any writer who undertakes to record the existing systems of international law. What is the nation now on earth, or descended into the graves of empire; what is the modern Christian nation that has shed the blood of a prince because it was to which his government detached him was informal, haughty, unannounced by a declaration, beginning and ending with one single act! Call up the nation, if such there is or has been, and let it answer to the outraged spirit of law! But Denmark claim the right to do such an atrocity; humble and exasperated by the repeated bombardment of her capital; did that ancient and gallant race ever dream of avenging the defeat of the castle by the triumph of the galleon? Did Spain, in 1804, England, in a time of peace, intercept her treasure ships returning from America, and captured or destroyed them?

Nor can you find, as I have said, a word in any approved expounder of the actual law of nations, in opposition to the act of Rutherford. Ditta, of Great Britain, seem to conflict with what I have said seem to conflict with it. Even these the senator from Pennsylvania has not availed himself of, because he knows that Grotius, admirable for his genius, his studies, his most enlarged and excellent spirit, lived too early to witness the development of his own grand principles and the accomplishment of his own philanthropic wishes. The existing law of nations has been slowly built up since his time, and to term it we must have recourse to writers far inferior in capacity and learning, but fortunate in being able to record the ameliorated theory and practice of a better day than his. From one of these can you cite any thing in opposition to the authority I have relied on. The senator from Pennsylvania thought he had discovered some such doctrine as he needs in the 75th section of book 2d, chapter 6th, of Vattel. But the senator from Virginia was entirely accurate in his observation upon this passage; that it plainly refers to the case of an individual acting without authority from his government, and to nothing else. And then, in support of the position of Rutherford, I may remind you that, as the law of nations is held to be, now requires to be preceded by a declaration of war. Martens, 4th ed., 24. Wheaton, 1st ed., 12; 1st of Keul's Commentaries, 54, 2d ed. Defensive war is not required it, according to any theory. Vattel, §17. But it was defensive war in which McLeod's government assured him that he was summoned forth. The law of declaration, therefore, cannot affect him, unless we are guilty of the indecent and ludicrous barbarity of requiring him to judge better than his government on the necessity of resorting to a particular measure of armed resistance to a threatened invasion.

I submit, then, sir, that McLeod is not responsible as for crime against the universal law of New York or of this union by participating in this act of English national wrong. Criminal in England, in his time it was no crime. Let me add that if, in thoughtlessness or anger, we had stooped to shed his blood, it would have impressed a stain on the radiant flag of our pride and love which a hundred victories, ay, a hundred years of victory, would not wash away.

The concession of the secretary of state was right, then, in point of international law. But the senator from Pennsylvania thinks he ought not to have made it, right or wrong. I submit, then, as the second place, that he ought to have made it, and the government to have acted on it, exactly as it was made and acted on.

What was the duty of the secretary of state on the 13th of March last, when McLeod, guilty of no inhuman or criminal act, was taken into our participation in the attack on the Caroline, had been indicted, imprisoned and ordered for trial to be had on the 22d of March, as for such crime, under circumstances justifying a reasonable anxiety lest he might fall a victim to a natural and a frenzied, more popular excitement; and when her majesty's minister came forward, announced the doctrine of international law, which we all know to be just, and demanded that McLeod should be held answerable to immunities of law? What was the secretary of state to do? Should he have wrapped his diplomatic mantle about him and have answered, sir, I do not know about your doctrine of international law, the American government is not advised exactly whether it is to be a nation of war or not; besides, it happens to have nothing at all to do with the matter; McLeod is in the hands of the state of New York; a great and patriotic state, Mr. Minister, giving forty odd electoral votes; she will do what is right; if she hangs him, why then we shall know that he deserved it; and if she does not, so much the better for himself. Should he really, so saying, have bowed the minister out, and have retreated into an epicurean heaven of indifference and non-commitment, until he or you were startled by the thunder of an enemy's cannon—a most I acknowledge at which a brave nation has no great objection at any moment to wake up! No, sir, I submit, on the contrary that the duty of our government was perfectly clear, to avow its acknowledgment of the doctrine of international law advanced by the minister; to declare its purpose to do what it constitutionally might to secure McLeod the benefit of it; to do it; and then having moved this department to the contrary, to insist on it, and to demand satisfaction at once of England for the burning of the Caroline, as that language is understood among nations of the first class. To simplify the matter somewhat, suppose that McLeod had at that moment been in our jail, in our courts instead of those of New York, then, I repeat, it was most palpably our duty to have conceded the proposition of law; to have expressed our assurance that the courts would acquit him of the accusation of crime against our municipal law, and to have acted as a general agent representing the government would enter a nolle prosequi, thus committing him to the disposal of the executive as a prisoner, or a quasi prisoner of war, or whatever else his legal character might be; and, in fact, to set our lives right before God and man, to call this island mistress of a thousand ships of war to instant account.

That this was the duty of our government is too plain to be debated. But what is the law of nations? What is not its duty to be just? And was not this bare justice to McLeod, to England, to the universal spirit of humanity? Was it not its duty to preserve peace if it might be had with honor, and if war must come, to act as a general agent representing the government would enter a nolle prosequi, thus committing him to the disposal of the executive as a prisoner, or a quasi prisoner of war, or whatever else his legal character might be; and, in fact, to set our lives right before God and man, to call this island mistress of a thousand ships of war to instant account.

That this was the duty of our government is too plain to be debated. But what is the law of nations? What is not its duty to be just? And was not this bare justice to McLeod, to England, to the universal spirit of humanity? Was it not its duty to preserve peace if it might be had with honor, and if war must come, to act as a general agent representing the government would enter a nolle prosequi, thus committing him to the disposal of the executive as a prisoner, or a quasi prisoner of war, or whatever else his legal character might be; and, in fact, to set our lives right before God and man, to call this island mistress of a thousand ships of war to instant account.

I repeat, then, sir, that if, on the 12th of March, McLeod is in our jails, in our courts of the United States, we ought to have replied to the demand of her majesty's minister thus: We admit your proposition of international law; we are not quite so rude and recent among the nations as not to be told that the law of the courts is the law of the earth together. From this accusation of municipal offence, your subject is safe. And now will you in your turn inform us (for three years we have waited in vain to know) on what pretence her majesty's forces, at the dead hour of night, crossed the inviolate line of our boundary, invaded our soil, dishonored our flag, wasted the property and shed the blood of American citizens?

It happened, however, that at the time when this demand was made, McLeod was awaiting his trial in the courts of New York. He was in a New York prison, under New York process, and the distinguished senator from Pennsylvania insists that for this cause, at least, the government should have done otherwise and would not have done so, but just have directed Mr. Fox to tell his story and carry his law to New York. We should have made no concessions of the legal principle; we should not have dared to communicate to this executive that this state should be the mistress of the ocean, and of the doctrine of England, and our own opinion of it; we should have lifted a finger; as should have stood speechless, unconvulsed, innocent and dignified, to see England, New York and McLeod settle this little concern of national law, peace, war, life and death, among themselves.

Sir, the position McLeod stood in to that great and admirable state undoubtedly limited the rights and embarrassed the action of the general government, and so much the more ought we to do all that would, were we not to do the little that we could? Were we to do nothing? Whom have we offended? The state of New York? How? By desiring to secure to this prisoner, to whose fate interests so large and so great are at stake, a fair trial? Sir, I cannot believe it. New York was proceeding against him in the ordinary course of the administration of criminal law. To recognise her jurisdiction over him, which in the simplest manner this government did, and then just what New York wished for him, that first of social privileges—a fair trial: was there in this anything to affront her pride of character? any thing to ruffle a feather in the plumes of her acknowledged prerogative?

But was sought to operate on the government of that state by communicating our opinion on the points of international law, and in effect advising it what course to pursue. Well, sir, does the conveyance of advice imply respect towards the object of it, or a denial of its liberty or its capacity? Does it prove any thing more than that you feel a deep solicitude that, in a great crisis of its fortunes and yours, he shall, for his sake and yours, make no mistake? Sir, here we are in a state with the physical power to make a war on the national law, if hostilities followed the execution of McLeod, it would not have been a war on New York alone, but on Louisiana, on South Carolina, on Maryland, on Massachusetts. If they should be more than satisfied with the result, they would say your treasure must have united with hers, for her defence. A state, then, might plunge you in a general war; and yet, under the constitution, no state has the legal and direct right to make a war for you or for herself. Still, sir, we are in a state with the power, after it has begun. That great prerogative is yours alone. Those transcendent imperial powers, by which and through which we are known to the nations, are your powers. And now is it possible that a state, prohibited by the constitution from making war, from making treaties, may construe an act for which we must answer with our best blood, on the field and on the deck; and yet that this government, clothed by the constitution with all these great trusts, charged with the conservation of the peace of the world, and the prevention of hazards of war—this government, whose flag alone it is that waves over the universal American flag, wherever a member of it wanders, on land or sea; that we cannot respectfully approach any state with the proposition of a friendly suggestion, and deliberate with her on a subject of great novelty, difficulty and importance? I have no great opinion of such transcendental delicacy as this—good for winning electoral votes, possibly, but unfit for a man of government, of ability and useful action. Sir, New York is ably represented here, by gentlemen of both political parties, and they can answer for her; but I believe all will laugh to scorn the suggestion we hear of doors, that any disrespect has been shown or felt for her government or her people, for her judicial learning, or for the temper, feelings and views of any portion of her wide spread community.

In judging on this part of the subject, is this inquiry into the power of the government, its extended powers, invaded state rights, or betrayed indecorous anxiety and haste to save a person from the gallows, I ask you to take one thing into your consideration. Sir, it is an answer at all to England to say this of the government of New York, and nothing even of that magnificent empire state as a separate state. We do not allow her to know any thing of any state by our federal constitution in that capacity. We do not allow her to have diplomatic access to any. To attempt to make a treaty with any could be clear ground of war. To inform her that, by our federal constitution, the foreign relations of New York are reported here; and if she has any cause of complaint against her, she will please to leave her card at our door. England, of course, all the nations, must hold us to this; and if any state affords her quarters, it is as argument as that we ourselves direct her to turn her steel. At the same time, therefore, that our federal relations to New York hindered us from doing much, our obligation on the laws of nations, to England, to do anything was not in the least degree lessened by them. The clear course of the government, therefore, was to do what it did, to appraise that patriotic and noble state of our opinions on the justice of the demand of England; to do what we decorously could to avert so senseless and fatal an act as the execution of the prisoner; to have his case fairly tried, and, if needful, to have his case brought into the national tribunals; to explain to England why we could go no further, and then abide the result. Any feeling, every thing we could better than a war on such a ground, that no man could bear of a defeat or a victory without tears of bitterest humiliation for America.

Mr. President, I have one duty more to perform, so much to the secretaries of state as to my own feelings, and then I shall have done. I have said that it was the business of the government, after, as far as was practicable, clearing itself of fault in the matter of McLeod, to demand satisfaction, with honor and dignity, from England, for the administration for three years, for the destruction of the Caroline. Gentlemen will do the secretary of state the justice to remember that for the larger part of the letter to Mr. Fox is devoted to the performance of what must have been done, and that it is his most agreeable duty. They will concede, too, that this part of his work is eminently well done. I should not degrade the work which I hold in this high place by public allusion of any man, even of him. That he is my good and constant friend would be no question with me. Let me say that the ability and spirit with which this paper is written will give it a high place among the ablest diplomatic compositions which enrich the archives of even the department of state. He has vindicated the government of his country from all administration, making no narrow, unnatural distinctions between them, for every shadow of blame in reference to the Canadian border troubles; has proved that, so far from permitting or conniving at any part of the wrong in this case, our people were an example to the world; we have been the first nation in the world to prohibit our citizens from making any force of war on a country with whose government our own government was at peace; has proved that England had no right to make so rash and total an invasion on this. Sir, with this letter unrecalled, I think no English minister will vilify us again, at the end of three or four years, that he understood our claim for satisfaction has been withdrawn.

That this argument is ably conducted, you all admit. But the course of the distinguished secretary's observations makes it more immediately due to Mr. Webster to remind you that the argument is so conducted as not only to inform the public judgment about this wrong, but to excite just sensibilities in relation to it. It is so conducted as not only to enlighten the understanding, but to lift up the spirit of the country. He has not stooped to pick out and bluster about what is called the language of threat, but he has met the whole claim and the whole case of England on our people, with a decision, and with a manly decision; in the temper of a statesman, who holds the peace and glory of his country in his hands.

The senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) last evening led us to a portion of this paper. Let me add to its distinguished author's praise, that among you, again, though absent from this scene of his long and splendid series of patriotic service, to speak to himself.

Under these circumstances, and under those immediately connected with this transaction itself, it will be for her majesty's government to show upon what state of facts and what rules of national law the destruction of the Caroline is to be defended. It will be for that government to show a necessity of self-defense, instead of an unprovoked and unprovoked choice of quarrel and no moment for deliberation. It will be for it to show, also, that the local authorities of Canada, even supposing the necessity of the moment authorized them to enter the territories of the United States at all, were not justified in the excessive, since the act, justified by the necessity of self-defense, must be limited by that necessity, and kept clearly within it.

It must be shown that admission or remonstrance to the persons on board the 'Caroline' was impracticable, or would have been unavailing; it must be shown that day had come and waited for; that there could be no attempt at discrimination between the innocent and the guilty; that it would not have been enough to seize and detain the vessel; but that there was a necessity, present and inevitable, for attacking her in the darkness of the night, while anchored to the shore, and while unarmed men were asleep on board, killing some and wounding others, and then drawing her into the current, above the cañon, setting her on fire, and, careless to know whether there might not be in her the innocent with the guilty, or the living with the dead, committing her to a fate which fills the imagination with horror. A necessity for all this, the government of the United States cannot believe to have existed."

To these hands, for one, I am willing to entrust the rights and the fame of my country.

Mr. President, I concur entirely with both the senators who have preceded me that there need be no apprehension of a war with England. Like me, I neither expect nor desire it. Heaven forbid! I know of nothing between the governments that ought not to be and may not be easily and honorably composed. But whatever may befall, I claim it as the praise of this administration, that it has had the manliness to sack peace by justice; and that it has done so, it has done so, it has done so, to enable us so to go into it that we may have the approval of our own consciences, self respect, the moral judgments of the world, and may I not add, the God of our fathers with us in the conflict. Mr. Coss said: I rise with the intention of stating very briefly the conclusion to which my reflections have brought me on the question before us.

Permit me, at the outset, to premise that I heartily approve of the principle so often repeated in this discussion, that our true policy, in connection with our foreign relations, is neither to do nor to suffer wrong, not only because the principle is right of itself, but because it is, in its application to us, wise and politic, as well as right. Peace is pre-eminently our policy. Our road to greatness is not over the seas of others, but in the quiet and peaceful development of our immeasurably great internal resources—in subduing our vast forests, perfecting the means of internal intercourse throughout our extended country, and in drawing forth its unnumbered, unmanufactured, unimproved, and unexplored resources. In this simple field, all the industry, ingenuity, enterprise and energy of our people may find full employment for centuries to come; and, through its successful cultivation, we may, in time, not only to a state of pre-eminence, but to that of greatness and influence over the destiny of the human race, higher than has ever been attained by any by the most renowned nations of ancient or modern times. War, so far from accelerating, can but retard our march to greatness. It is, then, not only our duty, but our policy, to avoid it, as long as it can be, with honor and a just regard to our rights; and, as one of the most certain means of avoiding war, we ought to observe strict justice in our intercourse with others. But that is not all sufficient. We must exact justice as well as render justice, and be prepared to do so; for where there is an example to be found of either individual or nation, that has preserved peace by yielding to unjust demands.

It is in the spirit of these remarks that I have investigated this subject before us, without the slightest party feelings, but with an anxious desire not to embarrass existing negotiations between the two governments, or influence in any degree pending judicial proceedings. My sole object is to ascertain, on the principle already stated, and on which all acknowledge to be fundamental in our foreign policy, has in fact been respected in this present case. I regret to state that the result of my investigation is a conviction that it has not. I have concluded, therefore, that the conclusion that the secretary of state has not met the pre-emptory demand of the British government for the immediate release of McLeod as he ought; the reasons for which, without further remark, I will now proceed to state.

That demand, as stated in the letter, rests on the alleged fact, that the transaction for which McLeod was arrested is a public one, that it was committed by the order of the colonial authorities, who were invested with unlimited power to defend the colony, and that the government at home has sanctioned both the order and its execution. On this point, the British minister's action is entirely correct; the orders of his government, demanded his immediate release, on the broad ground that, he, as well as others engaged with him, was "performing an act of public duty, for which he cannot be made personally and individually responsible to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country," thus assuming as an universal principle of international law, that where a government, authorities or approve of an act of an individual, it makes it the act of the government, and thereby exempts the individual from all responsibility to the injured country. To this demand, resting on this broad and universal principle, our secretary of state assented; and, in conformity, gave the instruction to the attorney general, which is attached to the correspondence, and we have thus presented for our consideration the grave question, do the laws of nations recognize any such exemption from the laws and morals, as applicable to individuals, so far modified, and no further, as reason may make necessary in their application to nations. Now, there can be no doubt that the analogous rule, when applied to individuals, is, that they are responsible for their acts, if you will, instruments, are responsible in criminal cases, and really the reverse of the rule on which the demand for the release of McLeod is made. Why, I ask, should the rule in this case be reversed, when applied to nations, for the determination of our great commercial matters—New York and others—and that the band employed to blow up Fort Hamilton, or any other of the fortresses for the defense of New York, should be detected in the very act of firing the train, would the United States government, as these papers, signed by all the authorities of the British government, make it a public transaction, and exempt the villain from all responsibility to the laws and tribunals? Or would that government do this, in the case of a nation, and not in the case of an individual? Or, it would, would our duty yield to it, and release them? The supposition, I know, is altogether improbable; but it is not less so, on that account, calculated to test the principle.

But, it is said, that the United States may possibly concede. Suppose then, in contemplation of the same event, black emissaries should be sent from Jamaica, to tamper with our slaves in the south, and that they should be detected at midnight, in an assembly of slaves, where they were organizing those to rise in rebellion against their masters, and that they should produce the authority of the home government, in the most solemn form, authorizing them to what they did: ought that to exempt the culprits from all responsibility to our laws and tribunals? Or, if arrested, ought our government to release them on a pre-emptory demand to do so? And if that could not be done lawfully, from the embarrassment of state laws and state authorities, ought this government to employ counsel and to use its authority and influence to effect it? And, if that could not accomplish its object, would it be justified in taking the case into their own tribunals, with the view of entering a non prosequit?

But, setting aside all suppositions cases, I shall take the case as it is, and as it is, I shall take it as it is. Suppose, then, that a man, named Henry, employed by the colonial authorities of Jamaica to tamper with a portion of our people, prior to the late war, with the intention of alienating them from their government, and effecting a dissolution in the event of hostilities. Suppose he had been detected, arrested for his crime, and that the British government had made the like demand for his release, on the ground that he was executing the orders of his government, and was not, therefore, liable, personally or individually, to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country. The government be bound to comply with the demand?

To all these questions and thousands of others that might be asked, ought-minded man can have for a moment to answer in the negative. The rule, then, that does exist, is, that nations are responsible. But does it exist at all? Does it even in a state of war, when, if ever, if we may judge from the remarks of gentlemen on the opposite side, it must? They seemed to consider nothing more was necessary to justify a nation in the act of shedding blood, than to show that this and all other cases, armed violence on the part of one nation or its citizens against another is in fact war; internal war, as they call it, in contradistinction from one proceeding by a declaration in due form.

The bill appropriating for a limited time the proceeds of the public lands to the several states, and for granting lands to certain states, was read a second time, and referred to the committee on the public lands.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Smith, of Indiana, calling on the secretary of the treasury for information in relation to the public lands, was adopted.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. Benton, calling on the president for certain information, were severally considered and adopted.

Mr. Sevier, expressing the intention to move a resolution, first called for the reading of a clause in the report of the secretary of war which alluded to certain lands perpetrated in the southwest in the execution of Indian treaties. The clause having been read, he then sent to the chair a letter from J. R. Stevenson, disbursing agent, inquiring whether he was to consider himself as included in the clause referred to.

Mr. S. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to furnish the senate with the names of all the contractors in the southwest who have received enormous profits under Indian annuities, involving the disbursements of large sums of money for the emigration and subsistence of Indians, as referred to by him in his communication to the president on the 31st May, 1841, and which profits were effected by bringing some of the subordinate instruments in the public employments, furnishing the names of these instruments, or through the management of higher public agents, giving the names of those agents, who can only screen themselves from suspicion of a conspiracy in the frauds by submitting to the commission of gross negligence or of ignorance or incapacity in the performance of their duty; and that he furnish to the senate the names of all the parties referred to, whether agents of high or subordinate grade, and of the contractors, and the testimony upon which his communication is predicated.

After some conversation, the resolution was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Preston's resolution of inquiry concerning the return of a portion of our fleet in the Mediterranean having been taken up—

Mr. Preston modified it so as to make it a call for the correspondence of our minister in England with the officers of the Mediterranean squadron and the despatches addressed by captain Bolton to the secretary of the navy.

After some conversation between the mover and Mr. Sevier as to the distinction between this call and that relating to the transfer of Gen. Arbuckle, the resolution, having been slightly modified, was agreed to.

The following resolution, moved some days ago by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, having been taken up for consideration—

Resolved, That when the senate adjourn during the present session leaving a subject under discussion and undecided, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed at the next meeting of the senate immediately after the journal is read, and petitions and reports are received, without waiting for the usual hour of one o'clock.

The resolution was debated by Messrs. Benton, Clay, Young, Bayard, Buchanan, King, Cuthoun and Allen, when Mr. Cuthoun suggested that the resolution be so far amended as to add "resolutions" after "reports."

Mr. Clay declined accepting this as a modification.

Mr. Walker wished it to include calls to a committee.

Mr. Cuthoun moved to lay the resolution on the table but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. Bayard, who suggested the expediency of inserting an exception in favor of resolutions of inquiry touching the subjects that might be under discussion.

Mr. Cuthoun renewed his motion to lay on the table, on which the yeas and nays, being called resulted as follows: yeas 19, nays 27.

Mr. Clay now signified his willingness to accept the amendment proposed by Mr. Bayard, though he did not consider it as necessary.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to amend the amendment by striking out the latter clause, "respecting subjects under discussion," and supported his motion by some remarks in favor of allowing calls on the departments for information.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, replied that the effect of this would be to send the resolution perfectly satisfactory. He assured gentlemen that there was no disposition on his side of the house to prevent inquiry. He certainly had none himself. But did the gentlemen really imagine that, because as a minority they possessed no majority, they had the right of controlling the business of congress? Suppose one of them should introduce a resolution, for example, on the subject of prescription, and the senate should be drawn off to debate on that subject, what a sadly ludicrous spectacle would they not present to the American people, debating for months this matter of prescription? Would a country like that obey the will and fulfill the expectations of the American people? The presentation of resolutions would not be prevented by this rule, save at times when an important subject was under discussion, and remained undecided. He was glad that gentlemen would insist on going, at this called session, into general unrestricted legislation.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, here suggested that if the object was to prevent the consumption of the whole morning till one o'clock on matters not connected with those great subjects for which the session had been called, that might easily be accomplished by so modifying the resolution as to set apart one hour for the consideration of memorials, reports and resolutions. He suggested that modification, and asked if it was unnecessary.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, replied that he really wished to see the business of the senate done in the manner most agreeable to gentlemen on all sides of the house. If gentlemen would be content with those great subjects to be brought before the senate, he would assent to such an arrangement, very well, he, for one, would assent to such an arrangement.

At the suggestion of Mr. King, of Alabama, Mr. Clay further modified the resolution by adding the words, "and otherwise ordered by the senate." And the resolution in its finally amended shape was then adopted as follows:

Resolved, That during the present session, at the expiration of one hour after the meeting of the senate at each session, the subject last introduced by the mover of the subject left unfinished the preceding day, unless otherwise ordered by the senate.

Resolved, That the select committee to whom was referred the question of reporting to the senate on the subject of a fiscal agent for the government of the United States, be directed to inquire into the expediency of vesting the control of said agency in a board of six directors, located at the city of Washington, to be chosen by a joint vote of both houses of congress, two of said directors to be elected at each successive vote, each member being permitted to vote only on each occasion for one director, so as to prevent said board being placed under the control of the executive or of any party.

Resolved, That said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of tendering to the states branches of said fiscal agency, on the condition that said states have first entered into an agreement with each other for the gradual and prospective limitation or abandonment of the banking power of the said states.

Resolved, That said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of confining said agency to the use of gold and silver, and of bills receivable of the government of the United States, in large denominations, excluding all the paper of the said banks, and so as to retain an adequate supply and circulation of gold as well as silver at all times in the United States.

Resolved, That said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of applying prospectively the bankrupt power of this government to the state banks.

The resolutions were then laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

A report was received and read from the secretary of the treasury, containing the heads of the proposed plan for a fiscal bank of the United States, accompanied by a bill in correspondence with it.

The bill and report were referred to the select committee on the currency, and 1,500 extra copies of both were ordered to be printed.

The senate then went into the election of a chaplain.

When the rev. Mr. Tutin, having received 29 votes, was declared duly elected.

And the senate adjourned.

June 14. Memorials in favor of a bankrupt law were presented by Messrs. Egan, Wright and Henderson.

Mr. Berrien, from the committee on the judiciary, made a report on a memorial praying for an increase of the salary of the district judge of Louisiana, in favor of the object, but praying to be discharged from the consideration of it, until the next session.

Petitions were presented on the subject of a national bank, for it by Mr. Kerr, and against it by Mr. Wright.

The resolution offered by Mr. Benton, calling for a report of the payment of the treasury for the last three months, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. Woodbury moved an amendment, making the call more specific.

Mr. Benton then moved to lay the resolution on the table, yeas 22, nays 19.

Mr. Benton gave notice that he should ask the consideration to-morrow.

Mr. Walker submitted a resolution instructing the committee on the public lands to inquire into the expediency of making a modification of the bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, so as to make it a law for a general pre-emption system, which was agreed to.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Woodbury, calling on the president to inform the senate if any applications had been made to him by boy state stocks, was taken up and agreed to.

The resolution offered by Mr. Sevier, calling on the secretary of war to state the names of the contractors for the removal of the Indians in the south west who made exorbitant profits, &c. was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. Morehead suggested the postponement of the subject until the charges of the secretary of war shall have been investigated.

Mr. Sevier reiterated what he had before stated on this subject. He feared that the inquiry about to be entered into by the senate was a sort of a star chamber investigation, and would be conducted in an ex parte manner. He wished to know also how the migrating Seminoles were provided with food, whether they are fed by contract or not fed at all. He would stand by the secretary at least in ferreting out any real abuses, and he wished to know the names of the parties.

Mr. Morehead said he would go with the senator at the proper time, but he thought it would be better to suspend the call for the present. He had called on the secretary of war, and had had a conversation with him on the subject, and he assured the senator that a call at this moment would but embarrass the inquiries of the secretary. The secretary in the present state of the inquiry would not be able to furnish any satisfactory answer to the call because the proceedings were incomplete.

Mr. Morehead moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Sevier asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 22.

The special order, being the motion of Mr. Rives to refer the message of the president in relation to our foreign affairs to a select committee on foreign affairs, was taken up, and the debate at least in reference to Mr. Buchanan adjourned.

June 15. The president of the senate laid before that body three several messages from the treasury department in compliance with resolutions of the 8th inst. which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Tulandage, from citizens of New York, for a bankrupt law.

By Mr. White, from a number of citizens of Indiana, for the enactment of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Wright, from citizens of New York, for the enactment of a bankrupt law.

On motion of Mr. Dixon, the senate proceeded to consider the resolution relative to the election of a public printer.

The senate then proceeded to ballot for public printer, when Mr. Thomas Allen, having received 27 votes, was declared duly elected.

The bill to revive and extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia was then taken up, but was passed over in consequence of the unavoidable absence of the chairman.

The senate then in print 1,500 copies additional of the report of the secretary of the treasury was announced.

Mr. Clay said he should not move it then; indeed, it had remained so long that if the types were scattered he did not know whether he should move it at all. The matter had sufficient publicity through the newspapers. He did not, however, wish to prevent the senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Woodbury) from making a speech; there would, however, be other occasions when he would have an opportunity of saying what he desired.

Mr. King said, if the gentleman from New Hampshire wished to proceed, he had the right; it was perfectly in order to do so, and the senator from Kentucky had no right to object.

Mr. Clay had no desire to enter into any discussion on forms of order; he would not consent to have his proposition swayed from him whether he would or no. If the senator from New Hampshire desired to speak, he had no disposition to prevent him; if to-morrow or any other suitable occasion he chose to proceed, Mr. C. would not object.

Mr. King. To-morrow, then; let it be so understood.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the motion to refer so much of the president's Message as relates to foreign affairs to the committee on foreign affairs, when Mr. Buchanan rose and addressed the senate for an hour and a half.

Mr. Clay made a brief but powerful reply, defending the course of the secretary of state, as entirely proper and consistent with the laws of nations. Mr. Allen made a few observations, intimating that he would give his views in full at a future period, when the committee on foreign relations reported, deeming it, as he did, by far the most important subject that could occupy the attention of congress.

The question was then upon the adoption of the motion, and carried.

A message was received from the president of the United States of an executive character.

No motion, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short time spent therein, adjourned.

June 16. The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By the president pro tem, memorial of the mayor and common council of Philadelphia, in relation to the defence of the river Delaware, and the protection of that city.

By Mr. Fowler, from a number of citizens of Michigan, praying the allowance of one year's salary to the family of William Henry Harrison, late president of the United States.

By Mr. Buchanan, from widows of revolutionary soldiers, stating the poverty and distress that would ensue to them if the pension act of 1838 were repealed.

Also, from citizens of Pennsylvania, urging the settlement of their claims for French spoils made prior to 1800.

By Mr. Clay, Kentucky, asking the passage of a general bankrupt law.

Also, from citizens of New York and Connecticut engaged in the manufacture of hats, asking that a duty may be imposed on fur bodies and silk hats.

Mr. C. thought it would be well to look to the interests of that people. The memorial could be referred, and when the matter came up it might be attended to.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on the public lands, to whom had been referred resolutions of the legislature of Mississippi in favor of the establishment of a river land district in that state, reported the same back to the senate, and on his motion they were laid upon the table.

Mr. Benton moved to take up the resolutions submitted by him some days since, calling on the treasury for a schedule of the payments made from the treasury during the months of March, April and May of the present year.

Mr. Clay said that resolution had been laid on the table with a view that it should lay there.

Mr. Calhoun hoped the resolution would be taken up; it asked nothing unreasonable. Was it to be understood that information desired for the purpose of legislation was to be withheld? The whole basis of the report about the deficit of the treasury rested on that information; it was very material that it should be forthcoming.

Mr. Clay thought it not worth while to get in a session about it. The resolution was proposed to be amended by the senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. Woodbury), and embraced a much wider scope than the original. It was the general understanding, he thought, that no business was to be done on save what was essential and embraced in the message of the president. The resolution, if adopted, would require great labor and time to prepare, and compel the departments to exclude more important matters in which they might be required to be engaged.

Mr. Calhoun said it was very desirable to have the information. The secretary, in his report, had given aggregate; but general results were wanted. In making out the report, he did not give the expenditures from the fourth of March to the first of June. Mr. C. expressed the hope that no gentleman would be resorted to preventing them from having the desired information. He spoke in no passion; but in a matter immaterially dangerous to the country and constitution, he expressed himself with force.

Mr. Woodbury said he had suggested the amendment because it opened the door for inquiry; it could be voted down if gentlemen desired.

Mr. Benton said the question was on taking up the resolution, and he certainly had the right to do that. If they desired to exclude information, they could vote it down; they had the numbers.

Mr. Clay was sure there was no senator on that side of the house any more than himself that would not cheerfully furnish any information that was requisite to the purposes of fair legislation. But if gentlemen made calls on the departments which would have a tendency to check and embarrass them in their operations at this critical moment, could they blame them for interfering? He put it to their candor to say whether at any time there had been evinced a desire to withhold information? Gentlemen talk of their opinions of the danger to be apprehended to the country and constitution by our measures. They were entitled to their opinions; but which were to prevail, those of the majority, or those of the minority? He thought no decisive purpose could be effected by the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Calhoun hoped the senator from New Hampshire would withdraw his amendment, and leave the simple resolution as originally drafted.

Mr. Woodbury thought he could show that the amendment could not involve the department in any unnecessary expense, and that it bore directly on the matters for which they were called to legislate at the extra session.

The motion to take up having been waived—the resolution of Mr. Clay to print 1,500 extra copies of the report of the secretary of finance, was taken up, when Mr. Woodbury rose and delivered his views at length on the report.

Mr. Evans rose to reply, but, at the suggestion of Mr. Clay, the hour being late, the senate went into the consideration of executive business, and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

June 17. The president pro tem of the senate communicated a letter from the president of the United States, transmitting reports of the secretary of state in compliance with a resolution of the 12th instant, calling for orders sent to officers of the army, navy, &c. in relation to political interference in elections, &c.

Also, in compliance with a resolution of the same date, a copy of the instructions to the commissioners to investigate the public works in the city of Washington.

Also, a report from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the 8th instant calling for the amount of treasury notes issued prior to the 4th day of March last.

The communications were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following memorials and petitions were presented, and appropriately referred.

By Mr. Tilden, from the town of Millersburg, Ohio, asking the enactment of a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Merrick, from the president and directors of the Bank of Georgetown, asking an extension of time to wind up their concerns.

Resolutions of inquiry were offered by Messrs. Nicholson, Henderson, Merrick and Buchanan, which will be taken up in their progress.

The bill to revise and extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia was read a second time; when Mr. Evans expressed a wish that the senator who had especial charge of the bill would let it over until to-morrow. The subject might lead to discussion, which would expend the time of the senate to the interruption of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. Merrick said he would cheerfully yield to the wishes of the senator in postponing the consideration of the bill for to-morrow. He did not apprehend, however, that it would lead to any debate, as the subject had been simply discussed at a prior session. It was a matter in which the people of the District were deeply interested, and he was therefore disposed to have it acted upon as possible.

He should call up the bill to-morrow.

The senate then proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: the motion to print an extra number of the report of the secretary of the treasury on the finances.

Mr. Evans rose and addressed the senate at great length, chiefly in answer to Mr. Woodbury's remarks of yesterday.

Mr. Felt followed; and after speaking for half an hour, gave notice of a motion to go into executive session. After which, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, June 8. Some explanations took place between the speaker and several members in relation to certain proposed corrections of the journal, which, however, resulted in no action.

Mr. C. Brown, of Pennsylvania, rose to make an inquiry of the speaker. He (Mr. B.) saw, on looking at the papers, that the committees there announced were not the same as the committees which had yesterday been read at the clerk's table. He desired to know where the real committees would be found.

The speaker stated that it was known to the house that the chair had had only a very short time in which to make out the list, and there had not been time to have them copied. A few of the names had thus been transposed, and in three instances the names of three gentlemen had been entirely omitted. These errors having occurred solely from the hurry in which the committees were required to be made up, the speaker presumed that it would be to the power of the chair to make the corrections. The committees would be found on the clerk's table.

[The corrections will be found in our last on page 271.]

Mr. Graham rose, in pursuance of notice given on the second day of the present session, and asked leave to introduce a bill to repeal the act of July 4, 1840, commonly known as the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Welles objected.

The house then proceeded to vote for the election of door keeper, the speaker appointing Messrs. Warren, Clinton and Green tellers to superintend the voting.

The following gentlemen were put in nomination, on the first voting, which resulted as follows:

Whole number of voters	218
Necessary to a choice	107
Of which
Mr. Joseph Follansbee received	112
Mr. R. C. Washington	16
Mr. John Addison	2
Mr. Jesse E. West	49
Mr. J. W. Hronough	4
Mr. A. B. Livsey	4
Mr. Cranston Laurie	13
Scattering	6

So, on the first voting, Mr. Joseph Follansbee was declared to be duly elected door-keeper of this house.

Whereupon he appeared and took the oath of office.

The next election in order, under the resolution of yesterday, being that of assistant door-keeper—

The speaker appointed Messrs. Snyder, Morris and Sallantail to act as tellers.

The following gentlemen were nominated, and the vote resulted as follows:

Whole number of voters	195
Necessary to a choice	98
Of which
Mr. Hunter received	149
Mr. Hunt	4
Mr. Cunningham	10
Mr. Ellison A. Hopkins	4
Mr. Beck	8
Mr. Powell	7
Mr. Samuel Duncan	3
Mr. Clark	14

So Mr. Hunter, having received a majority of all the votes, was declared to be duly elected assistant door-keeper of this house. Whereupon he appeared and took the oath of office.

On motion of Mr. Morgan, by unanimous consent, it was resolved that Mr. M. McCormick be re-appointed postmaster of this house.

On motion of Mr. Wise, the house then proceeded to the election of chaplain to this house.

The speaker appointed Messrs. Cadwallader, Young and Campbell, of S. C. tellers to superintend the voting. The following gentlemen were nominated and the vote stood as follows:

Whole number of voters	189
Necessary to a choice	95
Of which Mr. French received	113
Mr. Page	6
Mr. Bristol	16
Mr. Braxton, withdrawn.	16
Mr. Bailey	16
Mr. Weldon	16
Mr. Reese	3
Scattering	12

So the rev. Mr. French, having received a majority of all the votes, was declared elected.

Mr. Sergeant then rose and offered the following resolution.

Resolved, That the house now proceed to the election of printer of this house for the 27th congress, whose compensation shall be twenty per cent less than the prices fixed by the joint resolution of 1819.

A question was raised by Mr. Clifford as to the business now in order, which was discussed for some time, by several members, when the decision of the chair was called for.

The chair decided that the first motion in order was the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ingersoll) and that that gentleman was entitled to the floor on that motion.

This motion was read from the journal (substantially) as a motion by Mr. Ingersoll to reconsider the vote of yesterday, adopting the amendment of Mr. J. Q. Adams to the resolution of Mr. Wise to adopt the rules of the next house of representatives, by adding to the resolution the words, excepting the 21st rule; that Mr. Everett reported to the reception of the motion, on the ground that it was not to order.

Mr. Eggers then took the floor and spoke for some time, being repeatedly called to order by members, but without concluding, gave way to a motion of Mr. Wise that the house adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were yeas 101, nays 82. So the house adjourned.

Thursday, June 10. The journal of yesterday being read, some conversation was had concerning an alteration of yesterday's report. After discussion the subject was dropped.

Mr. Delinghup then introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee of three, on the part of this house, on the library of congress. Rescued, which was adopted.

Mr. Fillmore asked leave to offer a resolution providing that the report of the secretary of the treasury, made to this house at the present session, be committed to the committee of ways and means, except such parts thereof as related to the subject already submitted to select committee.

Mr. Randolph objected to more an amendment.

Mr. Weller objected to the introduction of the resolution.

The speaker said the resolution could not be introduced but by unanimous consent.

Mr. Randolph (to the committee of Mr. Fillmore) withdrew his proposition to amend.

Mr. Fillmore hoped the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Weller] would withdraw his objection. The committee of ways and means had no business before them.

Mr. Stang. Move to suspend the rule.

Mr. Fillmore moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. Pickens was understood to suggest that there was some business requiring the action of the committee of ways and means, and that the appropriators necessary to pay themselves. [Laughter.] He presumed there would be no objection now.

[Cries of "No, no," "that will fix it."]

The speaker here stated to the house that the applications for money had been very numerous and pressing, and that the heavy responsibilities on this subject had already been taken by the speaker. No appropriations had been made, and the chair was now checking upon a bank on his own responsibility. It was for the house to say how long this state of things should continue.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Fillmore, and the rules were suspended. And then the resolution was adopted.

A message was received from the senate in relation to the appointment of a select committee on enrolled bills.

Concurred in, on motion of Mr. Biggs.

Mr. Holmes, of South Carolina, on leave, presented a resolution passed by citizens of Charleston, S. C. recommending an appropriation to the amount of one year's salary for general Harrison's family. On motion of Mr. H, the resolution was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, to which had been referred the bill upon that subject. And, on motion of Mr. Everett, the resolution was ordered to be printed.

The speaker laid before the house a communication purporting to be testimony in the case of contested election from Virginia. On motion of Mr. Underwood, it was referred to the committee on elections.

Mr. Underwood, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from the Patriotic Bank and the Bank of Alexandria, (the purport of which did not transpire); which were referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the treasurer of the United States, transmitting an account of the receipts and expenditures for the service of the post office department for the year terminating the first of July, 1840. On motion of Mr. Weller, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Billack rose and said he did not wish to interrupt the business of the house, but he desired to inquire of the chair whether a day would soon be assigned for the presentation of petitions and appeals generally, or whether it would be in order for him now to present a memorial. He held in his hand a petition which was desirous to present, if he could do so in order.

The speaker was understood to say that, after the appeal business (not reconsideration) now before the house had been disposed of, petitions and memorials would be entertained.

Mr. McKee, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the chamber of commerce of the city of New York in favor of a national bank, which, on motion of Mr. McK was referred to the select committee on the currency.

Mr. C. H. Williams asked leave to introduce a resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee, whose duty it should be to report, as early as possible, a bill for the appointment of representatives within the several states according to the census. Mr. W. made an explanation on the subject of his motion.

Mr. Everett testified constrained, he said, to object to the introduction of the resolution.

A point of order was raised from the senate in relation to the appointment of a joint committee on the library, &c. Concurred in.

The house then resumed the consideration of the motion heretofore submitted by Mr. Eggers, to present the vote by which the house had decided in favor of omitting the 21st rule of the last congress.

Mr. Ingersoll resumed his remarks, commenced yesterday, (during which he was repeatedly called to order for not confining himself to the subject), after proceeding for sometime, by permission, he concluded by expressing his deep anxiety and solicitude to put an end to the excitement prevailing in the country in relation to questions of abolitionism, and to restore it to repose, peace and tranquillity.

Indulently on Mr. Eggers laid resuming his seat, Mr. J. C. Clark rose and moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider; (there being some eight or ten gentlemen struggling for the floor).

Mr. Tramson moved a call of the house.

Mr. Marshall, of Ky. desired Mr. C. to yield the floor. He was understood to say that he had a request to make of the gentleman from New York; and if the gentleman declined to concede to it, he (Mr. M.) was understood to say he would not press the matter.

Mr. Clark said he would withdraw the previous question if the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Marshall) would pledge himself to renew it.

Mr. Warren insisted that, if there was any yielding it should be unconditional.

The speaker inquired of Mr. Clark whether he yielded the floor.

Mr. Clark replied that unless the gentleman would pledge himself to renew the demand for the previous question, (Mr. C.) must insist on his action.

And, after some conversation, the demand for the previous question was persisted in.

And the question was then put on the motion of Mr. Smith, that there be a call of the house, and was decided in the affirmative. Yeas 80, nays 43.

And a call of the house was ordered.

The clerk then called the roll, and 196 members answered to their names.

And the names of the absentees having been called over, the speaker announced that 211 members were present.

On motion of Mr. Morgan, by a vote of yeas 115, noes not counted, all further proceedings on the call were suspended.

Mr. Marshall appealed to the gentleman from N. York. (Mr. Clark.) to withdraw the demand for the previous question. (If the gentleman would consent to do so, he (Mr. M.) was willing to pledge himself to renew the motion after he should have concluded the remarks he desired to make.

Mr. Clark thereupon withdrew his demand for the previous question.

Some conversation ensued, involving the right of a member to make these conditional surrenders of motions submitted by him, but no action was taken on the point of order.

Mr. Marshall then rose and addressed the house for a space of two hours on the subject matter involving the 21st rule, and generally in reply to the remarks of Mr. Adams, and concluded by saying again that he (Mr. Clark), should, in compliance with his contract, renew the motion for the previous question, although his own impression was that it ought not to be seconded, but that, inasmuch as the debate had been fostered upon the house it was his permission to go forward.

And the question being on reconsidering the demand for the previous question, Mr. Randolph moved to lay the motion of reconsideration on the table.

Mr. Briggs asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Wise submitted to the chair that this motion to lay on the table, if it should prevail, would not touch the second motion to reconsider, [i. e. that] submitted the other day to reconsider the final vote by which the rules of the last house were repealed, amended, and by which a committee was appointed thereon.]

The speaker said: Not at all.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the motion of reconsideration on the table, and was decided in the negative. Yeas 77, nays 42. So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. Stewart asked for tellers; who were ordered; and the question was seconded, yeas 118, nays 84. The yeas and nays were ordered on the question, "Shall the union question be now put?" and, being taken, were: yeas 116, nays 100. So the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Briggs asked the yeas and nays on the main question which was now ordered.

And the main question, "Shall the vote be reconsidered?" was then taken, and decided in the negative; yeas 110, nays 116. So the vote was not reconsidered.

Mr. Wise then called up the second motion for reconsideration, to wit: the motion of Mr. Fornace.

"That the house reconsider the vote adopting the resolution for the appointment of a committee to report rules for the government of the house, and temporarily adopting the rules and orders of the last house."

Which motion being regularly before the house, Mr. Wise said he had a few words to say, and was willing either to go on now, or if it was the pleasure of the house, to yield to a motion for adjournment, and submit the question to the morrow morning.

Mr. W. having yielded the floor for the purpose, Mr. Hopkins moved that the house do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 107, nays 97. So the house adjourned.

Friday, June 11. The first business in order was the motion of Mr. Fornace, "that the house reconsider the vote adopting the resolution for the appointment of a committee to report rules for the government of the house, and temporarily adopting the rules and orders of the last house."

Mr. Wise being entitled to the floor,

Mr. Pendleton asked the gentleman to give way to enable him to present a memorial from the chamber of commerce of Cincinnati; also, one from the citizens of New Richmond, Clermont county, Ohio, asking for an establishment of a national bank. But Mr. Wise declining to yield the floor, the memorials were not presented.

Mr. Bolls now arose, and said that if he understood the proposition before the house, it was a motion to reconsider the vote adopting the resolution for the appointment of a committee to report rules for the government of the house, and temporarily adopting the rules and orders of the last house. In pursuance of these rules, thirty-three standing committees had been appointed, and a sergeant at arms, doorkeeper, &c. elected. He desired to be informed whether, if the vote adopting the resolution be reconsidered, all these elections would not be thereby annulled?

Mr. Wise replied he was always willing to give way, but could not on the present occasion, as he was desirous that the question should be speedily disposed of by the house. He proceeded at some length in his remarks; but without concluding, suddenly he rose, and, taking his seat, at the same time, that he was very sick. He was immediately removed from the hall.

At the suggestion of Mr. Fillmore, the further consideration of the subject before the house was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. Fillmore said, if it was in order, he would move that the house now proceed to the election of a printer.

The resolution relative to that subject, offered by Mr. Sergeant a few days ago, having been read, Mr. W. called for the yeas and nays, and the question was ordered. The chair said it was; whereupon Mr. Alderson appealed from his decision.

After some conversation between Messrs. Gilmer, Alderson, Clifford, Everett, Fillmore, Chapman, Dean and others, the question on the yeas and nays was taken, by yeas and nays, and were, yeas 145, nays 75. The decision was sustained.

The question now recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question; and it was agreed to.

The main question was ordered to be put, and the resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the house now proceed in the election of printer of this house for the twenty-seventh congressional session, on the basis of one cent per line less than the prices fixed by the joint resolution of 1819.

Mr. Wood moved a division of the resolution, which was agreed to; and the question being taken on the first branch thereof, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on the second branch: whereupon Mr. Weller called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the question was taken on the second branch of the resolution, and was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Watkinson moved to reconsider the vote just given with a view, in case the motion should prevail, of then offering resolutions referring the

Mr. Hunter said the chair would doubtless recollect that it had been the practice of the house, for some time past, when motions were made to reconsider resolutions under the previous question, to consider the previous question exhausted. Hundreds of cases could be shown where propositions to amend had been received and been debated under such circumstances; and, indeed, in this very case, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had entered into debate.

Mr. Barnard asked the decision of the chair on his point of order.

Mr. Briggs asked that the precise question, as it stood, might be stated. As to the point of order, he concurred in the view taken by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Hunter).

The speaker said that the question now before the house was the original resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise), adopted some days ago, after the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) had been incorporated with it; (the gentleman from Virginia) having, previous to such incorporation, accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood), proposing for the adoption, for a certain time, of the rules of the last house, and appointing a select committee to revise them.

The house now stood precisely as it did when the final vote was taken upon the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) with the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) incorporated with it. Prior to that vote having been taken, the previous question had been ordered upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts; and the operation of the previous question, that amendment had been adopted. Prior to the final vote having been taken upon the resolution, thus amended, the previous question was again demanded and ordered, and, under the operation of the previous question, this resolution had been adopted. A motion was made to reconsider, and, after a postponement, was finally acted upon yesterday, and the vote on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, as amended, was reconsidered, thus leaving the house precisely where it stood prior to the final vote on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The question, therefore, recurred, what could now be done in the way of amendment or discussion?

In the opinion of the chair, nothing more could be done now than could be done then. That could not be done by indirection which could not be done directly. If so, the whole force and efficacy of the previous question, thus demanded and ordered, could be got rid of by a gentleman who had been given a reconsideration. Notwithstanding that the chair had found on examination, and well recollected, one of the decisions referred to by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Hunter), when a proposition for reconsideration of a question which had been decided under the previous question had been adopted, and where amendments had been offered by various gentlemen and been debated, yet (the speaker was understood to say) there had been no solemn decision on that point, no question of order raised, no appeal taken. It seemed to the chair that if there were any force or effect in the application of the previous question, it must apply now. This was the only way of preventing the house from doing indirectly that which it cannot do directly.

Mr. Wise. Do I, then, understand the chair to decide that the previous question has not been exhausted?

The speaker. Yes.

Mr. Wise appealed, he said, from the decision of the chair, on the ground that the previous question was exhausted.

Mr. Royner. And I appeal, also, to the magnanimity of this house.

[Lord cries to "order."]

Mr. Deuss asked the speaker to state what the question was, representing under what great a title, voice gentlemen in his part of the house labored, in being unable to hear any thing that was going on.

Mr. Wise inquired of the speaker if the appeal was debatable.

The speaker said that the question was debatable under the parliamentary law, so far as related to the propriety of the previous question. And, in answer to an inquiry—the speaker said the question now was, whether the previous question under which the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) as amended by the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams), had been adopted, was or was not still in force.—The chair had decided that it was in force; and from this decision the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had appealed.

Mr. Deuss inquired of the speaker whether it was now in order to move an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia?

The speaker said it was not.

Mr. Wise spoke briefly to his appeal.

Mr. Proffitt demanded the previous question on the appeal. And there was a second. And the main question, by yeas 116, nays 96, was ordered to be taken.

Allett asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Yeas 145, nays 104. The yeas moved a cull of the house; which was refused.

Mr. Fillmore. May I ask that a single paragraph be read from the manual?

Mr. Mallory. No, sir, no. [Other members in various parts of the house also objected.]

Mr. Marshall asked that the question might be stated.—It was, he said, very difficult to hear what was going on in that part of the house.

The speaker again stated the question.

Mr. Morgan hoped the house would be brought to order, and that the speaker would insist on members taking their seats.

[Lord cries to "order."]

Mr. Wise was proceeding to state, more specifically, his appeal and the grounds thereof, when Mr. Nelson of Ohio, called him to order.

Mr. Wise demanded that the point of order be reduced to writing.

Messrs. Bolls, Mason, of Ohio, Mallory and Morgan rose successively to order.

The speaker comments the main question, "Shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the house?" was taken and decided in the negative as follows: yeas 105, nays 112. So the house reversed the decision of the chair.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. Wise, as amended by the proposition of Mr. Adams, when Mr. Royner rose and addressed the house at considerable length.

Mr. Morgan said he did not rise for the purpose of entering into this debate. Congress had now been upwards of two weeks in session, and yet they found themselves just where they were.

Some conversation here followed, Mr. Royner still claiming the floor on the ground that, though he had concluded his speech, he had not offered to yield the floor, as at the outset of his remarks, he had announced his intention to do.

Mr. Fessenden said the gentleman expressly stated that he had closed.

Mr. Wise. He has finished his speech, but not yielded the floor.

Mr. Morgan claimed the floor and proceeded. I was saying that we had been here more than two weeks, and we find ourselves nearly where we were when the session commenced. We have done nothing. We have been assembled here under a proclamation from the president of the United States. And for what purpose? Have we come here merely to gratify our own personal feelings?

Mr. Royner again rose to assert his right to the floor. Mr. Morgan claimed it.

The speaker said the gentleman from New York (Mr. Morgan) would proceed.

After a few remarks from Mr. Morgan, in reply to Mr. Royner, a question of order, involving the right of Mr. Royner to the floor, for the purpose of offering his amendment, was here again raised, and gave rise to some conversation, in which Messrs. Royner, Morgan, Wise, Bolls, Cooper, of Pennsylvania, and W. C. Johnson participated.

Mr. Dawson thought the house was now in a position where it suggested that the gentleman from New York (Mr. Morgan) should consider the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Royner) in his hands, and call the previous question upon it.

Mr. Royner inquired whether he could withdraw the motion for the previous question, to admit the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Royner) and then renew the call for the previous question.

The speaker was understood to reply in the affirmative.

Mr. Cushing inquired of the speaker if the previous question was pending or not?

The speaker (addressing Mr. Morgan) said the gentleman must either say that he withdrew his demand for the previous question, or that he did not.

Mr. Morgan said that he would withdraw the previous question for the sake of offering the following resolution. It was the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Royner); and he (Mr. M.) offered it for that gentleman, the house might have an opportunity of voting directly upon it.

And, he said, he would move the previous question thereon.

The following resolution of Mr. Royner was then read as a substitute for the original resolution of Mr. Wise, as amended by the proposition of Mr. Adams:

Resolved, That the standing rules and orders of the last house of representatives be adopted as the rules and orders on the demand of otherwise ordered; and that the committee heretofore appointed on the rules be ordered to revise, amend, and report upon the said rules and orders, and that they have power to report at any time; and that the election of officers heretofore chosen by this house, and the committees raised by its orders, be, and they are hereby, confirmed.

After considerable discussion on points of order, the question on the demand of otherwise ordered; the question being taken, there was a second; and the main question was ordered to be taken. The yeas and nays were demanded, and were taken, and were as follows, yeas 96, nays 105. So the amendment of Mr. Royner was rejected.

And the question recurring on the original resolution of Mr. Wise, as amended by the proposition of Mr. Adams—

Mr. Royner moved to amend the same by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That the rules and orders of the last house of representatives be adopted as the rules and orders of this house, until otherwise ordered; and that a committee of nine members be appointed by the speaker, under and under the rules, to revise, amend, and report on the same."

Mr. Wise demanded the previous question.

The yeas and nays were asked for by Mr. Allett and ordered, and being taken, were yeas 104, nays 107, so the amendment of Mr. Royner was rejected.

And the question again recurring on the original resolution of Mr. Wise as amended by the proposition of Mr. Adams, in the words following:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed to revise, amend, and report on the rules for the government of this house, and that said committee make report; and the same be finally acted upon, the rules and orders of the last house of representatives, except this 21st, shall be considered as the rules and orders of this house.

Mr. Bolls moved the previous question thereon. And there was a second.

The yeas and nays were asked for on ordering the main question, which were ordered, and, being taken, were yeas 111, nays 89.

Mr. Wise asked the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered.

And the main question (being on the adoption of the original resolution) was then taken, and was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, L. W. Andrews, Sherlock, J. Andrews, Arnold, Ayer, Babcock, Baker, Bernard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Bonn, Briggs, Brockway, Brown, Brown, Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Williams, Lewis Williams, West—110.

So the original resolution was rejected.

[And the house stands where it did on Monday noon of May 21st.]

On motion of Mr. Wise, at eight o'clock, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 16. Mr. Stuart, of Virginia, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all the rules and orders of the last house of representatives, not superseded by any rule or resolution adopted at the present session and now in force, be and the same are hereby adopted for the regulation of the house at the present session, and that the select committee upon the rules heretofore named, proceed to revise and amend the rules hereby adopted, and that they have leave to report at all times.

Mr. L. H. Wilson, of Virginia, moved to question; but withdrew it on the pledge of Mr. Stuart to question.

Mr. S. made some remarks, and closed by moving the previous question.

Mr. Nisbet, of Georgia, asked Mr. Stuart to withdraw that motion; which he did, on condition that Mr. N. would renew it.

So the call for the previous question was withdrawn, and Mr. N. proceeded to address the house, and concluded by renewing the call for the previous question.

Mr. Rhett rose to debate the call for the previous question. During his remarks he called on Mr. Brown, from Pennsylvania, to read a proposition he had prepared on this subject, which after some objections was postponed to the following day.

Resolved, That the rules and orders of the last house of representatives be adopted as the rules and orders of this house during the present session, and that instead of the 21st rule, the following be adopted, to wit:

"No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in any state, or the slave trade between the several states, or the slave trade, nor shall any petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery at the slave trade in the District of Columbia or any of the territories of the United States be received, unless they shall be from and signed exclusively by people resident in a district or territory where slavery or the slave trade is asked to be abolished; and as to all such petitions, memorials, resolutions, or other papers the question of reception shall be considered as raised without motion, and such question of reception shall be laid on the table without debate."

A lengthy debate now ensued, in which a number of members participated, after its termination, the demand for the previous question was sustained.

Mr. Fillmore moved a call of the house, which was ordered.

And the oral proceedings having been gone through, and 216 members answering to their names, all further proceedings on the call, by a vote of yeas 122, nays 67, were suspended.

And the question recurring on ordering the main question.

Mr. Goggin inquired of the speaker whether, if the house refused to sustain the call for the previous question, the subject would be taken from under the consideration of the house for this day.

The speaker said that, under the parliamentary laws, such would be the effect.

Mr. Coles asked the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, which were ordered, and being taken, were yeas 113, nays 101. So the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Weller asked the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered, and being taken, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Landolf W. Andrews, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Ayres, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Burden, Butts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, M. Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnett, Calhoun, Williams Campbell, Thomas Campbell, C. Campbell, Cass, Chalmers, John C. Clark, Steley N. W. Williams, Wise, Wood, Woodhouse.

So the house resolved that all the rules and orders of the last house of representatives, not superseded by any rule, or resolution adopted at the present session and now in force, be and the same are hereby adopted for the regulation of the house at the present session; and that the select committee upon the rules, heretofore raised, proceed to revise and amend the rules hereby adopted, and that they have leave to report at all times.

Mr. Steady rose and said that the house was now nearly organized; one more vote and the organization would be completed beyond the power of any gentleman to disturb it. To secure that object, he moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. Steady then demanded the previous question, which was seconded.

And the main question was ordered.

And the main question (being on the reconsideration) was taken, and decided in the negative without a vote.

So the vote was not reconsidered. And the house adjourned.

Thursday, June 17. The journal of yesterday being read, Mr. Sergeant by leave offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after Saturday next the daily hour of the meeting of this house shall be 10 o'clock A. M.

Which after remarks, on the rules of order, were passed yeas 120, nays 60.

Mr. Fillmore then offered the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That after Saturday next, for the ensuing week, and so long, it shall be the duty of the speaker to adjourn the house at 3 o'clock P. M. unless it shall adjourn at an earlier hour.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution, Mr. Fillmore said that, for the purpose of settling whether the house was willing to give the committee of ways and means proper time to transact its business, he would move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. Lewis Williams said the committee of ways and means might obtain the leave of the house to sit during the session of the house.

Mr. Fillmore. We must be in the house when the measures we report are acted on.

Mr. Campbell, of Tennessee, asked the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule, which was ordered, and being taken, yeas 158, nays 52.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. Fillmore demanded the previous question; which was seconded.

And the main question, being on the adoption of the resolution, was ordered to be now put; and, being taken, was decided in the affirmative.

So it was also resolved that, after Saturday next, for the ensuing week, and so long, it shall be the duty of the speaker to adjourn this house at three o'clock P. M. unless it shall adjourn at an earlier hour.

Mr. Watson offered to present a preamble and resolutions, which, after quoting, at great length, certain speeches reported to have been delivered by Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay and Mr. Crittenden, he made a call on the departments as to the names of persons removed since the present administration and into power, and the reasons for such removal.

Which being read, and objection made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rules, which motion was, after debate decided in the negative, yeas 57, nays 150.

Mr. W. then on leave introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this house be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine particularly as to the number of officers or agents employed, the expenditures and mode of transacting business in the several departments of the public service at the seat of government, and at such other points as the committee may deem necessary, or may be indicated by the members of the house, and that such committee report at the next session whether it is proper to make any reduction of the expenses of the civil list, or to the number of agents, or to the number of officers, or to the number of the patronage of the executive branch of the government may not be diminished or regulated as to those appointments for which there is an indispensible necessity.

Mr. C. Brown, of Pa. moved to amend the resolution by providing "that the committee shall have authority to sit during the recess of congress;" the amendment was rejected and the resolution agreed to.

Mr. J. C. Clark asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That hereafter all articles of stationery and other supplies usually furnished by the clerk for the use of the members of the house shall be purchased by contract, to be made with the lowest bidder, having reference to the quality of the specimens of the articles to be exhibited. And for such purpose the clerk advertise in three of the newspapers printed in the city of Washington, one in Boston, one in New York, one in Baltimore, and one in Philadelphia, inviting sealed proposals for furnishing such stationery and supplies, giving sixty days' notice that on a specified day all the proposals would be considered, and the specimens furnished estimated; and that on such day the proposals shall be opened in the presence of the speaker and clerk of the house, or in the absence of the speaker, in the presence of the secretary of the treasury and clerk, who shall determine to which of the bidders the contracts shall be given, always contracting with the lowest bidder, having reference to quality as aforesaid. Provided, That the contractor shall give bond, with sufficient sureties to determine to which of the bidders he shall fulfill his contracts and to furnish the articles equal in quality to the specimens.

Mr. Bowen, of New York, moved to amend by inserting "and providing that said committee be instructed to inquire and report to the house the amount of stationery used, and by whom owned," in the recess between the two sessions of the 26th congress."

After some remarks from Messrs. Pickens, Alford and Clark, Mr. Truman Smith proposed the following proposition; which, on his suggestion, Mr. J. C. Clark adopted, as a modification of his own.

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into the contingent expenses of this house, and into any corrupt, illegal or improper practice which may have existed or which do exist in this branch of the public service, and to ascertain whether the expenditures, or some part of them, have not been wasteful and extravagant; and whether the same can be reduced consistently with a proper discharge by this house of its constitutional duties; and whether the method of determining the public good requires; and whether the salaries or pay of such clerks and other persons should be reduced or otherwise altered or modified; and have authority to report by bill or otherwise, as they may see fit.

Some further remarks were made by Messrs. Briggs, Sergeant, Cooper, of Penn. Underwood, Taliaferro and Hopkins.

Mr. C. then suggested a modification of the resolution which called upon the heads of the departments to report the number of clerks in their departments, the amount of compensation, &c. but the modification was not accepted.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the house resolved to sell into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Taliaferro, of Va. in the chair), on the bill for the relief of the widow of the late William Henry Harrison; which was read, as follows:

A bill for the relief of the widow of the late William Harrison, late president of the United States.

It enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury pay out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. William Henry Harrison, late president of the United States, in the event of her death before payment, then to the legal representatives of the said William Henry Harrison, the sum of $50,000.

Mr. Adams moved to lay the blank upon the table, and proceeded to address the house in support of the bill. The subject was further discussed, by Messrs. Cooper, of Pa. Ward, Lane, J. C. White, Briggs, and Messrs. Snyder, Doro and Fugate, against it. Mr. Gilmer remarked it was now a late hour, and there were a number of gentlemen who desired to obtain further information on the subject, and he himself was in that situation. He wished information as to matters of fact. He wished to inform the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Buttard said that if the motion was to rise and report progress, and obtain leave to sit again, he should oppose it, because he desired to submit a few remarks.

And the question being taken on the motion of Mr. Gilmer, it prevailed. And the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again. And then the house adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

By the steamer Britannia, Cleland, which arrived at Boston in thirteen and a half days from Liverpool, via Halifax, we have Liverpool dates to the 19th June.

The Britannia brought 67 passengers of whom 18 were left at Halifax, and 10 received there for Boston.

Nothing had been heard of the steamer Prædèut.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The ministers had sustained repeated defeats in parliament. Sir Robert Peel's motion for a censure of the ministry was brought forward in the house of commons on the 6th of June, and passed by a majority of one.

For the motion, 312
Against it, 311
By this vote, the house have declared that the present ministers of the crown do not possess the confidence of parliament, and that their continuance in office is at variance with the spirit of the constitution. The announcement of this vote excited, of course, great cheering from the opposition members. Lord John Russell, the ministerial leader, then rose, and stated that he should deliberate till Monday following, (this on Saturday evening), as to what course he should pursue for the vindication of the ministry.

On Monday he announced to the house his intention of advising the queen to dissolve parliament. Sir Robert Peel, who was prepared to follow up his attack by opposing the supplies, stated that, in consequence of this measure, he should defer his attempt. Subsequently, the strength of parties was tried again on the criminal law question, and the ministry were beaten by a majority of ten.

It was expected that parliament would be prorogued on the 23d or 24th ultimo.

Active preparations were in progress for the election. Lord J. Russell was to stand for the city of London. Parliament continued to sit, but was to be dissolved in a few days, by commission. The ministry were confident of adding much to their strength at the new election.

The English journals are so engrossed in their own affairs, that they have nothing to say of Mexico, or of American politics in general.

The steamer Calcedonia, from Boston, arrived at Liverpool on the 14th, making the passage in twelve days and fourteen hours.

A contract has been concluded with Mr. Green, the ship owner, for tonnage for the conveyance of 1,000 troops which the government are about to send to China. Three vessels have been taken up for this service, at a charge to the public of £10,000.

From China nothing new.

The London money market was quiet. Consols for the account are at 89 to 91. Three per cent. redeemed, do. India bonds par. An American loan of seventy-five millions of dollars has been taken by the Rothschilds, at 103 for a five per cent. stock. Stock markets on the continent have varied little.

The venerable earl of Fortescue died at Castle Hill, South Molton, Devon, on the 16th ult. after an illness of two weeks.

Mr. Fox Maule is to be appointed vice president of the board of trade, in the room of Mr. Shell, who goes out as governor of Bombay.

VOL. X.—No. 19.

Among the most important of the commercial failures, are that of Corkum & Co. of London—a house extensively engaged in the East India trade, and the extensive commercial house of Grant & Co. in Glasgow. Their liabilities are said to amount to £180,000, and it is feared the effect will be ruinous to other houses.

Harvest Crops. The hay harvest appears to be generally abundant—and the grain crops in general appear to wear a promising aspect—although great deprivations have been committed by the wire worm.

The cotton market at Liverpool had improved, but not much. The state of trade in the manufacturing districts was such as not to create much hope of any steady advance. The tobacco market is dull. Penny stocks 5 per cent. stocks sell at 72 to 74; Ohio sixes, 87½ to 89; New York fives, 81; Maryland fives, 73 to 75; U. S. bank shares £4.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

Liverpool, 16th June, 1841.
Since we wrote you per Columbia, our cotton market has remained in a very inanimate state until this week, when there has been rather more doing, but inasmuch as your advices lead us to believe that your present crop will be rather over than under 1,600,000 and the accounts from the Mississippi bring so far favorable to a large produce from that which is now pointed in that section of the country, and a considerable quantity coming from British India, with a very heavy stock of all kinds here, the market is freely met a decline of fully 4d. per pound, chiefly, however, in the inferior and middling qualities. Unless we have a great change in our manufacturing districts, we do not see from present appearances much hope of an abundant, and a crop such as you had last year would make prices very low. Although we do not at present see our way to any advance, yet we hope when the pending elections are over there will be some reasonings done, and keep prices from receding further, and that cottons can be disposed of without giving way to the purchasers sale after sale. The sales for the week ending the 4th instant, they were 12,000 bales for that ended 11th instant, they were 19,800 bales—and for the present week they are estimated to 23,100 bales, of which 5,500 were Upland at 57½; 12,430 Orleans at 51½; 4,450 Alabama and Mobile at 57, and 70 Sea Island at 12 a 17½d. per pound, and the business has been chiefly by the consumers. The stock in this port is now estimated at 519,000 bales of which 410,000 bales are American, against 376,000 bales at this period last year of which 320,000 were American.

The weather has been cold and dry for the past fortnight, and our harvest will not be so early as was at one time expected, the corn markets are consequently rather higher, and bond wheat selling at 52s 6d. 8½s. per bush. Should a change of the weather take place, we have no doubt that some aid might be derived for the benefit of our commercial relations will be adopted, particularly in regard to the duty on grain, on which all parties seem to be of opinion some modification is necessary. The wheat is again lower, a parcel of 500 bushels having been sold at 10s. 10d. 10½, 11d. per cwt. and for 1,500 bbls. of very good quality 10s. 10d. being the highest offer; it was withdrawn and is going into store. The tobacco market is very dull.

FRANCE.

From France there is little news of moment.—Marshal Stoll retired from the ministry, on being opposed in a measure relating to the recruiting of soldiers, but came back again on being told he might have his way.

Some of the Paris papers state positively that a treaty has been agreed upon by the last great powers, for the partition of the Ottoman empire, and adds that Great Britain was to have Egypt; Russia, Constantinople; Austria, the provinces bordering the Danube; and Prussia was to be aggrandized by the acquisition of Saxony, a part of Poland, and Hanover. It states, likewise, that another part of the arrangement declared that France would not be disturbed in her African possessions. This report of course obtained no credit in England.

An Englishman in London, who had been arrested with "an infernal machine" in his possession, which had fifteen barrels so constructed that all would go off at once.

The French are making progress in Africa—Their troops are generally successful against the Arabs.

A letter from Naples announces that the house of Rothschilds has made a loan of 3,000,000 of ducats to that government. The Messrs. Rothschilds, it is also stated, have just loaned the Neapolitan government 75,000,000 florins, about 36,000,000 dollars! This is a five per cent. loan at 103. The French government also want a great loan. All the governments, it seems, are borrowing, now-a-days, as well as our own.

Haver, June 14th, 1841.

The cotton market remained in about the same position as before. The sales affected that day amounted to 1,064 bales, viz: 670 bales Louisiana at 85½; 96½; 761 Mobile at 77½; 86½; 417 Georgia at 74½; to 92½; and 120 Florida at 75½. In coffee nothing worth mentioning was done. The transactions in colonial sugar were composed of 200 loads, at the rate of 56½ for good middling. In all other articles, save two classes, Bengal indigo, at 9, 9½; and 25,000 kilograms while oil, sold on delivery, at 35½, nothing occurred.

SPAIN.

A telegraphic despatch from Perpignan, dated the 11th June mentions that on the 7th a disturbance, which threatened to be very serious, took place at Barcelona. It appears that 400 weavers of that town endeavored to obtain possession of some confiscated goods advertised for auction, and the authorities, being unable to restrain them, put down the goods, and gave them to the workmen to be burnt in front of the town hall, which the workmen caused to be illuminated.

Advices from Madrid to the 10th of June, state, that the Don Diego was solemnized with great pomp in that capital. The procession was headed by Episcopate, who took the place of the king of Spain. The young queen was among the spectators at the hotel de Ville, where her majesty was attended by all the distinguished members of her household.—Not the slightest interruption of public tranquility took place.

PORTUGAL.

Advices from Lisbon to the 7th of June state that the ministerial crisis was not yet over. The queen had addressed congratulatory letters to the patriarch of Lisbon, the archbishop of Braga, and other prelates announcing her recognition by the pope, and in consequence declaring that a road was opened for the withdrawal of the excommunicated king from the two courts. It was supposed that the proceeding of the court of Rome would prove the forerunner of the recognition of the queen of Portugal by Austria and other powers.

TRACY.

There seems to be no tranquility for Turkey—her difficulties seem to increase. The young sultan's health is rapidly declining, notwithstanding he has for some time past been residing at the "valley of the sweet water."

THE EAST.

Affairs in the Levant present nothing of particular interest.

The French have taken the town of Mascara in Algeria, and are fortifying it.

In the memory of man, a more abundant crop of all kinds of grains was never seen in Egypt than that of the present year. The government calculates on being able to dispose of nearly 2,000,000 ardebs of corn. The cotton crop would also considerably exceed that of 1840, which amounted to 140,000 quintals.

The Augsburg Gazette published advices from Alexandria to the effect that the sultan of Mecca has taken up arms against the sultan, and driven the Turkish garrison out of the holy city. The news, coming, as it does, upon the heels of the accounts of the insurrections in Candia and Bulgaria, bodes much mischief.

The latest advices from Candia, to the 15th of May, state that the insurrection has not been suppressed, the number of insurgents increases daily, and they resolved to let things come to extremities. Many of the principal families, have already left the island for Syria and other parts of Greece. It was rumored that Tahir pasha had landed there, with 8,000 men, and a strong party of artillery, determining to reduce the rebels to subordination. Letters from the Turkish frontier, of the 3d ult. state that the Greek patriarch at Constantinople, was dissuaded by the pasha for privately encouraging the rebellion in Bulgaria.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

THE NATIONAL ANNIVERSARY. THE FOURTH OF JULY falling this year upon the Sabbath day, afforded a kind of double anniversary. Such observances as were not inconsistent with the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath, including certain temperance and Sabbath school movements, in many places occupied communities a part of the FOURTH. A missionary party was moving throughout the land—and the pulpit and the rostrum lent their whole voice aid to the commemoration of a grateful people. But the more distinct celebration of the national birth day was postponed to Monday, the 5th inst. That beautiful morning was ushered in by the sound of artillery, reverberating from one extremity of the union to the other—as the "stripes and stars" were gaily run up to mast head, or fluttered in the breeze from thousands of spires that here and there taper toward the sky. Business was suspended, and the people devoted themselves to enjoyment in whatever direction their fancy indicated. Country people crowded to the towns—and the towns people to the country. Public, military, and civic processions—social meetings—excursions and parties of pleasure—all had their attractions. It was a NATIONAL HOLIDAY, in the holidays of which it is most gratifying to record the fact, that temperance was a distinct ingredient. The influence of reformation was manifest in every direction from which we have yet received accounts. A rational people were rendering homage to the enjoyment of LIBERTY—as regulated by THEIR OWN GOOD GOVERNMENT—"under their own vine and their own fig tree, none daring to make them afraid."

PERUVIAN DECREE. Department of state, July 7, 1841. A decree, of which the following is a translation, has been issued by the government of Peru, taking effect from and after the 1st of February of this present year.

"All vessels, whether national or foreign, coming from a foreign country, are absolutely prohibited from touching at any of the minor ports or coasts of the republic, under pain of a fine of one thousand dollars, payable by the captain in favor of the sufferer, for which the vessel is liable, whether belonging to the captain or to others. If, moreover, it be proved that any person, or goods, or letters, have been landed from the vessel at any port at which she may have thus touched contrary to the law, the vessel shall be confiscated, and the captain will, in addition, become liable to a criminal prosecution."

It is important that this regulation should be made known to our vessels, particularly to those employed in whaling, which have been in the habit of touching at many of the minor ports and coasts, (including all places on the coast which are not regular ports of entry, for the purpose of obtaining refreshments. Revenue cutters have been fitted out at Callao for the enforcement of the decree.

AMERICAN WOOL PRODUCT. The New York Tribune justly remarks that to those who have paid the subject but little attention the amount of money invested in the production of wool within the United States will seem surprising. It is very generally believed that this is quite a secondary branch of our general interest instead of one of the most fruitful sources of our wealth, and best deserving the cherishing protection of our government. As shown by the returns of the late census, we have in this country, exclusive of North Carolina, Netherland and Kentucky, 19,058,969 sheep, and taking ten dollars as the average value of land necessary to sustain a sheep and make a fair allowance for the price of the animals themselves, for the labor necessary for their proper superintendence, with that required to prepare their product for its first market, which are as much part of the investment as the land which sustains them, the aggregate amount of capital invested in this branch of industry will be at least two hundred millions of dollars. This is certainly an immense sum, and well deserves the attention of the general government.

At present England supplies us annually with some ten millions worth of broadcloths, and after all chooses to import her wool from the continent to the entire exclusion of our own. In 1839 her entire import of this article was 59,000,000 pounds, and while we had some 40,000,000 pounds of wool remaining at home, nearly two-fifths of the whole woolen manufacturers of Great Britain came to the United States. And yet we have only about $15,000,000 invested in woolen manufactures. Of the aggregate amount of wool grown in the United States in 1839, New York produced 4,012,144 pounds; Ohio 3,650,970; Vermont 3,257,695, which, in proportion to her population, is much the largest amount grown in any state; Pennsylvania 3,076,758; Virginia 2,672,044; Maine 1,465,551; New Hampshire 1,260,958; Indiana 1,202,300; Massachusetts 1,055,591; Tennessee 1,029,526; and the other states various amounts between the 893,675 pounds of Connecticut and the 45,324 of Louisiana.

INTERESTING REMINISCENCES. The Courier states that Samuel Gouverneur, esq., is engaged upon a biography of president Monroe. Mr. Gouverneur being the son-in-law of Mr. Monroe, and having had bequeathed to him all the papers of that illustrious statesman, will be enabled to accomplish his undertaking with singular advantage. The following will be one of the interesting passages:

When Mr. Monroe was minister from the United States at Paris, and when Gen. La Fayette was confined in the prison at Olmutz, by the emperor of Austria, information was brought him, that madame La Fayette, the general's wife, was thrown into prison, and no doubt in a few days would follow the fate of her mother and grandmother at the guillotine. Mr. Monroe could save her, and as Paris was then in the hands of the mob it could only be accomplished by arousing the sympathies of the people. The destruction of life had been such in every state of society where-querelance was perceptible, that to avoid certain death, all luxuries and splendor were laid aside; and the wealthy, instead of riding in their equipages, either walked, or rode in the miserable vehicles of the city.

It therefore created a great sensation when the splendid equipage of the American minister's carriage appeared at the gate of the prison, and his lady informed the keeper that she had come to see the wife of gen. La Fayette. Such a call at such a time was like electricity. The news spread in all directions, and before Mrs. Monroe drove from the prison, thousands had collected around her carriage, and the feelings elicited by the meeting of two such females in such a situation, aroused the axe at the executioner, and eventually set the captive free.

The feelings of colonel Monroe cannot be related during the absence of his wife. He could not accompany her, as that would have counteracted the feeling he knew must be awakened to save the prisoner. When madame La Fayette met Mrs. Mon-no who was in a state of perfect phrensy, supposing that she was led out to execution, and when she found herself embraced by the lady of the American minister, within the walls of that gloomy prison, where but a few days previously had been led forth to execution, her mother and grandmother, it was for a long time before she could realize her situation. Mrs. Monroe assured her she should be saved, and that her husband had determined to risk all if it became necessary, to accomplish her deliverance.

THE ARMY.

War department—general orders.

Adj. gen's. office, Washington, June 29th, 1841.
The following order of the secretary of war announces to the army the melancholy intelligence of the exit of the distinguished ALEXANDER MACOMBS, the late major general commanding in chief. The honors conferred on him by president MANROSS, received on the field of victory, for "distinguished and gallant conduct in defeating the enemy at Plattsmouth"—and the thanks of congress bestowed with a medal commemorative of this triumph of the arms of the republic, attest the high estimate of his gallantry and meritorious services in time of war. And his advancement since the peace, to the highest military rank known to the laws, confirms his good opinions and esteem as an officer and a man, in which the lamented general has ever been held by his fellow citizens, the government, and the army:

"Department of war, June 26, 1841.

"The secretary of war, in the discharge of a painful duty, announces to the army, the death of major general ALEXANDER MACOMBS, their late general-in-chief.

It were but small tribute to his memory in say, that in youth and manhood he served his country in the profession in which he died, during a period of more than forty years, without stain or blemish upon his escutcheon. The spotless purity of his life was not less conspicuous than his patriotism and devotion to the service. Though bred a soldier, and always an advocate of a proper degree of rigor in maintaining the discipline of the army, his heart was still open to all the benevolent sensibilities of his nature; nor was his orders and government below his personal deserts. Entering the army in youth, as a cornet, he passed honorably through every grade of command to the highest attainable in his profession. In the progress of his long career, besides the various occasions of military service, which called forth the exercise of his active talents as an officer, the late war with Great Britain afforded him an opportunity of signaling his skill and gallantry in a more eminent degree, and he availed himself of it, in a manner which entitles him to be enrolled high in the list of that distinguished and heroic band of commanders, by land and sea, who have achieved so much for the honor and glory of their country. A grateful people, speaking through their constituted authorities, were prompt to acknowledge their lively sense of the value and importance of his services, while living; nor will they fail to manifest correspondent feelings of sorrow and regret upon the occasion of his death. The army will cherish with peculiar interest the excellent traits of his character as a man, while the example of his military fortune will encourage them to emulate his active perseverance, devotion and gallantry as an officer.

"As an appropriate testimony of respect and honor for the memory of their late general in chief, the officers of the army will wear the usual badge of mourning, for six months, on the left arm and hilt of the sword. Guns will be fired at each military post at intervals of thirty minutes, from sunrise until sun set on the day succeeding the receipt of this order, during which time the national flag will be suspended at half staff. JOHN BELL."

The military honors directed by the president to be paid to the memory of the late major general ALEXANDER MACOMBS, will be duly observed, and the troops at the several stations will be paraded at 10 o'clock, when this order will be read, after which all labors for the day will cease. By order:

R. JONES, adj. gen.

3. Robert S. Holmes, of Pennsylvania.
 4. Charles W. Stearns, of Massachusetts.
 5. William Lewis, of Maryland.
 6. Dabney Herndon, of Virginia.
- By the same board, the following assistant surgeons were examined for promotion and were generally approved, viz. Alexander F. Suler, Charles M. Hitchcock, William Maffitt.

THE NAVY.

Regulations. The secretary of the navy has issued some orders with regard to the navy uniform, with the intent of correcting an evil which has been much observed, the want of regularity in the navy dress. The following abstract of these orders is from the Philadelphia North American.

No embroidery will hereafter be worn by captains or commanders in the navy, and in several of the other grades changes are made in the dress. The same button is prescribed for all officers, and none other than blue or white pantaloons or vests are permitted to be worn by any officer in the navy. When uniform is worn it must be the entire full dress or the entire undress, and uniform is ordered to be worn by all officers attached to vessels, navy yards, stations, the recruiting service hospitals. Strict obedience to these orders is enjoined. The hair of all persons in the navy is to be kept short, no part of the beard is to be worn long except whiskers, which shall not descend more than one inch below the top of the ear, and then in a line toward the mouth.

A want of conformity in the dress of officers of the navy has often been perceived and complained of, notwithstanding the uniform has been prescribed by the board of navy regulations. It is to be put on in the same manner as it is now by the honorable Mr. Baileys; but we hope to see this regulation strictly enforced and to doubt not that the commandants of vessels of war, navy yards, &c. &c. will take care that all orders emanating from the navy department, be rigidly obeyed by those under their command.

List of midshipmen, in the order of rank assigned them by the board of examining, which convened at the naval asylum, at Philadelphia on the 14th inst.

[Nat. Intelligence.]
From the Pacific. The following interesting information regarding the capture of the United States in the Pacific is contained in a letter dated on board the United States frigate Constitution, at Talcahuana, in Chili, March 5th, 1841:

"The squadron is so limited that I have not a doubt the commodore finds it a very perplexing task to give that protection to our commerce in the vast ocean, and on the extensive coasts of Chili, Peru and Mexico, that it requires, and is entitled to.—It seems to me that, unless the squadron is increased to a frigate and three or four sloops, it will be quite impossible to detach a ship from the coast of Chili and Peru to visit the Islands, and the west coast of Mexico and the north west coast of America once in twelve months. The very small naval force we now have in the Pacific (two ships and one schooner) is by no means in proportion to our commerce, which, point of view, is far ahead of Old England or France! We have about 500 whale ships employed in this ocean, whose tonnage is probably over 150,000, employing 12,000 seamen. This income to our country is fit out of war, of domestic products, which, in all probability, cost over a million of dollars; and this is left with our people, and the fruits of the ocean, after great labor, are taken home to them also. In addition to the whale ships, there are about fifty vessels from various ports of the United States, trading to the Pacific, in other branches of commerce. This is but a bird's-eye view of our great and growing interests in the Pacific. Does it not seem to merit the watchful care of the government, and an increased naval force?

"This place is a great rendezvous for whale ships—twenty-three American whale ships have been seen here at one time! We have seen ten American flags flying here at one time! The bay is a beautiful one. The anchorage is good and is protected from the violence of the high and heavy trade winds, which blow on the coast of Chili in the winter months, by an island lying immediately at the entrance, as the bay opens from the north, and the heavy gales are from the north. Nature seems to have placed this barrier to the sea. The climate is good—wood, water and provisions can be had here in great abundance. The people are kind and hospitable. Talcahuana is but a small town, being the seaport of the city of "Concepcion," which is distant eight miles inland. This ill-fated city was about half laid in ruins in 1835, by an earthquake. The population then was ten or twelve thousand; it is now said to be but five or six thousand. The terror of the earthquake of 1835 has not left the people yet, and many have removed from the city." The Fleischer, from Sumatra, touched at St. Helena 9th ult. and there learnt that the frigate Constitution, and one or two other United States men-of-war were at Table Bay, said to be waiting for new rigging. No date is mentioned.

The Fleischer reports that the Malays on the coast of Sumatra were quiet, owing probably in part to the presence of a French man-of-war.

U. S. sloop-of-war Marion was off the harbor of Pernambuco 21st ult. and was expected in every moment.

A letter from Oahu, dated March 11, states that the Vincennes was at Hawaii, and was expected daily to join the rest of the exploring expedition at Oahu.

U. S. sloop-of-war Levant, sailed from Havana 16th ult. on a cruise.

The United States surveying brig Consort, Lieut. commanding Powell, arrived here from St. Joseph on Tuesday last. The survey, that harbor and the depth of water heretofore reported, has been found. The Consort was to sail in a few days for Tampa Bay.

Pennacola Gazette, June 5.

The United States schooner Grampus, was at Cape Mount, Africa, 30th April.

The United States ship Macedonian, commander Wilkinson, was spoken 16th ult. lat. 27, lon. 85, on a cruise.

U. S. sloop of war Levant, all well, was spoken the 4th inst. lat. 21, long. 84, by the Bourne, at Boston, from Clerfuegos.

Lieut. commandant Thomas A. D. rning proceeds to the Pacific, in the ship Lausanne, to take command of the U. S. schooner Shark, vice Bigelow, promoted.

The United States ship Brandywine, was towed from her moorings in the North river, and went to sea, under easy sail, in the afternoon of the 30th ult. Her destination is supposed to be again to the Mediterranean.

She is now under the command of capt. GRIBBINS, capt. BOLTON who commanded her on her return home, having been relieved at his own request.

Captain Geiswiler is the sole surviving officer of the Wasp, having been then a midshipman sent to Savannah with a prize, after the capture of British sloops of war Arion and Pelican. Nothing was ever heard subsequently of the Wasp, and her fate is only conjectured by the circumstance that a heavy British sloop of war arrived in a shattered condition in one of the outposts, reporting that she had an engagement with a large American corvette and escaped.

The United States frigate Constitution was at Talcahuana, on the coast of Chili, on the 5th of March last, all well, and was expected to sail in a day or two for Valparaiso, Coquimbo, and Lima. The sloop of war St. Louis was on a cruise to "the islands" and western coast of Mexico. The schooner Shark was at Lima.

U. S. ship NORTH CAROLINA. We had the pleasure of a short visit to this ship yesterday. She is moored off the battery. Her appearance for next news and order is excellent.

The burthen of this ship is 3633 tons. Her extreme length on the water deck is 212 ft 8 1/2 feet; her breadth of beam is 54 feet, and her depth about 60 feet. She has four decks—the spar deck, the upper and lower gun decks, and the berth deck; and when in sailing trim, she draws 25 feet of water. From her keelson to the main stay-sail track, or the length of her main mast from the keel to the "tip-top," is about 271 feet. The length of her main yard is 107 feet. The quantity of canvas in her main topsail is 14600 yards, and the whole quantity on her when she spreads her square sails and studding sails, is 18,000 yards; sufficient to cover an area of over four acres. Her main stay (rope) is 16 inches in diameter, and her fore and main rigging generally about 12 inches. Her bow anchor weighs about 8625 pounds, or nearly three tons, and her largest sheet anchor weighs 9175 pounds. Her hemp cables are 36 inches in diameter, and a link in her chain cables will weigh about 12 pounds. Their length is about 120 fathoms. The number of boats belonging to her is 11, the largest of which is pulled by 24 oars.

This ship is calculated to carry an armament of one hundred guns. At present she has on her spar deck 24 carronades, 42's, and 2 long 32's; on the upper gun deck she has 32 long 32's, and on her lower gun deck 32 42's. When her magazine is supplied, it contains about 6000 pounds of powder. Her artillery contains 300 muskets, 300 pistols, 300 canteens, 300 boarding axes, and 300 pikes.

Besides other stores she is calculated to carry sufficient water to furnish one thousand men, each with a gallon a day for six months, which is about 182,000 gallons.

Her complement of man is one thousand; at present she has, including apprentices, 362. The number of boys or apprentices now on board, is 116.—Every other day a part of them are required to attend school, where they are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, or navigation, according to the education they have previously received. On the larboard side of the lower gun-deck, abait the main mast, is an apartment constructed for their school room. On the alternate days the boys are employed on duty about the ship, and in learning seamanship. There is a library connected with the school, that contains about 200 volumes. School books are furnished to each of the scholars, and when they leave, a copy of each book which they may have studied is presented to them. There is also to be published in a few days, a work on seamanship, designed expressly for them, by one of the present officers of the ship, who is doubtless a perfect master of the subject.

[N. Y. Jour. Com.]

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

The revolution of another political year, under the wise direction of a beneficent Providence, brings us together in a legislative capacity, to execute the most important trusts that could be confided to us by our enlightened constituents. The duty and the trust thus imposed upon us, of making laws for the government of a people, such as compose the great body of the citizens of New Hampshire, involving all interest of property, and even life itself, amply such as to approach the performance of those duties with chastened feelings, with thoughts elevated and enlarged beyond the contracted circle of our own narrow selfish views and interests; to take good care that no partial or unjust legislation shall mar the symmetry of our well proportioned system of equal and just government, which we received from our forefathers and our forefathers' God; not to be uprooted or destroyed—but to be enjoyed and improved, preserved and transmitted, in like manner to those who shall come after us. If we in this generation, shall succeed in faithfully discharging these high and holy purposes, we need not fear, but we shall have well performed our highest duties as citizens of the republic, and have conferred the greatest and most valuable benefit on our posterity, to bestow upon the successors to our heritage, the legacy of freedom.

Death of the president of the United States. In the dealings of a just, though oftentimes inscrutable Providence, our country has been called to mourn the death of its venerable chief magistrate, and at a peculiar and important crisis. A new administration had just succeeded to power, and assumed the responsibilities of government; inexperienced measures had but just been devised, when death suddenly removed the individual selected by a majority of the nation to fill the highest station in that government. This unluckily event affords a startling illustration of the fact, that "in the midst of life we are in death," and that station and honors afford no shield against the sudden death, but would almost seem to present to the "lonely archer" only a more shining and conspicuous mark. Of the late president, widely different opinions prevailed, and we, fellow citizens, doubtless embraced those opinions as honestly and as adversely, as others; but let us remember only his virtues and "the good that he has done," and we permit his faults and follies to rest in silence; the trophies of death.

Extra session of congress. The present is a deeply interesting period in the affairs of our nation. The new administration has been seen to the extra session of congress, which is now being held. The necessity of this call, I am unable to perceive, and for the reasons thereto we are left mainly to conjecture. Let us hope, however, as every true lover of the honor and interest of this country will do, that those who have assumed the responsibility of the measure, will be able to give such good and sufficient reasons for the course taken, as will satisfy the candid of its propriety, and that such policy may be adopted and acted upon, by those who have the control of affairs, as will continue to sustain our best interests in honor, and maintain unimpaired that sacred charter of our liberties: the constitution of the United States.

Delegated powers. The national government is clothed with certain delegated powers, which, they assume, and which it is their duty to execute. Powers not delegated by the constitution nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people." Both the national and state governments, possess powers which are separate and distinct; and the states, in exercising their delegated authority, should, that the two, when restricted within their own constitutional limits, afford to our citizens, greater and more equal security, than any other known form of government on the globe. Institutions that so well calculated to secure the happiness of all government should be cherished with every care, and maintained with all their efficacy and purity, by every sacrifice that patriotism warrants, and with all the vigilance, that the preservation of true freedom ought to excite. While, therefore, the states should watch with a vigilant eye, every encroachment on their reserved rights, they should as carefully avoid the exercise of any power, delegated to the national government.

Deposit and distribution. The congress of the United States are invested with full power "to lay and collect taxes, imposts and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;"—but with this authority, they possess no power to collect a revenue for distribution among the states. Unfortunate for the nation, in 1836 there had been accumulated in the treasury, an unexpected and large surplus revenue, beyond the then existing wants of the government, and by a law of congress called the "deposit act," that surplus was deposited with the several states for safe keeping. It was a deposit, and no more, and so viewed by the friends of the then administration who supported the measure; had it been a law to give or distribute that sum to the several states, I am of opinion it would have found few friends in either house of congress.

It is to be regretted that any of our sister states have been seduced to stray from the safe path of strict economy in their public expenditures. Justice to the present and future generations would seem to require of those who, as agents of the people control the affairs of the states at the present time, a return and adherence to the strictest principles of economy, to the performance of their several duties and trusts; inasmuch as by such course only, can we reasonably expect to escape the unfortunate embarrassments under which they now labor. The spirit and energies of the American people are still unconquered, and we may almost say unconquerable, when exerted in a just cause. Our people are men of justice, not only in their individual affairs, but in those of the state and nation. I feel the highest confidence in the ability and disposition of the indebted states, to meet all their just responsibilities; and that too, without resorting to the national government for aid. If a system of distributing the states were to be adopted (waiving the constitutionality of such a system) it would most clearly be exerting bad policy; exhausting to the national treasury, and corrupting to the states and the people.

Military. The general government is authorized "to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia;"—and it is very desirable that a new organization should be made. It is believed that we have one and a half million of able-bodied men in the United States; and that the number of our number we have about thirty thousand in this country, who are called out three in each year for inspection, drill and review. This mode of training so numerous a body of soldiers, is attended with a very great aggregate expense, and of the time and money, not compensated in the estimation of very many of our citizens, by an equivalent advantage. The right of the people to keep and bear arms," is a right dear to every freeman; arms should be in the hands of every citizen of the republic, who is able to wield them; and it is the duty of government to prescribe such rules of organization and discipline, as will give those arms the greatest possible efficiency.

The system of organization and discipline to be useful, must deserve and receive the approval of those for whom it is established; it must be free from the charge of favoritism and partiality on the one hand, and not impose too heavy a tax on the time and money of the citizen on the other. All our citizens should be required, and held strictly to sustain, their fair share of the burthens of the system.

It is believed that a division of our militia into junior and senior classes, the latter being excused from active duty, except in cases of invasion and insurrection, and thus abridging in effect the term of time in which duty is to be required, and granting to the former an increased compensation in proportion to the services required of them, withholding of course any compensation to the latter class, except when called into actual service, would not only be a great saving of expense on the whole, but would advance the discipline and efficiency of the former class, by enabling them to devote more time and attention to the school of the soldier, than under our present system would be deemed just and expedient to require.

The present is an time to relax in the encouragement and support of a well regulated militia.—How soon we may be called upon to defend the liberty and country inherited from our patriotic sires, we cannot know; but this we are assured, that while the nature of the arms is the same, the maintenance of a constant readiness and ability to defend ourselves, is the surest guarantee against aggression.

While speaking of the subject of our militia, permit me to call your attention to that of our fire-arms. Most of our regiments are now supplied with small brass field pieces; they answer well the purpose for which they were designed, that is, to accustom our soldiers to the exercise and use of this kind of ordnance. In the arms of our militia these light pieces have been exchanged by the state for those of a heavier class. Doubts have been expressed as to the adoption of this measure as a general rule; the smaller size are equally useful, and more convenient for all the purposes of exercise and drill, and a saving of much expense.

Banks. By reference to the charters of the banking institutions in this state, it will be seen that several are about to expire by limitation, and it consequently becomes a question of importance as to what ought to be our policy towards them. It is believed in this state, we have fallen into what is deemed a very common error in this country, that of establishing too many banks—more than the interest of the community requires. It is the only proper reason for the establishment of any. This error, if it should thus be considered, the legislature will soon have a very favorable opportunity to correct. It must be admitted, that recent developments in the management of certain banks in the nation, have tended to shake whatever of confidence a large portion of the community had in them.—Peculation and fraud of such aggravated character have been committed among those entrusted with the control of the institutions, as to become truly alarming. Some of these banks appear to have turned aside from their lawful sphere of operations, and instead of impartially lending their aid to the general business of the country, (as it was the object of their establishment,) have become pecuniarily benefited their means mainly to the aggrandizement of a few favorites. Banking institutions have become so numerous, and their notes so extensively assumed the place of money as a circulating medium, as apparently to render the business indispensable; that to effect any important change in the system, even with acknowledged public interest on the side of reform, it has become a task of no ordinary magnitude and difficulty, and would require the most mature deliberation.

It is, however, gratifying to believe that the banks in New Hampshire, with few exceptions, have fulfilled their appropriate duties to the community with a commendable degree of fidelity, and have shared largely in the public confidence; they should be held to a rigid and strict accountability on all their engagements, with no hopes of legislative favor on failure to redeem, on demand and in specie, all their promises. I would suggest the propriety of limiting, by law, the amount of stock to be owned by any individual or firm, and also by legal enactment, to prevent the control of any bank in this state passing into the hands of those who are not citizens of the state. It has long been desired to limit the denomination of notes the banks may be allowed to issue; this, if judiciously commenced and persevered in, will, it is believed, be attended with favorable results, in restoring and continuing in circulation a great amount of specie.

The re-chartering of our present banks, as far as their mutual and concerted action will afford the legislature opportunity to carry this reform into effect.—These remarks and suggestions are made in no spirit of hostility to banks, as such; they are couched in a plain and sober basis on substantial capital and property conducted in a judicious and careful manner, and are intended to insure of all to correct abuses wherever they exist, and under safe and strong regulations and restrictions to improve our banking system, rather than to suppress and destroy it.

I have received reports from the bank commissioners in relation to a portion of our banks, and hope, early in the session, to be able to lay before the legislature their report on the condition of all the banks in the state.

Education. "Knowledge and learning generally diffused through a community being essential to the support of a free government," it is made the duty of the legislature, by the constitution, "to cherish institutions of literature and sciences." It is a source of congratulation, that our ancestors early adopted the system of free common schools as the best means of promoting the general diffusion of knowledge among all classes of citizens—the direct duty of which is to foster and strengthen the feeling of equity, in respect to political rights, and make that feeling fact which constitutes the main support, and affords the surest guaranty of the preservation of our republican institutions. It is a high honor and gratification, that our ancestors and the principles of the founders of this admirable republic have been, and still are, warmly cherished. Statistics recently furnished, show that our common schools and other institutions of learning in the state have not needed to languish for want of support, but that their benign influence has been early and generally, and that the benefits of education have been as widely diffused, and as highly appreciated and enjoyed, as in any state of the union.—Much has been done here, as well as elsewhere in the cause of education, but doubtless more remains to do. The standard of education in our common schools might well be raised, and improvements in the quality and method of imparting instruction, it is presumed, in many instances, might be adopted. It is an error to suppose, that the committee have attempted to keep our present position merely, will be retrograde; and we certainly ought to do neither in the matter of endeavoring to improve our moral or social condition. This subject is entitled to your earnest consideration, and in any measure you may propose, conducive to the end desired, I shall be most happy to co-operate.

Penitentiary, &c. The state prison has now been under the charge of the present warden for one year, and for the most part that time the management has been employed directly on behalf of the state. I believe that order and strict discipline have been perseveringly maintained, and that the police of the prison is inferior to that of no other prison in the country. The state has recently made a considerable outlay, to commence and carry on business in the prison on its own account; and I trust that, considering the general embarrassment of the times the result of the measure will be found, at least no less than an economy. I am confident that our state penitentiary will yet cease to be a burthen to the treasury, and still answer well the end of its establishment, as a place of strict and secure confinement to hard labor, of those whom the laws condemn to an unenviable fate. The convicting power, I apprehend, has been too often exercised, not only in this, but other states, towards criminals, condemned to ordinary punishment. A pardon has, in consequence, become a matter of hope and confidence, expected to secure the release of the prisoner. The influence of this state of feeling is undoubtedly had in its effects on most convicts. The remedy is easy, and I trust will be adopted. A report from the warden detailing more particularly the state and prospects of the institution, may be expected early in the session. The act of the legislature abolishing imprisonment for debt in this state was undoubtedly just in itself, and in accordance with the principles of humanity and the spirit of the age. I rejoice that our statutes are at last freed of the odious principle that visited upon the free consequences that should attach only to crime. I would there suggest the inquiry, whether some small portions of the uncollected debts of the state, or labor might not justly and consistently with the best good of the community, be exempted from the operation of the trustee process. The beneficial effect of such exemption would be felt by many of the unfortunate debtor class, in the encouragement it would afford them, to persevere in their labors to support themselves, and perhaps families, whose entire dependence is upon the proceeds of their labor for subsistence. The inquiry I think is one worthy of your consideration, and cannot but hope it may meet a favorable response. But let not forget, in the mean time, that impartiality is an essential constituent in just legislation; that creditors, as well as debtors, have rights that are entitled to equal protection. Some additional enactments to protect the just rights of the former class, to secure the honest and industrious from becoming a prey to the idle and dishonest, will become necessary. The committee appointed to review the laws of the state, under instructions by the last legislature, to do, will probably report for your consideration a code of laws on this subject.

Judiciary. Since the last session of the legislature, the counties of Belknap and Carroll have been organized and gone into successful operation. At the next term of the court have three new judges, and may render a new organization of the other terms of the court necessary. I would also suggest to the legislature, whether, so far as any increase of expense and duties have been imposed upon the court, such allowance should not be made, that the compensation of the judges should continue at least equal to what it was when first established. The subject was under the consideration of the last legislature, but I believe no definite action was taken. We ought to have a rigid economy in the administration of all our state affairs—no sinecure offices should be allowed to exist, and no extravagant salaries should be given; but it does seem to me that the compensation to our judiciary is very low, and that we have a right to increase of business, we have imposed additional duties and expense upon them, should, in justice, be increased. I hope this subject will receive and engage the attention of the legislature, and that it will meet with that favor which I am confident, a full examination of its merits will show that it deserves.

Geological survey. By a recent communication from Dr. Jackson, our state geologist, I am informed he is busily employed in the preparation of his report, and that he hopes to have it ready before the close of the session. His report will embrace the general outlines of the survey, and some of the most important facts which bear upon the economical use of minerals; also a series of very delicate chemical analyses of the rocks and soils; that being desirous of presenting as many accurate analyses as possible, he continued his work in the laboratory to the latest moment, and which has consequently delayed an early publication of his report. I entertain a high opinion, that this survey will disclose great and valuable sources of mineral wealth in the state, besides imparting much useful information to the agricultural interest.

Education of the deaf and dumb. The appropriation for the education of the indigent deaf and dumb, has been applied to the object intended; as also in part the appropriation for education of the blind. Of the former class, the applicants are more numerous, and will require at least the full amount appropriated yearly for their benefit. On the other hand, the number of the blind is few in number, and require less at present than the amount of the yearly appropriation for this purpose.

In conclusion, gentlemen, be assured it will give me much satisfaction to unite with you in the adoption of such measures as will promote the welfare and prosperity of our fellow citizens.

JOHN PAGE.

State of New Hampshire.
Executive department, June, 1841.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 18. Mr. Williams presented the joint resolutions of the legislature of Maine, praying for an amendment to the constitution of the United States so as to restrict the president to one term. Similar joint resolutions were presented by Mr. Bates, from the legislature of Massachusetts. These resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Williams presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Maine on the subject of French apportionments: which were ordered to be printed.

The president pro tem. laid before the senate an act of the legislature of Maryland in relation to the completion of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. Laid on the table.

Mr. Clay presented a memorial from citizens of St. Louis, praying that a national bank may be established.

Petitions were presented, by Messrs. Evans, Tallmadge and Rivers, for the passage of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Walker submitted the following:
Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to communicate to the senate a statement of the aggregate of the population of the United States and territories, and in the District of Columbia, under the last census; distinguishing in three separate columns the number of whites, of free persons of color, and of all persons.

Mr. Buchanan moved that when the senate adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Which was adopted.

The senate resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the motion of Mr. Clay to print 1,500 extra copies of the report of the secretary of the treasury.

Mr. Wright then resumed the remarks which he had commenced yesterday.

He was followed by Mr. Woodbury, who made an explanation of his former speech.

Mr. Evans showed that Mr. Woodbury's explanation would not excuse the derelictions of the late administration.

A few words of explanation then followed by Mr. Wright and Mr. Evans, when, Mr. Culbourn desired to offer a few observations on the subject; but the hour was so late that he would move that the senate adjourn. Which motion was put and carried. And the senate adjourned to Monday.

June 21. The president pro tem. laid before the senate a communication from the president of the United States covering a report from the navy department, in compliance with a resolution of the sixth instant, calling for the correspondence in relation to the sailing of the Mediterranean squadron. The correspondence having been partially read, Mr. Preston moved that it be referred to the committee on naval affairs and be printed; which was agreed to.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Tallmadge, a petition from citizens of the city of New York for a general bankrupt law.

Also, from citizens of Buffalo, N. Y. for a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Wright, three memorials from citizens of New York in favor of a bankrupt law; also one remonstrating against a bankrupt law, and another against the enactment of any bankrupt law which shall be retroactive in its character.

By Mr. Merrick, from the board of trade of Baltimore, asking for the establishment of a national bank.

By Mr. Huntington, a memorial for the passage of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Clay, two memorials from citizens of New York, earnestly praying for the enactment of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. Clay, from the select committee to which was referred so much of the president's message as related to the currency, made a report, accompanied by a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Clay submitted a resolution to the effect that, from and after the 23d instant, the hour of meeting of the senate be 10 o'clock, instead of 12, as heretofore.

On motion of Mr. Mangum, Resolved, That the secretary of the navy furnish a statement of the number of old-fashioned pistols and muskets at present belonging to the naval service.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the motion to print 1,500 extra copies of the report of the secretary of the treasury.

Mr. Culbourn rose and delivered his views on the report.

Mr. Clay made a short rejoinder, and after some further remarks from Messrs. Culbourn, Woodbury and Clay, the motion to print was carried.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill to revive and extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Merrick explained the objects of the bill and moved certain amendments, which were adopted.

Mr. Allen moved to postpone the bill until the first Monday in December next, on which motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

The debate was continued until after 4 o'clock, when Messrs. Allen, Madison, Merrick, Linn, Kim and others, without the question having been taken.

The bill granting $25,000 to the widow of the late general Harrison was read a second time, and referred to a select committee. The senate then adjourned.

June 22. The president pro tem. laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States, communicating the correspondence in relation to the removal of the remains of Gen. Harrison to North Bend. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with the resolution of the 17th inst. asking for copies of the survey of the southern coast, from Appalachicola bay to the mouth of the Mississippi river.

Mr. Huntington presented the preamble and resolutions of the legislature of Connecticut in relation to the repeal of the sub-treasury and the establishment of a national bank.

Also, in relation to the protective tariff.

Also, in relation to the disposal of the public lands.

Also, in relation to such an amendment of the constitution as will restrict the eligibility of the president to a single term.

Mr. H. moved that the resolutions lie on the table and be printed, which motion was adopted.

Mr. Allen presented from citizens of Cincinnati the proceedings of a democratic meeting of the citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the establishment of a national bank, as calculated to cripple legitimate commerce, and representing it as unconstitutional, unwise and inexpedient; calculated to plunder the people, and place them under the domination of a moneyed despotism.

Mr. A. moved to lay the paper on the table, and that it be printed.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, moved to lay the motion to print on the table, as well as the paper.

Mr. Allen demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

And it was laid on the table by the following vote, yeas 24, nays 16.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred.

By Mr. Tallmadge, from citizens of the city of New York, for a general bankrupt law.

Also, from citizens of Plattsburg, for a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Porter, from citizens of New York, in favor of a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Woodbridge, from citizens of Michigan, in favor of the establishment of a national bank.

Mr. Bayard, from the select committee to whom it was referred, reported the bill from the house making an appropriation of twenty-five thousand dollars for the family of Gen. Harrison, with an amendment—which was, that any money that might have been received in payment of salary by the deceased be deducted.

Mr. Clay, from the committee on finance reported the house bill making the appropriations for the present session of congress, with two amendments; one of which was reducing the item of paying for the senate from $26,000 to $20,000; which Mr. C. said, carried out the spirit of retrenchment and reform, and he hoped it would receive the sanction of the senate. This amendment, with the other, was adopted, and the bill passed.

The resolution introduced by Mr. Clay, changing the hour of meeting from twelve to ten in the morning, was taken up, when a short debate ensued, in which Messrs. Clay, Buchanan, Linn, Mangum and others participated, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Buchanan's resolution calling upon the president for the names of all persons in the employment of the government who had been removed from office since the 4th of March last, was taken up; when

Mr. Mangum expressed a wish that the senator from Pennsylvania would let the motion lie on the table for the present at least. What had been done hardly made the preface to the book; when the work was completed, he would join with that senator in calling for the information. The department had been so occupied in business relating to the extra session, that it was next to impossible for them to have attended to other matters. Hereafter he would give his aid to the senator, not only in procuring a list of the removals made under the present administration, but also under the last, so that his gentleman might see the names in parallel columns it be so desired.

Mr. Buchanan said it was as he had expected. What had taken place was only a preface. But thought it as well to have the first volume now, and he could call for the second after the debate should have been completed. As, however, the hour had arrived for taking up the unfinished business of yesterday, Mr. B. would not debate the motion but should call up the resolution to-morrow.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill to revive and extend the charters of the District banks. The motion of Mr. Allen, of Ohio, to postpone the bill until the first Monday in December next pending.

On this motion an animated discussion ensued. Mr. Allen asked the yeas and nays, which, having been granted, were taken, and are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Linn, Madison, McKim, Pierce, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Van Buren, Woodbury, Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Folger, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Seay, Smith, of Ohio, Smith, of South Carolina, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, Young—22.

The bill was then amended in several particulars, a debate arising on all the various propositions, in which Messrs. Merrick, Clay, of Alabama, Benton, Allen, Bayard, Linn, Mangum, Tappan and others participated.

A motion to amend the bill so as to include the following provision was offered by Mr. Benton. "That no bank should pay out or lend out the notes of any suspended bank, or any paper currency whatsoever which is not equivalent to gold or silver." And on this he asked the yeas and nays; which, being granted, appeared as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Folger, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Seay, Smith, of Ohio, Smith, of South Carolina, Southard, Tappan, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Kerr, Merrick, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge—4.

The question having been taken on agreeing with the committee in the several amendments, it was carried.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate then adjourned to meet at 10 o'clock A. M. to-morrow.

June 23. Petition in favor of a bankrupt law were presented by Messrs. Tallmadge, Wright, Woodbridge and Benton. Mr. Wright also presented remonstrances against the passage of the law.

Mr. Buchanan's resolution (calling on the president for a list of removals and appointments since the 4th of March) was taken up; but Mr. Buchanan said, if the occasion delayed, he had no disposition to press it.

Mr. Mangum thought it very important to discuss proscriptio in hot weather. He had no amendment prepared, but to-morrow, perhaps, he might so arrange as to have the debate. He had then removed since March, 1811, and 1829, in parallel columns. The resolution was laid over.

The bill to revive and extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia was put on its third reading, when

Mr. Norwich moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out the amendment which had been adopted yesterday, preventing the banks of the District from paying out or lending out the notes of any suspended banks.

Mr. Merrick spoke in favor of the recommitment?

Mr. Mangum would not object to the recommitment of the bill, but would suggest to the senator whether it would not be better to so modify his motion as to recommit without instructions.

Messrs. Young, Benton, Allen and Buchanan severally spoke in favor of the principles contained in the amendment that had been adopted yesterday, as salutary and calculated to promote the interest of the people of the District.

Messrs. Barrow and Norwich sustained the motion to recommit, the latter, having adopted the suggestion of Mr. Mangum, simply to recommit the bill without instructions. The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: yeas 25, nays 24.

So the motion prevailed and the bill was recommitted.

Mr. Clay then moved to proceed to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States. Mr. C. could suggest nothing; it would not be better to dispense with the reading of the bill except by its title, and proceed to consider it section by section.

Mr. Wright thought, as the bill was long, and as it had only been placed on the tables that morning, and as he had had an opportunity of examining it with that care which no grave matter required, it better to postpone the consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. Clay acceded to the wishes of the senator from New York, but said that the bill had been before the committee of the House, and that the secretary had, which was substantially the same, with the exceptions pointed out in the report.

Mr. C. then moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business, which motion was carried; and, after some time spent in executive session, the senate adjourned.

June 24. The president pro tem. laid before the senate, in compliance with a resolution of the 17th inst., a communication from the state department exhibiting an abstract of the 6th census, showing the aggregate amount of population in all the states and territories. Ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, a message, from the president of the United States, in compliance with a resolution, as to the delay of the repairs on the Potomac bridge.

Also, a communication from the treasury department, relating to the commerce and navigation of the country.

Mr. Huntington moved to print 2,000 extra copies of the report on the ground that it was one among the most important that emanates from the government. It was one, too, that did not find its way into the newspapers, like the general reports sent from the executive branch. The motion was carried.

Talbot, presented a memorial from citizens of the city of New York for a bankrupt law.

Also, from citizens of the town of Salina, New York, in favor of a general bankrupt law.

Also, from citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, for the enactment of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. Smith, of Ia., from the committee on the public lands, reported back to the senate the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states in just and equitable proportions, and to amend the act of March last, and several amendments, one of the principal of which is, the incorporation of a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of actual settlers. Mr. S. also submitted a special report with the bill, which succeeded, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Buchanan's resolution calling for the names of those persons removed from office since the 4th of March last, was taken up. The resolution having been read—

Mr. Mangum moved to amend the same by inserting "and also the removals from the 4th of March, 1839, up to the 4th of March, 1841."

Mr. Buchanan said it was not his intention to have had one word on the subject, but he thought the resolution proper and correct in itself, and he was sorry to see gentlemen on the other side so sensitive as to the call, that they should see fit to remember it with an amendment which would defeat the object.

If gentlemen would not object to the amendment sought for by the amendment, why not introduce a distinct resolution, and then he would give it his support. How long would it be before they could get a proper answer, if they were to wait until all the removals made since the last two or three years were to be introduced to those made within two or three months? He asked for no reason for the removals, and the whole subject was so plain and simple that it could give but little trouble to the departments. The call was first suggested to his mind when leaving home. He found that removals were occurring every day from little post offices at cross-roads, and no one could tell from whence the order came, but still the postmasters felt like the leaves in autumn, and yet no paper authorized to publish the removals under the least mention of the facts. When removals took place during the prior administrations, they were made boldly, and were published in the government organ; but now the postmaster general printed 100 per week, and did not notice a removal of it. "How he sticks it!" And yet the senator from North Carolina says it is only the preface to the book—the 1st volume, forsooth—"Mr. Linn. "Dudeeloo!"—yes, dudeeloo! the quarters to follow by and by. He did not complain of these removals, but he would ask, where was the necessity for any concealment? Why seek to disguise them? Amos Kennell, bad as he was represented to be by the party now in power, published a regular register of all removals and appointments.

Mr. B. did not want to show the difference between this administration and the last in exercising the appointing power, but he did desire to show the difference between the professions and the practice of the great whig party. His side of the question never made any professions about prescription, though it had been charged with asserting the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils." Mr. B. further continued his remarks for some time.

Mr. McRoberts said he had the same objection to the amendment as the senator from Pennsylvania. If the amendment was adopted, they would not get the information this session. He was desirous to know what the present administration had been doing since it came into power. This great political party had been detaching prescription, and he proposed to show to the senate some of the declarations of the leading whigs.

Mr. McL. continued his remarks until the hour for taking up the special order had arrived, when he rose.

The senate then proceeded to consider the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal agent.

Mr. Clay rose and explained the object and bearing of the bill—speaking until near 2 o'clock.

Mr. Calhoun desired that the further consideration be postponed until to-morrow—making a few observations in relation to the feeling of the south in regard to a national bank.

Mr. Mangum and Mr. Graham controverted the point as to North Carolina, who was concerned.

Mr. Calhoun reiterated the sentiment for North Carolina on the authority of a gentleman belonging to that state.

Mr. Graham rejoined.

Mr. Clay could not consent to the postponement.

Mr. Buchanan appealed to the senator to agree to the postponement.

Mr. Clay. Indeed, I will not.

Mr. Buchanan said if there were any object like that of excluding the bill, the article on Kentucky would be justified "in putting the screws," but there was no such object. The fact was, that the senator, in explaining the bill, had discussed some of the most important principles ever contended with by the banking system in the country, and he hoped, as the senator had taken his stand against the postponement, he would content himself with simply voting against it.

Mr. Clay. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Dixon, Follen, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Linn, McRoberts, Moulton, Nicholson, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Kentucky, Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Evans, Graham, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Woodbridge—13.

On motion of Mr. Bayard the senate took up the bill granting a loan of $25,000 to the family of the late Harrison.

Mr. Benton moved to recommit the bill to the select committee, with instructions to report the select grounds on which the allowance was made.

This motion was defeated, and the bill was read a third time "a clerk, in which Messrs. Benton, Bayard, Calhoun, Bates, Linn, Walker, Tallmadge, Young, White, Woodbury, Berrien, Archer, Clay, of Kentucky, and others participated.

Mr. Benton asked the yeas and nays on the proposition to recommit, which having been ordered, stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Nicholson, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbridge—30.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Clay moved that the bill have its third reading then.

Mr. Wright and Mr. Benton objected.

A motion was then made to adjourn (two prior motions to the same effect having failed) and carried, and the senate adjourned after having been in continuous session from ten in the morning till five in the evening.

June 25. Messrs. Tallmadge, Barrow, Wright, Clay, Archer and Berrien, presented petitions for the passage of a general bankrupt law. Mr. Barrow presented also a petition for a national bank.

Mr. Berrien reported from the committee on the judiciary the bill establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, with an amendment.

Mr. Woodbury submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to furnish the senate with a copy of any authority he may have received from the president of the U. S. which would authorize him to employ (two prior motions to the same effect having failed) and carried, and the senate adjourned after having been in continuous session from ten in the morning till five in the evening.

from 4th March, 1829, to 4th March, 1841, and continued during the morning hour.

The bill to appropriate the sum of $25,000 to the family of the late president, was read a third time, and on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Benton, Miller, Sevier, King, Pierce, Wright, and others, participated.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the vote stood for the passage of the bill, yeas 23, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbridge—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Surgeon, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—16.

On motion of Mr. Mangum, the senate proceeded to the order of the day, being the bill to incorporate a fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Buchanan said it was his intention to have offered some remarks, but he believed it was understood by his friends on that side of the house that they would let the friends of the bill go on and make it what they wished, and after they had fixed it to suit themselves, he would then proceed to offer briefly his views.

Mr. Clay acquiesced in the suggestion, deeming it the best mode of proceeding.

The bill was then read by sections; and after having been amended in several minor particulars, such as changing the location of one of the offices where the books of the subscription are to be opened—limiting the number of shares to be subscribed for by any individual, company, or state, to two thousand five hundred—no proxy to give more than three hundred votes—no director to hold office for more than five years out of six—prohibiting any loan to be made on the pledge of any public debt—limiting the sum to be loaned to government or any state to one million of dollars, unless specially authorized by law—with some other verbal amendments—

Mr. Huntington moved to amend that part of the 15th section forbidding the issuing of any note of less denomination than ten dollars.

Mr. Clay was particularly anxious on the subject; ten dollars was the amount which the committee thought best; but if the other was supposed to better suit the public convenience, he would not object.

The question was taken on the adoption of this by yeas and nays, and lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Huntington, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Clay, of Ala., Clayton, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—20.

The further discussion was then postponed.

The senate took up the joint resolution from the house of representatives, in relation to the solemnities to be observed in the removal of the remains of the late president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, the senate concurred in the resolution, and a select committee of five was directed to be appointed by the chair on the part of the senate, to advise with the part of the house. And he adjourned till Monday.

June 23. At a quarter past ten, the senate was called to order, and immediately after the reading of the journal, a message was received from the house of representatives, communicating a joint resolution that both houses of congress do now adjourn as an expression of respect to the memory of the recently deceased major general Macomb, late commanding general of the army of the U. States, and that a joint committee be appointed to make arrangements for the attendance of both houses at the funeral this day.

Mr. Clay moved a concurrence. He observed that he did this because the chairman of the military committee, [col. Frazer] whose appropriate duty it would be to notice the event, was not in his seat. He was considering the great press of public business, he would hinder it prefer to have a recess until after the funeral; but if any senator preferred an adjournment he would not object.

Messrs. Morehead and Pierce were appointed the committee on the part of the senate.

On motion of Mr. Bates, the senate adjourned.

June 29. The chair presented a communication from the department of state, in relation to certain census returns not yet received.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and laid on the table:

By Mr. Sturgeon, from citizens of Philadelphia, asking the enactment of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, from citizens of New York city, in favor of a bankrupt law containing the prospective principle, making it compulsory and voluntary; and that it be made applicable to corporations as well as individuals.

Also, from citizens of Oneida county, New York, against the passage of a bankrupt law.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Buckanan, calling for the names of the persons offered for office, when Mr. McRobert's rise and occupied the senate until the hour of taking up the special order.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

The bill was amended in several particulars, the most of which were warmly debated by Messrs. Clay, Huntington, Buckanan, Wright, Woodbury, Walker, Bayard, Calhoun, Barnes, Simmons and others.

At half past 3 o'clock its further consideration was postponed, and the senate went into executive session, and after remaining some time therein adjourned.

June 30. The chair laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States, covering reports from the secretary of state and of the treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the 14th instal, calling for any correspondence in relation to the payment or assumption of state debts. Ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. Tallmadge said he was requested by a most respectable and intelligent committee of the board of trade of the city of New York to present a petition of from fifteen to twenty thousand citizens of that city, for the establishment of a national bank. This memorial was placed in a roll exhibiting the appearance of a small keg, and marked, city of New York, and measured somewhere about 250 feet in length.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and laid on the table:

By Mr. Henderson, from citizens of Mississippi, in favor of a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Buckanan, from citizens of Philadelphia, (merchants and others), remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law.

By Mr. Morehead, from citizens of Kentucky, for the enactment of a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Wright, from citizens of N. York, against the passage of a bankrupt law.

The senate then took up the resolution submitted by Mr. Buckanan, calling for the names of all persons removed since the 4th of March last, pending to which is the amendment of Mr. Mangum, calling, in addition to thereto, for all the removals from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1831.

Mr. Pierce commenced his remarks, and spoke up to the time for taking up the special order, without having concluded.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Henderson moved to amend the 10th section so as to exclude from the purchase of stock all persons other than citizens of the United States or aliens resident therein, and to oblige all corporations or companies to belong to the several states or territories.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. Benton, and supported by Messrs. Henderson, Calhoun and Prescott.

Mr. Mangum was in favor of the amendment with some slight modification, and moved to amend the amendment by striking out "alien residents," and so that he asked the year and says.

Mr. Henderson was understood to say that he fell bound to accept the amendment as a modification; and the call for the year and says was withdrawn.

Mr. Walker spoke with much warmth, and somewhat at large, on the principles of the bill in general, and insisted that such a bank would be attended with the worst possible result to the country.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, spoke for some time in reply to various remarks that had fallen from senators on the other side.

Messrs. Allen, Huntington and Woodbury also spoke on the amendment.

Mr. Morehead then moved to reiterate the original amendment of Mr. Henderson to include "resident aliens" in the privilege, and on this he asked the year and says.

The question was taken, and resulted as follows: yeas 24, nays 25.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Henderson, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Culbourn, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Jones, of New York, Livingston, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Georgia, Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Woodbury, Wright, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Beane, Claiborne, Dixon, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Phelps, Potter, Preston, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, and others—24.

Mr. Henderson then moved further to amend the bill so as to give the privilege to one or more of the stockholders to examine and inspect all private and confidential accounts, dealings and accommodations, at any of the offices of discount and deposit.

On this motion a long and very animated debate arose, in which Messrs. Henderson, Calhoun, Walker, Clay, Benton, Prentiss, Kerr and King participated.

The question was taken on this amendment, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbourn, Fulton, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Jones, of New York, Livingston, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Columbia, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Kentucky, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—23.

It was now late, and Mr. Rives having intimated his desire to offer some amendments to the bill, he moved that the senate adjourn; which motion prevailing, the senate then adjourned.

July 1. The president pro tempore laid before the senate a communication from the treasury department in relation to a clerical error inadvertently made in a former communication.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and laid on the table:

City of New York, from citizens of the city of New York, of Painted Post, New York, and of Southport, Wisconsin territory, for a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Walker, from citizens of Camden, S. C. in favor of a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. Kerr, asking to withdraw the papers of Stockton & Stokes from the files of the senate.

Mr. Preston submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the senate the progress and actual condition of the commission under the treaty with Mexico.

Mr. Benton submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate the reasons for removing the following persons from office, and the information upon which the said reasons were founded, to wit: William Miller, surgeon general of Missouri and Illinois; Joshua Piche, superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis; James Kelle, marshal of Missouri; Robert L. Johnson, assistant Robert Lucas, governor of Iowa; George W. Jones, surveyor general of Wisconsin and Iowa.

The resolution at the request of Mr. B. was laid over until to-morrow.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the resolution of Mr. Buckanan, calling for information as to persons removed from office since the 4th of March, 1841, when Mr. Pierce rose and addressed the senate until the morning hour expired.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Rives rose and moved to strike out from the 16th fundamental rule of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States the following words:

"And the said directors may also establish companies of discount and deposit in any state, territory or district of the United States, and shall have power to commit the management of the said companies, and the business thereof, respectively, to such persons, and under such regulations as they may deem proper, not being contrary to law or to this charter. Or, in lieu of establishing such offices, it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation from time to time to employ any agent or agents, or any other bank or banks, or to be deputed by the secretary of the treasury, at any place or places that the said directors may deem safe and proper, to manage and transact the business proposed as aforesaid, other than for the purposes of discount, and to perform the duties hereinafter required of the said corporation, to be managed and transacted by such officers, under such agreements and subject to such regulations as they may deem just and proper."

And to insert in lieu thereof the following words: "That the said corporation shall establish a competent office of discount and deposit in any state, by or under the authority of the legislature of such state, whenever the directors may think fit so to do; and when established, the office shall not be withdrawn without the assent of congress; and the said corporation shall have power to commit the management of the said offices and the business thereof respectively, to such persons, and under such regulations, as they shall deem proper, not being contrary to law or constitution of the bank; or, instead of establishing the said offices, it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation from time to time to employ any individual, agent, or any other bank or banks, to be approved by the secretary of the treasury, at any place or places that they may deem safe and proper, to manage and transact the business proposed as aforesaid other than for the purposes of discount, and to perform the duties hereinafter required of the said corporation, to be managed and transacted by such officers under such agreements and subject to such regulations as they may deem just and proper."

Mr. Rives addressed the senate at length in advocacy of his amendment.

Mr. Clay, of Ky. replied in opposition.

Mr. Preston concurred in the amendment of the Virginia senator, and stated his views briefly.

On motion Mr. B. Wright's senate adjourned.

July 2. The president laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States containing correspondence between himself and Mrs. Harrison, (for which see house report of yesterday).

On motion of Mr. Allen, the message and correspondence was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Tallmadge presented memorials from various citizens of New York, and also of Westchester county, and Salina, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which were laid on the table.

Mr. Allen presented the memorial of citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, against a national bank, &c. &c. which was laid on the table.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Preston, calling for the progress and actual condition of the commission under the treaty with Mexico, was taken up and reported.

The senate then took up the resolution calling for the names of persons removed since the 4th of March last; when Mr. Pierce rose and occupied the morning hour, in support of the resolution.

Mr. Lin announced his intention to offer some remarks on the subject of adjournment.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States; the amendment of Mr. Allen was pending. Mr. Choate rose in support of the amendment.

Mr. Simmons followed in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Archer addressed the senate against the amendment.

Mr. Rives replied at some length.

Mr. Merrick moved to go into the consideration of executive business; but, on motion of Mr. Sevier the senate adjourned.

July 3. The president laid before the senate, in compliance with a resolution of that body, a communication showing the state of negotiations with the German Customs Union, relating to the reduction of the duties on tobacco. Laid on this table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Woodbury presented resolutions of the legislature of the state of New Hampshire, against a national bank, against an increase of the tariff, and against the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. Wright presented the memorial of citizens of Otsego county, New York, earnestly praying the enactment of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. Buckanan presented a memorial from the Philadelphia chamber of commerce in relation to an appropriation for keeping up the light on the Delaware breakwater.

Mr. Lin presented a memorial from citizens of Missouri in relation to the trade of the west with the Mexican provinces.

Mr. Lin went into a full history of the advantages to be derived from this trade in a national point of view, in concluding us to exercise a controlling influence in the trade of the west. Mr. L. did not finish when the morning hour expired.

Mr. Bayard moved that a select committee of five be appointed to take into consideration the 47th rule of the senate, or so much thereof as related to reporters; which was agreed to.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States; the amendment of Mr. Rives was pending.

Mr. Bayard rose and addressed the senate at some length, generally in favor of the principles of the amendment of Mr. Rives, and concluded by offering as a substitute the following:

"Strike out all after the word 'corporation' and insert 'not less than three, nor more than five, or more persons, or to employ any bank or banks, at any places they may deem proper, to perform the duties hereinafter required of the said corpora-to be the fiscal agent of the government, and to manage and transact the business of the said corporation other than the ordinary business of discounting the promissory notes. That is to say, the said corporation shall have the right at such agencies to receive deposits, to deal or trade in bills of exchange, gold or silver coin, or bullion, or goods or lands purchased on execution, or taken bona fide in payment of debts or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands, and to circulate its notes. And, moreover, it shall be lawful for the said board of directors to convert such agencies into offices of discount and deposit, and to receive and register any particular state in which such agency shall be established shall at its next session, after such agency is established, express its dissent thereto."

Mr. Phelps spoke for some time in favor of the amendment of Mr. Rice—when Mr. Huntington, following with much zeal the bill as originally reported from the select committee.

Several senators here rose to address the senate; when Mr. Smith, of Ind., having obtained the floor, moved to go into executive session.

Mr. Clay seconded the motion, observing that the public business might suffer if the motion before us was not attended to.

The senate went into executive session, and, after some time spent therein, adjourned to Tuesday next.

July 6. Memorials and petitions were presented and laid on the table.

Mr. Mangum, from the committee on naval affairs, to which had been referred the correspondence in relation to the return of the United States squadron from the Mediterranean, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

After a few remarks from Messrs. Mangum, King and Preston, the report was adopted, and the committee discharged accordingly.

Mr. Linn moved to take up a resolution submitted by him on Saturday last in relation to a change of the hour of meeting of the senate, from 10 o'clock A. M.

The resolution was opposed by Messrs. Clay, Walker and King, and advocated by Messrs. Linn, Preston and Calhoun. The question on the resolution was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: yeas 13, nays 31.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to incorporate subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States; the amendment of Mr. Bayard to the amendment of Mr. Rice pending.

Mr. Berrien rose and addressed the senate in very considerable length in favor of the bill as originally reported from the committee, and against the amendment of Mr. Rice.

Mr. Merrick followed, speaking for upwards of an hour in favor of the amendment, on the ground of expediency, but maintaining the constitutional power of congress.

Mr. Bates also went at large into the merits of the subject, maintaining the power of congress to be as fully established as that of creating light houses for the preservation of property, but that on the whole, as a matter of expediency, it was better to sustain the amendment of the senator of Virginia.

When Mr. Bates closed his remarks, the question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Bayard, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bayard, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Morehead, Prentiss, Southard, Whipple. NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Kentuckey, Claiborne, Dixon, King, Linn, McKim, Merriam, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—36.

Mr. Prentiss spoke in favor of Mr. Rice's amendment.

Mr. Dixon made a few remarks against it.

Mr. White gave his reasons at some length for the vote he was about to give. He sustained with much zeal the original bill, as reported from the committee.

Mr. Walker, though opposed to all banks, sustained the amendment of Mr. Rice on the ground of state rights. He said, if that bill became the law of the land, we should have the war of nullification renewed before twelve months went over our heads; and asked if there was any thing so flattering in the recollection of that history that gentlemen would like to see it again revived.

After Mr. Walker concluded his remarks, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. Rice, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Choate, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rice, Walker, Williams—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Claiborne, Claiborne, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Linn, McKim, Merriam, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—38.

Mr. Huntington then said there was a trivial amendment which he would like to offer to the 9th section, viz: to strike out the words "seven millions," and insert "six million five hundred thousand dollars." Mr. H. explained the object.

Mr. Clay said the amendment was perfectly proper, and would be passed.

The amendment was adopted, and the senate then adjourned.

July 7. The president laid before the senate a communication from the treasury department in relation to the standard of weights and measures, and announcing the completion of the ounce weight.

Also, from the navy department, in compliance with a resolution, showing the number of old-fashioned muskets and pistols on hand.

Memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred.

The resolution of Mr. Buchanan calling for the names of persons removed from office since the 4th of March last being taken up—Mr. Linn rose and occupied the morning hour in favor of the resolution, asserting that the present administration was one of the most proscriptive character.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bill to incorporate subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Buchanan rose and addressed the senate at great length against the government principles of the bill, and moved by moving to strike out the District of Columbia as the location.

Mr. Clay would inquire of the senator from Pennsylvania if he had any particular location in view? Mr. Buchanan said, if he succeeded in the motion to strike out, that of filling up would be for after consideration.

Mr. Benton expressed his intention in going for the motion to strike out. If the bank were located here, it would be managed by used-up politicians, and out of congress, as well as others.

Mr. Wright would move to strike out, to relieve the bill from all difficulties.

Mr. Wright thought the bank of the committee bad enough, but, bad as that was, the notion of the senate to locate it in Pennsylvania would be much worse, as then it would go to New York, where it would become the Bank of England in New York, managed by stock-brokers and jobbers; and, bad as politicians were, they were infinitely worse.

Mr. Woodbury said, if the bank were to be a mere fiscal machine, it should be located at the seat of government; but if it were to become a commercial agent, then it should be located in some commercial mart.

Mr. Calhoun thought the location in this District a mere sham. He would vote for the motion to strike out, and then he would endeavor to have fair play, by giving the south her share. He thought New Orleans would be the best location. He would like to have it as far off as possible from the influence of the national legislature.

Mr. Allen spoke for some time against the establishment of any bank, and said if that went into operation there never would be an independent majority on the floor.

Mr. Benton contended that New Orleans was the place, above all others, for the location. If there was to be a bank, it should be where the exports were greatest, and where the exchanges between the north and south would be better regulated.

Mr. Calhoun said if there was to be a bank, it should be south of Mason and Dixon's line. The exports from Alabama and Mississippi were equal to one-half of the products of the whole U. States.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Merriam, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Claiborne, Claiborne, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriam, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—38.

Mr. Calhoun then moved to strike out and insert New Orleans.

On this motion a debate ensued, of some length, in Messrs. Calhoun, Benton, Walker, Clay, of Ala.

The question having been taken, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Merriam, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Claiborne, Claiborne, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, McKim, Merriam, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—29.

Mr. Wright then offered resolutions, amendments, which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Walker also offered amendments, which were likewise ordered to be printed.

And the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

[The select committees appointed under the resolutions adopted Thursday 17th, consist of the following members:

Committee on patronage in the several departments of the public service at the seat of government, &c.—Messrs. Thomas W. Gilmer, J. F. Randolph, John Maynard, Wm. W. Irwin and R. D. Davis.

Committee on slavery, &c.—Messrs. Sumner, A. S. Foster, White, of Indiana, Briggs, and Johnson, of Tennessee.]

Friday, June 18. The journal of yesterday was read, (except so much thereof as included the preamble and resolutions of Mr. Waterson in relation to renouveau for the reading of which, on motion of Mr. J. C. Clark, was dispensed with.)

Mr. Morgan desired to inquire of the speaker whether it was in order to put on the journal the preamble and resolutions of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Waterson). The speaker said it was.

Mr. Morgan desired to know whether it was in order to move to strike out that portion, so that it should not appear on the journal. The speaker said it was not in order.

The journal was then approved.

Mr. Adams rose to know if there were any standing committees of this house. He did not consider himself as belonging to any committee since the reconsideration of the rule, and he would move that the speaker be now authorized to appoint the standing committees; and he would beg the speaker not to appoint him at the head of any committee. And if the house should decide that the committees are in existence, he would request that he be excused from service on the committee on Indian affairs.

And the house excused him.

The committee on the rules reported in part that an addition to the 12th rule be made, preventing any motion from being offered for the suspension of the rules, and that no resolution shall be offered out of the regular order.

Mr. Walker objected to this report of the committee, as they appeared to be a standing committee with a right to report whenever a role should be found necessary to control the minority. Mr. W. moved to lay the motion of the committee on the table. Lost.

Mr. Clifford inquired of the chairman when the committee would be able to report in full. He had always conceived that the rules were to be proposed, the minority are under an arbitrary control, that may be carried to any extent, even to forcing the previous question in committee of the whole.

Mr. Clifford said that it was the will of the majority who had come here, to do business, and it appeared that the minority had come here to prevent action, and to talk; he would therefore move the previous question.

After some remarks by Messrs. Turner, Underwood and Alderman, Mr. J. C. Floyd said if the speaker had decided that the resolution of the committee could be adopted this day without a majority of two-thirds. The speaker said he had.

Mr. J. C. Floyd then took an appeal from the decision of the chair, and asked for yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the chair was sustained 123 yeas, 70 nays.

The previous question was then put and carried in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on the main question, and the yeas and nays were demanded. And the report of the committee was adopted, yeas 124, nays 80.

In motion of Mr. Adams, the house went into committee of the whole. Mr. Tallmadge, in the chair, and took up the bill for the relief of Mr. Harrison, widow of the late president of the United States.

Mr. Adams explained that gen. Harrison had been drawn one cent of his salary as president, though it was usual to draw it monthly.

mission relative to the seizure of American vessels by British armed cruisers, &c. was taken up.

Mr. Adams moved the following amendment:—
“And also, copies of all correspondence between the government of the United States and of Great Britain since the 3d March, 1837, relating to the foreign slave trade, not communicated with the message of the president of the 3d of March last, and all other parts of despatches from Nicholas P. Trist, consul of the United States at the Havana, to the department of state, not contained in the said message of the 3d March last.”

After remarks by Messrs. Dawson, Adams and Gilmer, the amendment and the resolution were adopted.

The resolution of Mr. Wood calling for information relative to the American citizens, now prisoners of state at Van Diemen's Land, was adopted.

Mr. Randolph, of N. J., offered a resolution, that ten thousand extra copies of the report of the secretary of the treasury on the finances be printed. This, as giving rise to debate, lies over one day.

Mr. Wise moved to take up the resolution previously offered by him, requesting the secretary of the treasury to lay before the house the plan of the fiscal account recommended in his report of the 3d inst.:

This, after an interesting debate, by Messrs. Margan, Wise, S. Mason, G. Davis, Underwood, Adams, Wm. C. Johnson and Sergeant, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house now resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Tillamook in the chair), and took up the bill making appropriations for the present session of congress. Which, after a short debate, was passed in committee. It was then read a third time and passed in the house.

Its appropriations are as follows:

For the pay and salaries of the members of the senate, $63,241

For pay of the chaplain of the senate, 500

For printing, stationery and contingent expenses of the senate, 26,189

For pay and mileage of members of the house and chaplain 236,600

For printing, stationery and contingent expenses of the house, 30,836

For supply of stationery of second session of twenty-seventh congress, 15,000

Total amount, $397,666

Providing that no part of the sums appropriated for the contingent expenses of either house be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger or attendant of either house.

The speaker laid before the house a communication containing estimates for additional appropriations for the department of war.

The following resolutions were offered, which,

under the rule, lie over one day.

By Mr. McKoy—a resolution directing “the secretary of the treasury to report to this house a list of the several appropriations which his states, in his report of the 2d June, were expended and outstanding on the 4th March, referring to the acts by which they were passed, and designating those which will be required for the service of the current year; and also those required between the 1st

June and 31st August next.”

“Also, the amount of money drawn from the treasury between the 4th March and 31st day of the present year, both inclusive; the amount accounted for by disbursing agents within this period, so as to exhibit, as near as possible, the amount of expeditures between the days above mentioned, and showing the amount in the hands of disbursing agents, and unaccounted for on the 1st June.”

By Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, a resolution directing the committee of ways and means to inquire into the expediency of an amendment to the anti-treasury act, authorizing all debts accruing to the United States, to be collected in the legal currency of the U. S. or in treasury notes, or current bank notes of specie paying banks; and also repealing so much of the sub-treasury act as makes it obligatory, after a certain period, on the officers and agents of the United States, or the general post office, to make all payments in gold or silver coin only.

By Mr. King, of Georgia, a resolution that the surveys of Doboy and Sarpelo inlets in Georgia, with the report on the same, by Lieut. Gilpin, U. S.

navy, 1840, be published under the direction of the navy department.

By Mr. Marisweather, of Georgia, a resolution calling on the secretary of the treasury to report to this house whether any bank or banks have been used in the disbursement of the public money since the passage of the sub-treasury act; and if so, what banks have been employed on what terms, &c.

The house adjourned at 3 o'clock.

Tuesday, June 22. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Petitions and memorials were presented.

The report was offered yesterday by Mr. Randolph for printing ten thousand copies of the report of the secretary of the treasury on the finances, con-ing up in order, Mr. R. moved the previous question on its adoption, the demand was sustained, and the question lay on the yeas and nays, and was decided in the affirmative, yeas 100, ayes 79.

This resolution offered yesterday by Mr. McKoy, was adopted.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. King, respecting the surveys of Doboy and Sarpelo inlets in Georgia, was taken up and after discussion was referred to the committee on naval affairs.

Mr. W. C. Johnson, from the committee on the public lands, by unanimous consent, reported a bill to appropriate for a limited time, the proceeds of the sale of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain states; which having been read twice by its title, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

The following resolution, presented yesterday by

Mr. Russell, of S. C. came up in its order:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act entitled “an act to provide for the collection and disbursement of the public revenue,” approved July 4, 1840, as to authorize all duties, taxes, debts or sums of money, accruing and becoming payable to the United States, to be collected in the legal currency of the United States, or in treasury notes, or in current bank notes of specie paying banks, payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States; and also of providing by law for settlements with the banks, respectively, for such balances of their notes as may remain on hand at the expiration of certain periods, and of repealing so much of the said act entitled “an act to provide for the collection, and keeping transfer and disbursement of the public revenue,” as makes it obligatory, after a certain period, upon officers or agents employed in making disbursements on account of the United States, or of the general post office, to make all payments in gold and silver coin only.

Mr. Russell, of S. C. moved to amend the bill, by inserting the words “and also” after the words “and also” in the 1st section of the bill, and moved to lay the resolution on the table which was agreed to.

Mr. Pope then moved to reconsider the act of the house yesterday, by which it had referred the bill for the repeal of the sub-treasury to the committee of ways and means, with a view to having it referred to the select committee on the currency.

This motion gave rise to a lengthy discussion, which was brought to a close by Mr. Clark, of N.

Y. demanding the previous question, and was called for on seconding the demand by the previous question, and Messrs. Atherton and Broadman were appointed, and the question being taken, there appeared yeas 94, nays 86. So the motion was second.

Mr. Wood, of N. Y. asked the yeas and nays on opening the main question, and being taken, were yeas 114, nays 86. So the main question was ordered to be taken.

Mr. Atherton asked the yeas and nays on the main question, (being, on the motion to reconsider), and being taken, the yeas being taken, was as follows: yeas 118, nays 80.

And the question recurring on the reference of the bill, Mr. Fillmore withdrew his motion to refer to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Russell moved to refer to the select committee on the currency.

Mr. Pickens moved to refer to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Some remarks were then made by Messrs. Pickens, Adams and Cushing, when Mr. Mason, of Ohio, moved the previous question.

Mr. Floyd, of N. Y. renewed his motion to refer the bill to the committee of ways and means.

The question was then taken, first, on the motion to refer the bill to the committee of ways and means on the state of the union, and it was rejected.

And the question was taken, secondly, on the motion to refer to the committee of ways and means, and it was rejected. And the bill was referred to the select committee on the currency.

A resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Meri-weather, calling on the secretary of the treasury to report to the house whether any bank or banks have been used in the disbursement of the public money since the passage of the sub-treasury act, was taken yeas 100, nays 86, and after some desultory conversation, adopted.

The speaker laid before the house the following message and correspondence from the president of the United States, which was read, and, after some conversation, was referred, on motion of Mr. Pennington, to the select committee appointed on the 1st instant, upon the subject of the death of William Henry Harrison, late president of the U. States:

Washington, June 23, 1841.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States: I have the honor to submit the accompanying correspondence between myself and the honorable J. Burnett, J. C. Wright, and others who arrived some days ago in this city, as a committee on behalf of the people of Ohio, and for the purpose, with the assent of the family, of removing the remains of the late president of the U. States to North Bend, for interment. I have thought it to be my duty thus to apprise congress of the contemplated proceedings. JOHN TYLER.

Washington, June 16, 1841.

To the president of the United States:

DEAR SIR: The undersigned were appointed by the citizens and city council of Cincinnati, and by many of the surviving soldiers of the late war, to apply to the widow and family of our distinguished citizen, the late president of the U. States, for permission to remove his remains from the city of Washington to the state of Ohio, for interment.

They have made the application, and have received permission to perform that sacred trust.

They have now the honor of reporting to you their arrival in this city, and of asking your approbation of the measure contemplated, and your co-operation in carrying it into effect.

We are fully aware of the high estimate you placed on the talents and virtues of our lamented friend and fellow citizen, the late chief magistrate of our union, whose friendship and confidence we possessed many years. We see the tear fall from your eye and mingle with the tears of the nation when the inscrutable will of heaven removed him from us.

Knowing these things, we approach you with confidence, and assure that we have a justly appropriate motive for undertaking the mournful duty

we have been deputed to perform, and that the same kind feeling which has marked your course through life will prompt you on this occasion to afford us your countenance, and, if necessary, your co-operation.

If I meet your approbation, the committee will do themselves the honor of waiting upon you at the president's house, at any hour you may please to designate.

With high respect, we are, your friends and fellow citizen:

J. BURNET,

J. C. WRIGHT,

T. H. D. CARNELL,

EDWARD S. MASON,

REFUS WOODRUFF,

L. WHITEMAN,

A. DUDLEY,

D. A. HOWELL,

A. McALPIN,

JOHN REEVES,

Washington, June 17, 1841.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 16th was duly received, and I lose no time in responding to the feelings and sentiments which you have expressed for yourselves and those you represent, and which you have correctly ascribed to me in regard to the lamented death of the late president. As a citizen I repeated him, as a patriot I honored him, as a friend

cinatti should drive to keep watch over his remains by embowing them near the city, is both natural and becoming; that the entire west, where so many evidences of his public usefulness are to be found, should unite in the solemnity of such a duty, was never expected; and that the surviving soldiers of his many battles, led on by him to victory and to glory, should strive to perform the last melancholy duties people of Cincinnati, admits of no opposition on my part, neither in my individual nor official character.

I shall feel it to be my duty, however, to submit our correspondence to the two houses of congress now in session; but anticipating an effort from that quarter to thwart the wishes expressed by yourselves in consonance with those of the widow and nearest relatives of the late president, I readily promise you my co-operation towards enabling you to find the sacred trust which brought you to this city.

I tender to each of you, gentlemen, my cordial salutations.
JOHN TYLER.

To J. Burnett, J. C. Wright, and others of the committee.

And, the hour of three having arrived, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 23. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. D. H. Lewis introduced his colleague, hon. Geo. S. Houston, representative elect from the state of Alabama, who was qualified and took his seat.

The speaker announced the following members in the select committee on the message of the president of the United States, transmitted yesterday, in relation to the removal of the mortal remains of the late president of the United States:

Messrs. J. Q. Adams, of Mass.; Fessenden, of Maine; Atherton, of N. Hampshire; Tillamush, of Me.; Williams, of Kansas; Everett, of Vermont; Greig, of New York; Ayer, of New Jersey; Sergeant, of Penn.; Rodney, of Delaware; W. C. Johnson, of Md.; Taliaferro, of Virginia; L. Williams, of N. C.; John Campbell, of S. C.; Dawson, of Georgia; Foy, of Kentucky; A. V. Brown, of Tennessee; S. Mason, of Ohio; E. D. White, of La. Wallace, of Indiana; Miller, of Missouri; Cross, of Arkansas; Howard, of Michigan; Lewis, of Ala.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the order of the states and territories, and presented.

Mr. Adams offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That so much of the message of the president of the United States of the 1st instant, as relates to the African slave trade, be referred to the committee on naval affairs, with instructions to report to the house such measures as the highest considerations of public honor as well as the strongest promptings of humanity require for the redemption of our trade.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of war transmit to this house a copy of the report of the inspector of armaments, &c., referred to in the memorandum attached to the secretary's report accompanying the president's message.

Mr. Brewster offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the revenue laws as to allow drawback upon goods transferred abroad in the original boxes and packages to foreign countries.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the committee of ways and means were discharged from so much as the president's message as relates to the subject of new fortifications, and it was referred to the committee on military affairs.

On motion of Mr. W. C. Johnson, the committee of the whole on the state of the union was discharged from the consideration of the bill reported yesterday to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting lands to certain states, and the same was referred back again to the committee on public lands.

Mr. Goggin offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not deemed incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence which may be taken place between the executive and our ministers or agents abroad and others relative to the tobacco trade between this and foreign countries since the last communications made to this house on that subject.

Mr. Trippitt offered the following resolutions (which are those offered at the last session of congress, but are not there recited):

Resolved, That the government in the stocks of the several states, the amount of funds held by the government of the United States in trust, to the amount of the sums so invested, and of the interest thereon, as a compensation by the United States of the debt of the said several states, in the event of their failure punctually to pay the same.

Resolved, That the purchase, by authority of any executive department of the government of the United States, of the bonds of any of the states of this union, at their nominal value, or with a premium thereon, and the subsequent sale of the same bonds at a discount, is an unnecessary and wasteful dissipation of the public funds.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the executive government of the United States to require of the government of each and every state of this union in whose stocks investments of the public moneys held in trust by the government of the United States have been made, punctual payments in specie or its equivalent, of the interest stipulated in the said stocks, and repayment of the principal, as soon as possible, by the means of the coupons upon which such stocks have severally been issued.

Resolved, That the further investment of any public funds of the United States in stocks of the several states, and forthwith to be prohibited by law; and that the committee of ways and means be instructed to report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. E. D. White offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans.

A number of resolutions were offered, which were laid over under the rule, and will appear in their progress.

Mr. Randall asked the house at this time to take up and consider a memorial presented by him yesterday in relation to the operation of the present tariff laws upon the iron manufactures of the country, (which petition, giving rise to debate, had been laid over yesterday on a motion to postpone).

And the house having consented to take up the memorial, an animated debate ensued, in which Messrs. Adams, Fessenden, Arnold, Arns, Abbott and others participated, (which for want of room we are compelled to omit), and was brought to a close by a motion of Mr. Briggs that the house adjourn, which was carried, and the house at 1 o'clock adjourned.

Thursday, June 24. The speaker announced the unfinished business to be the motion, heretofore submitted by Mr. Randall, to print the memorial presented by him in relation to the operation of the present tariff law on the iron manufactures of the United States.

And further debate arising, the memorial was laid to be printed.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the reverse order of the states and territories, and were presented.

The committees were then called in their order for the consideration of their business.

Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill authorizing a loan not exceeding the sum of twelve millions of dollars.

The bill having been read twice, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. C. Johnson from the committee on the public lands, reported a bill to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant premium rights.

On motion of Mr. J. the bill, having been read twice, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

The next order of business was resolutions.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. Adams, was in its order:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house, at the commencement of the next session of congress, a statement of the progress which shall then have been made in the survey of the coast of the United States including the number, location and length of the several base lines measured for the triangulation, the stations occupied therefor, the observations made for, and the corrections applied to, the same; the astronomical observations made for the determination of latitude and longitude; the work done by each corps employed in the survey; and a descriptive list of the charts published, if any.

Also, the amount of money expended on the survey of the coast, from time to time, since its commencement, showing what sum has been appropriated for the purchase of instruments and books; the names of all persons employed upon the survey, distinguishing such as may have been of the army or navy, together with their salaries or other compensation; and by whom appointed to the service; exhibiting as well the direct appropriation for the survey of the coast as the indirect expenditures upon it by reason of the employment thereon of the public vessels and officers.

Also, the probable length of time and amount of money required to complete the survey of the coast in the shortest time, and the sum that would be required by any other mode of surveying the same which shall have for its object the acquisition of the greatest amount of useful information, in the shortest time and at the least expense.

This was debated by Messrs. Cushing, Holmes and Everett, in which the history of the survey, which has been executed under the direction of Mr. Everett, and the great importance of the same, (the length of time and amount of money already employed were detailed; the resolution was adopted.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the treasury department, transmitting the plan of a fiscal agent.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the communication was referred to a select committee on the currency, and was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Winthrop was understood to move that $5,000 extra copies of the plan be printed; which motion, by the rule, lies over until the next day.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. Winthrop, coming up in its order:

Resolved, That the committee on the library be instructed to take measures for procuring annually for the library of congress two or more copies of all important reports or other documents on commercial, judicial or other subjects of interest to our country, which may be published by the parliament of Great Britain, or by the governments of other foreign nations.

Provided, That the same shall be paid for out of the standing appropriation for the library.

Mr. C. Johnson moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "instructed to," the words "inquire into the expediency of."

Mr. Winthrop accepted the amendment as a modification, and after a few remarks by Messrs. Winthrop and Tillamush the resolution was adopted.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. Roosevelt, came up in its order:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality and expediency of the passage of a uniform bankrupt law applicable to moneyed corporations, and especially whether such law would or would not be the most efficient measure for restoring and regulating the currency, for preventing suspensions of specie payments, and keeping banks within reasonable limits.

Mr. C. Johnson moved to amend the resolution, advocating forcibly the passage of such a law.

Mr. Barnard was glad his colleague had introduced the resolution, as it had given him an opportunity of making a speech, which he (Mr. Barnard) considered important, and which, he thought, his desire was gratified, he hoped he would withdraw the resolution, as it was entirely unnecessary, the committee already having the subject before them. He concluded by moving to lay the resolution on the table. (Which he, however, subsequently withdrew).

Mr. Roosevelt replied, after which Mr. Barnard rejoined, the debate assuming a personal character.

After further discussion, by Mr. Davis, of N. Y. the resolution was adopted.

The resolution offered yesterday, by Mr. Floyd, relative to McLeod, was taken up and modifications being made, as proposed by Messrs. Ingersoll and Trippitt, is as follows:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any officer of the army, or the attorney general of the United States, since the 4th March last, been directed to visit the state of New York, for any purpose connected with the imprisonment or trial of Alexander McLeod; and if so, to communicate to this house copies of instructions, reports, resolutions, and other papers, and whether, by any executive measures or correspondence, the British government has been given to understand that McLeod will be released or surrendered.

Mr. Floyd briefly advocated the resolution.

Mr. Ingersoll spoke at length advocating the resolution, and entering into a history of the case from the arrest of the Canadian patriots, the arrest of McLeod, and the circumstances in which the present administration found this case. He attacked and condemned in detail the letter of Mr. Webster to Mr. Fox on this subject, denying the grounds therein stated, and affirming that McLeod was persecuted in this case, and also in case of war, and that Mr. Webster's conduct in this to be a case of war, which was more than even the British minister claimed. Although not given to gloomy ideas, he could not but apprehend, as the consequence of the mistake of Mr. Webster, the plunging of the country into a bloody war, unless by speedy and prompt action on the part of the house it was corrected. He wished the resolution adopted, and that the house freely and candidly communicate with the executive, and act manfully on this subject, which was of paramount importance.

Mr. Cushing entered into an able and eloquent defence of the course of Mr. Webster, and without concluding gave way, and the house adjourned at 3 o'clock.

Friday, June 25. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Adams, by unanimous consent, from the select committee appointed on the subject of the removal of the remains of the late president of the United States, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Saturday next the remains of William Henry Harrison, late president of the United States, be removed, under the superintendence committee of both houses of congress from the congressional burial ground, and accompanied by such members and the delegation from Ohio to the line of the Department of Columbia.

Resolved, That when the two houses adjourn, they adjourn to Monday next.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and were sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Briggs submitted to the chair that he supposed it would be understood that the committee already appointed would be the committee to attend the removal of the remains of the late president.

The speaker said he believed that such was the intention of the resolution.

Mr. Adams was understood to say such was the intention, but that it was a matter within the disposal of the house.

The speaker said that, by the leave of the house, the chair would consider that the committee heretofore appointed should be the committee on the part of the house to carry out the object of the resolution.

Petitions and memorials were called in the order of states and territories, and were presented.

The question pending, was on the resolution considered yesterday, calling for the president for the British relation to the McClellan case, on which Mr. Cushing was entitled to the floor.

Mr. Cushing resumed, from yesterday, his remarks on this subject, and entered into an answer of the charges made by Mr. Ingersoll, Secretary of State, and Mr. Webster from all those imputed blunders. The conclusion to which he had arrived, was the position in which he stated, that the United States, on the great question pending between them and Great Britain, and especially on the main and principal question connected with McClellan, were in the right, and if they should be involved in a war with Great Britain, they would be justifiable, in the face of nations, and of Heaven, to prosecute that war to all extremities. But if gentlemen of the opposition, by their legal ingenuity or by party spirit, conceded the true issue, and their country was involved in a war, on them would be the responsibility; and to them he appealed, that they should act up to the position, and as one man come up to the rescue of their country.

Mr. Wise objected to the resolution, because it was out of time to adopt the resolution now, which would expose to the nation the position of all nations who this government thought of itself about the controversy with Great Britain; and would interfere with our own negotiations; and with the action of our judicial tribunal, which was a separate branch of the government, and they should not directly or indirectly interrupt the operations of the executive.

Without action, the resolution was passed informally, and on motion of Mr. William Cost Johnson, the house resolved, itself into a committee of the whole, on the state of the union, Mr. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, in the chair, and took up the bill "to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights."

The bill was read by the clerk.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson addressed the committee about an hour and a half in support of the bill, without concluding he gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

A message was received from the senate that the senate had passed a bill from the house for the resolution that any sum which may have been paid to any legal representative of William Henry Harrison should be deducted from the appropriation of 25,000 dollars.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the amendment was concurred in.

A message was also received that the senate had concurred in the joint resolution, of the house, for appointing a committee of the two houses to superintend the removal of the remains of William Henry Harrison.

The house then again resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Floyd, of New York, in relation to the case of Alexander McClellan.

Mr. Tillinghast spoke briefly, turning his attention to the law of Vattel, where it was stated that "the nation that ratifies the act of a citizen makes that act a public affair." If it was so, it was not the act of the citizen himself, but the nation took it from the individual. He held that according to law, it was not consistent with the honor of this nation that they should omit to notice the nation ratifying the act of McClellan.

Mr. Holmes opposed the adoption of the resolution as interfering with the action of the department of our government entrusted with this matter.

Mr. Gordon advocated the resolution, that McClellan should be held personally responsible to the law of New York. He was as a representative from the state of New York "to enter his solemn protest" in the name of New York, for any interference on the part of the general government in this case.

Mr. Wise moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Hunt wished the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), to withdraw his motion.

On the motion Mr. Clifford called the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion to lay on the table was negatived—yeas 51, nays 105.

On motion of Mr. Adams, it was resolved that one additional member be added to the committee on enrolled bills.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the resolution fixing 3 o'clock P. M. for the hour of adjournment, without the house previously adjourned, was revived for the ensuing week.

The house adjourned to Monday at ten o'clock.

Monday, June 28. Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, introduced the bill, Harry Black, representative from that state, (vice hon. Charles Ogden, deceased), who was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. Dawson, of Geo. rose and said: Mr. Speaker: It having been announced in the public prints of this city by the secretary of war that major general Alexander Macomb has departed this life, I announce that fact as chairman of the military committee of this body, and I ask leave to present the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the house of representatives have learned with deep regret the death of major general Alexander Macomb, the late commanding general of the army, and the distinguished leader of the glorious battle of Fraunces in the late war.

Resolved, That the house of representatives will, if the senate concur herein, attend the funeral of major general Macomb this day at ten o'clock.

Resolved, That a committee of three members of this house be appointed on the part of the house to make arrangements with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the senate, for the attendance of the senate and house of representatives at the funeral of the late major general Macomb.

The resolutions having been read, were adopted unanimously, and were sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Dawson, (having, he was understood to say, another office assigned him in the arrangements of the day), asked to be excused from service on the committee to be appointed, under the resolution on the table of this house.

And Mr. D. was accordingly excused.

The speaker then announced the following members as the committee on the part of this house.

Mr. John Miller, of Missouri.

Mr. William O. Butler, of Kentucky.

Mr. Aaron Ward, of New York.

Mr. Linn, of New York, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the following resolution, offered by Mr. Briggs on Friday last, had been adopted:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the 17th instant, fixing the time for the daily meeting and adjournment of the house as expires to-morrow, be continued in force for one week from the time of its present limitation.

The motion lies over one day.

After the lapse of about fifteen minutes, a message was received from the senate, stating that that body had concurred in the resolutions of the house in relation to the funeral of major general Macomb.

And then, on motion of Mr. Briggs, the house adjourned.

Tuesday June 29. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Adams said he had been requested by Mr. Alexander Hamilton, of New York, to present to this house a draught of an act to organize and establish an exchequer of issue as the chief agent of the United States, together with some remarks of his own, explanatory of its provisions. It was an act prepared by that gentleman, which he wished to be considered, and which he had requested him, (Mr. A.) to move to be printed by the house, and that it be referred to the committee on the currency.

The printing was opposed by Messrs. Everett, Hunt and Brown, of Pa. and supported by Messrs. Adams and Barnard.

Mr. Sergeant moved to amend the motion to print by inserting therein the printing of the plan presented on a former day by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Barnard).

And the question being taken on the motion to refer, the project was referred to the select committee on the table.

Mr. J. C. Clark moved to lay the motion to print on the table; which motion prevailed; yeas 119, noes not counted. So the motion to print was laid on the table.

The house took up for consideration the motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. Linn, to reconsider the vote of Friday last by which the following resolution, offered on that day by Mr. Briggs, was adopted.

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the 17th instant, fixing the time for the daily meeting and adjournment of the house as expires to-morrow, be continued in force for one week from the time of its present limitation.

Some conversation took place on the point of order, after which the question on the motion to reconsider was taken, and was decided in the negative; yeas 77, noes 83.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the reversed order of the states and territories, and were presented.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, it was

Resolved, That all petitions, resolutions of state legislatures, and other papers, on the subject of a bankrupt law, presented in the last congress, be taken from the files of the house and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Calkins, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill to provide for the payment of navy pensions.

The bill was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. C. was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Resolutions being the next order of business, and the unfinished business of the adjourned hour being the unfinished resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Floyd, calling for certain information in relation to the case of Alexander McClellan. The consideration of the resolution was by general consent passed over.

On motion of Mr. W. Cost Johnson, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lawrence, of Penn. in the chair), on the bill to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights.

Mr. W. C. Johnson, who held the floor from Friday last, resumed and concluded his remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. Clifford, of Maine, then took the floor and addressed the committee in opposition to the bill until the hour of three, when he gave way to Mr. Brown, of Penn. on whose motion the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again. And then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 30. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Briggs moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Some conversation followed on a point of order; after which the motion of Mr. Briggs prevailed.

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, in the chair), on the bill to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Clifford to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Clifford resumed his remarks from yesterday. After he had concluded, Mr. Meriwether, of Georgia, obtained the floor, and addressed the committee, and was followed, successively, by Messrs. J. G. Floyd, Harrison, and Kennedy, of Indiana.

Mr. Payne, of Ohio, then took the clerk's table a series of sections, which he and he desired to offer as a substitute for the bill now before the committee.

The chairman said that the pending motion was that submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. Clifford), to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; and that, inasmuch as that motion involved the very existence of the bill itself, it was not in order to propose a substitute or an amendment until that motion had been finally disposed of.

After some conversation, the proposed substitute was read for information.

Mr. Payne said that it was not his intention to go into an argument on the subject, his object being merely to submit a proposition to the committee for their consideration. He did not intend to occupy the attention of the committee at this time; but, when a favorable opportunity should present itself, he might present his views in relation to the proposition then before the house.

Mr. Clifford then rose and addressed the committee at some length; and having concluded, and the hour of 3 having arrived, Mr. Brown moved that the committee rise; which motion having prevailed the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again. And the house adjourned.

Thursday, July 1. The speaker laid before the house certain evidence in the case of the contested election from Virginia; which was referred to the committee on elections.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of state in relation to the census; which, on motion of Mr. Mason, of Ohio, was referred to the committee on the judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, enclosing a memorial from citizens of New York, praying the passage of a bankrupt law. The memorial was signed by 3,000 persons. The message was read and is in the following words:

To the house of representatives of the United States:

The accompanying memorial in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law, signed by nearly three thousand of the inhabitants of the city of New York, has been forwarded to me, attended by a request that I would submit it to the consideration of congress. I cannot waive a compliance with a request upon me by so large and respectable a number of my fellow citizens. That a bankrupt law, carefully guarded against fraudulent practices, and embracing, as far as practicable, all classes of society—the failure to do which has heretofore constituted a prominent objection to the measure would afford extensive relief, I do not doubt. The distress incident to the derangements of some years past has visited large numbers of our fellow citizens with hopeless insolvency, whose energies, both mental and physical, by reason of the load of debt pressing upon them, are lost to the country. Whether congress shall deem it proper to enter upon the consideration of this subject at the present extraordinary session, it will doubtless wisely determine. I have fulfilled my duty to the memorialists in submitting their petition to your consideration.

JOHN TYLER.

Washington, June 30, 1841.

The message and the memorial were referred to the committee on the judiciary, and the message was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Cushman the house resolved itself into a committee. Mr. Lawrence, of Pa. in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, and grant pre-emption rights.

Mr. Brown, of Pa. at great length opposed the bill. Mr. Gilmer opposed the bill in the present financial condition of the country. He regarded the proceeds of the public lands as a legitimate source of revenue; and advocated the distribution of their surplus proceeds, whenever there was a surplus, but opposed it now, as the amount distributed would have to be raised in some other way; and he considered this bill as equivalent in its effects to a direct proposition to borrow this amount of money, or raise it by impost duties for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. Bidlack opposed the bill on the same grounds. The committee then rose.

In the course of the debate, the following message in writing was received from the president of the United States, through John Tyler, Jr. ex. his private secretary:

Washington, July 1, 1841.

To the house of representatives of the United States: I have the honor hereby to submit to the house of representatives the copy of a letter addressed by myself to Mrs. Harrison, in compliance with the resolutions of congress, and to reply thereto.

JOHN TYLER.

Washington city, June 18, 1841.

MY DEAR MADAM: The accompanying resolutions, drafted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States, will convey to you an expression of the deep sympathy felt by the representatives of the states, and of the people, in the sad bereavement which yourself and the country have sustained in the death of your illustrious husband. It may now be justly considered that the public archives constitute his enduring monument, on which are inscribed, in characters not to be effaced, the proud exultations of public gratitude for services rendered, and of respect for his death. A great and united people also their tears over the loss of a devoted patriot and distinguished public benefactor.

In conveying to you, my dear madam, the proposed respect for the two houses of congress for your person and character, and the confidence on the late affecting dispensation of Providence, permit me to mingle my feelings with yours, and to tender you my fervent wishes for your health, happiness and long life.

Mrs. Ann Harrison.

North Bend, June 24, 1841.

DEAR MRS. I have received with sentiments of deep emotion the resolution of the senate and house of representatives, which you have done me the honor of forwarding, relative to the decease of my lamented husband.

I cannot sufficiently express the thanks I owe to the nation and its assembled representatives, for their condolence, so feelingly expressed, of my individual calamity, and the national bereavement; but, mingling my tears with the sighs of the many citizens of the land, pray to Heaven for the enduring happiness and prosperity of our beloved country.

ANNA HARRISON.

John Tyler, president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Cuse Johnson, the message and accompanying papers were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of resuming all land to provide an appropriation of land to satisfy the unassigned military land warrants which have been issued, or which may hereafter be issued, and the relief of certain officers and soldiers of the Virginia line and navy, and of the continental army during the revolutionary and last war, in addition to the bounty heretofore appropriated by sundry acts for that purpose.

The house adjourned at 3 o'clock.

Friday, July 2. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lawrence, of Penn. in the chair), on the bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights.

Mr. Pickens took the floor with a speech against the bill, replying more particularly to Mr. W. Cost Johnson.

Mr. Randolph followed.

Mr. Winkup spoke for three quarters of an hour in great ability, in favor of the bill.

Mr. Cooper, of Penn. replied with great force to the speech of Mr. C. Brown, of Penn. particularly those parts which attacked the character of the citizens of their state. He defended the recent appointments in Philadelphia from the assaults of Mr. B. and denied his statements as to the character of Mr. Bela Badger, and other private individuals who were attacked here, where they had no voice to defend themselves. He then went into the argument on the subject before the committee, and spoke for half an hour in favor of the distribution.

Mr. Dean, of Ohio, followed him in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Hershman then spoke against the distribution, for some time; but, without concluding, he gave way to a motion that the committee rise—when, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Underwood, (on leave) from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill making laws provision for the maintenance of the Indians in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and on motion of Mr. U. was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. U. asked the house now to go into committee on the bill, but, it being close upon 3 o'clock, waived the motion.

Mr. Sturdy gave notice that he would tomorrow make a motion to change the present rule of the house in that particular which fixes 3 o'clock as the hour of adjournment.

And then the house adjourned.

Saturday, July 3. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Some conversation took place between the speaker and Mr. Sturdy, in relation to a notice given by Mr. S. yesterday, of a motion which he intended to submit in relation to the hour of adjournment.

The speaker was understood to say that the regular hour of the meeting of the house, by its order, was 3 o'clock; but that the order which fixed three o'clock as the hour of adjournment had expired.

Mr. Sturdy was understood to say that, when being the case, and the hour of adjournment being all that he wished to reach, it would not be necessary for him to submit any motion.

Mr. Sumner, on leave, presented certain papers concerning the case of contested election from the state of Virginia; which were referred to the committee on elections, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. W. C. Johnson, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, in the chair), on the bill to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights.

The leading question being on the motion of Mr. Clifford to strike out the enacting clause—

Mr. Hershman, who held the floor from yesterday, resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill, and concluded.

Mr. Furmenet followed, also in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Kennedy, of Maryland, then rose and addressed the committee at length in favor of the measure; and was followed, in opposition, by Messrs. Davis, of N. York, and McKee, who was introduced by Mr. Underwood, in his favor. Mr. U. has concluded to sit again.

Mr. Wise obtained the floor, and it being with fifteen minutes of 3 o'clock, and there being a general cry that the committee rise, Mr. W. submitted a motion to that effect; which prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. Hopkins, and then laid over by the rule, was on motion of Mr. H. taken up, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the postmaster general be required to communicate to this house, in as condensed a shape as practicable, the following items of information, to-wit:

The estimates of the postmaster general for each year since the reorganization of the post office department in 1836, together with the actual revenue of each, showing the revenue for the year ending June 30, 1841.

The amounts shown by the reports of accounts postmasters, and of the depositaries receiving public revenue, to have been on hand on the last day of January, 1841, estimating the same, if it be impracticable, giving the date when it was received accurately.

The whole amount due to the department on the 1st of January, 1841, divided into good, doubtful and bad, estimating the same if it cannot be promptly ascertained with sufficient accuracy.

The amount received and reported separately during the quarter ending March 31, 1841, being receipts for that quarter's postage.

One copy of annual cost for mail transportation to be laid on the table.

The cost amount of retrenchment in the annual expenditures of that branch of the service made by the late act, approved April 4th of 1840.

The net amount of reduction in the annual cost of that branch of the service, proposed and proposed, lessened since the 1st of March last, either by amendment or savings in the small letters.

The unadjusted claims for mail transportation presented since the 1st of March last, other than regular quarterly claims, and the charges of the districts, and specific service charged, for the time it was made, and the amount charged in each case, with a list showing the aggregate amount.

Resolved, then, that when this house adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next at 3 o'clock.

Several objections were made, and the yeas and nays were asked and counted.

Mr. Sturdy said that, so far as he could learn, the house had not adjourned over the 4th of July in the last four years. This year the 4th of July happened on a Sunday, and gentlemen could not have a resolution of adjournment of the day after.

He moved to lay the motion of Mr. Winkup on the table.

Mr. Calhoun, to get rid of the difficulty, moved that the house do now adjourn; which motion being prevailed, the house adjourned until Monday morning at ten o'clock.

Monday, July 8. The journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, in the chair), on the bill to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Clifford to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—

Mr. Underwood, who was entitled to the floor, next addressed the committee for three hours and a quarter.

Mr. W. having concluded the chairman pro tempore of the floor, Mr. Rogers, of N. C. who moved that the committee rise, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. And the house adjourned.

Tuesday, July 8. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Kell moved that the house now resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

On which motion the yeas and nays were asked and counted.

Mr. Calhoun inquired of the speaker whether he had not a right to make a report?

The speaker replied that, as chairman of the select committee appointed on the rules, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Calhoun) was authorized to report at any time.

Mr. Calhoun then made a short conversation, (though no appeal was taken); after which

The speaker said that on comparing the record under which the select committee was appointed with the rule in relation to a suspension of the rule to go into committee, the chair was of opinion that

BIOGRAPHY OF JAMES MONROE. Samuel Governeur, esq., is engaged in writing the biography of James Monroe, which will probably be one of the most interesting that has been published in this country. Mr. G. being the son-in-law of Mr. Monroe, could hardly bequeathed in him all the papers of that illustrious statesman, will be enabled to accomplish his undertaking with singular advantages.

CHINA. We are free to understand that the instructions given to Mr. Henry Pottinger on proceeding as commissioner to Canton to supercede Captain Elliot were weaker against the Chinese to an extreme degree than in London.

COTTON. The demand has improved, and a slight advance in price, at the last sales from England. At Charleston last week, 5,134 bales upland sold at 9 to 12 cents, 328 Sea Island at 24 to 40. The better quality in demand.

CALICO. The hottest south of us, has been gathered, and north of us is now being secured. It is presumed from the issue of the public papers which reach us that the product has been about an average in this section of the spring, the same good as us, rather over an average north of us. We have noticed but few complaints from any direction; and therefore from an abundance of the fruits of the earth to supply our wants for the season, and a considerable surplus to relieve the wants of others—if they will only allow us to offer it at market.

CATTLE. The market of N. Chicago, it is thought will reach between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 bushels.

DEATHS. During the last week, in the city of Baltimore 38; twenty of which were under two years of age, 9 free colored and 3 slaves.

ENGLAND. Nine soldiers, attached to an English regiment, stationed at the falls on the Canada side, descended and attempted to reach the opposite shore, swimming across the river, in which attempt only two were successful, the remaining seven having been drowned while in the water.

FIRES. It is related in a letter from Charleston that on the night of the 23d ult. the small town of Parsburg was entirely burnt down; 294 houses were consumed. An extensive congregation at the town of Crediton, Devonshire, had entirely destroyed no less than forty dwelling houses.

ASHLEY'S AMPHITHEATRE. was destroyed for the third time. It is in injury, with all its contents—including the magnificent variegated suite of seats. Mr. Dorey's loss is $10,000, and no insurance. About 80 houses in the neighborhood were destroyed and one human lost her life.

ESCAPE. At Boston commands from $5 75 to $6 00; at N. York $5 50; at Philadelphia $5 50; at Baltimore $5 50 to $5 60; Alexandria $5 50 state price, $5 15 from Virginia. Suspicious at Alexandria for the quarter ending 30th June, 11,123 barrels 410 half barrels.

FOURTEEN ALIVE. The brig Woodcock, capt. Davis, says the Savannah Gazette, of the 19th inst. arrived at this port yesterday, from Boston, had on board a negro slave named Peter, the property of Jonathan Lucas, of Charleston, S. C. who was found secured to the British ship Wilson, from Charleston, bound to Liverpool, with two days out, fell in with the brig Revere, capt. Haverford, from Havana, bound to Boston, bound to Boston, and put the fugitive slave on board, with a request, that immediately on his arrival at that port, he would put him on board the first steamer leaving for New York, which he did, by delivering him to Captain Davis.

GALERA. A shipment of 250 micks of wheat has been made from Galera for below—the first ever exported from that part of the country.

HARVARD COLLEGE. The Boston Mail states that a great deal of excitement is prevailing among the students and students of Harvard college, at the discovery of an attempt to fire one of the buildings, near the library. A train of powder was laid, communicating with the library, and had it not been for the vigilance of a tutor and a professor, the valuable library, containing upwards of 150,000 volumes, extensive of duplicates, would have been utterly destroyed.

HARVARD COLLEGE. The Boston Mail states that a great deal of excitement is prevailing among the students and students of Harvard college, at the discovery of an attempt to fire one of the buildings, near the library. A train of powder was laid, communicating with the library, and had it not been for the vigilance of a tutor and a professor, the valuable library, containing upwards of 150,000 volumes, extensive of duplicates, would have been utterly destroyed.

HARVARD COLLEGE. The burning of a wooden building on the college ground, a few days ago, is supposed to be connected with these troubles. The affair grew out of an attempt to suppress a "Hasty Pudding club." After accounts state that harmony has been restored again.

HARVARD COLLEGE. The sixty-sixth anniversary of the settlement of Kentucky, was celebrated at Harrodsburg on the 16th and 17th inst. On the 16th between 1 and 10,000 persons, among them about 1,500 Indians, were present. On the 17th an oration was delivered by the Rev. Bro. Harbin. Eight or ten military companies, armed with infantry and cavalry, comprised about 400 men, united in the celebration. The venerable Mr. Harrod was present also in a well known carriage, in a large bed-sitting, yet her eye has the same eagle glance that it was when she was undimmed, at the deadly conflict between the Indians and the whites. Mrs. Thomas and Mrs. Wilson were also two of the ladies of those times of blood and danger. These venerable matrons are now all (with the exception of Mrs. French), who survive of the little company of females who first penetrated the forests of the dark and bloody ground. Of the old officers of that period, we saw but few, and none of them were known to us by name, except Mr. John Ward, of the Kentucky militia, who was the only survivor of the gallant band by whom McAfee's station was defended.

INTERMEDIATE IN GREAT BRITAIN. It is estimated that twenty millions of gallons of spirituous liquors, are annually consumed—bringing a revenue to government of duty and excise, of between seven and eight millions of pounds sterling. Rev. J. Ford, in his narrative on the temperance pledge, says that in the course of one year 18,000 offenders, through drunkenness, were committed to prison in Scotland and Wales. In the metropolitan suburbs, the year 1837 witnessed no fewer than 31,351 persons, many of them juvenile delinquents, taken into custody, the victims of intemperance alone. The same authority states that one-half of all madmen, three-fourths of all beggars, and four-fifths of all crime, are occasioned by drunkenness.

LOANS. The New York canal commissioners have advertised for a loan of $130,000 for the enlargement of the Erie canal—$47,500 for the construction of the Oneida river canal and $22,500 for the construction of the Black river canal.

McLEOD CASE. The New York American says, that the decision of the supreme court of that state, now in session at Utica, in the case of McLeod will be given in favor of the British, and the members of the court have prepared written opinions.

MAIL ROBBERIES. Nine cases of mail robbery were tried in the late U. S. district court, held at Cambridge. The parties indicted were George Wright, stage driver, Levi Wiley, Louman, John D. Wright, clerk, and John D. Wright, clerk, and John D. Wright, clerk, assistant in the office at Gareat, Alfred D. Wright, John Harrington—Mills and Hutchinson. These in concert Wright confessed and was admitted to go in court of behalf of the United States. Mills gave bail and absconded, and Hutchinson was never arrested. The mail and contents, in these parties were extensive and long continued.

Charles Lancaster, late postmaster in Carrollton, in Illinois, was tried at the late term of the U. S. court in Springfield, on an indictment for purloining money from letters, and sent to the penitentiary for ten years. James McCabe, charged with having robbed the mail between Springfield and Shelbyville, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to ten years imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary.

M. W. Andrews, of Paris, who was apprehended on suspicion of having robbed the mail, was released—no indictment having been found against him—the proofs not being sufficient to support the charge.

THE MILK SPOILERS. The Louisville Journal states that further experience in Indiana and Illinois has convinced the public that "milk sickness" may be cured by adding the cattle feed.

MORMONS. The ship Harbory arrived at Quebec from Bristol on the 26th ult. all the passengers by which vessel are Mormons, on their way to Illinois. They were accompanied by two of their priests, and are detected looking people.

NEW YORK CANALS. They were received for bids on the New York state canals during the last week in June, 1841.

Essex in favor of 1841,	$16,700 35
They were received for tolls during the month of June, 1841,	$254,377 09
Same period in 1840,	$20,918 61
Increase in 1841,	$16,358 43

PITTSBURGH TRADE WITH MEXICO. The Pittsburgh Courier states that the trade as commerce of this city with Santa Fe, Chihuahua, and the leading cities of Mexico, are gradually increasing. Six horse wagons are stationed in Pittsburgh, loaded with various goods from New York, and driven to the frontiers of independence in Mexico, and there driven across the country to Mexico, where they were sold and paid for in specie or the best funds.

PRESIDENTIAL. The Pennsylvania are taking the field early for the next canvass. The "Old Academy club" recently formed at Philadelphia are almost compromised for commodore Stewart. The Harrisburg Chronicle is in favor of General Leach, and is for instituting "Clippaway clubs" and trying "Old Chap" as a substitute for "Old Tip." The Harrisburg Telegraph takes the same direction.

PUBLIC LANDS. The public sales of the public lands, advertised for on the 15th inst. at 10 o'clock, in the state of Illinois, have been indefinitely postponed, in consequence of urgent representations from the settlers in that country against the sales being made at the present season.

RED RIVER RAFT. Colonel Lang, of the United States corps of engineers, has just completed a survey of the raft, and is led to believe that the $750,000 appropriated by congress will suffice to clear out entirely, and keep the river clear in future.

SHORT SENATOR. The legislature of Rhode Island adjourned on Saturday, after a session of three days and a half. What a happy thing it would be if our national congress would make this legislature as a model.

STATE DEBTS. All the states have provided for the payment of the interest due on the 1st inst. on their several loans except Mississippi and Indiana. The former have failed to meet her obligation. Indiana on the contrary imposed a tax and appropriated funds, but placed a restriction upon the operations of her agents, which prevented their effecting a negotiation.

STEEL. Of an excellent quality, is now manufactured at Pittsburgh.

STEAMERS. The Acadia arrived at Halifax from Boston on the 13th, took in 32 additional passengers, and probably left the same evening for Liverpool.

STEAMBOATS. The Clarksville, capt. Irvin, of Nashville, struck a snag about twenty miles below Point Chicot, Mississippi, and sank in two minutes. Boat and cargo a total loss. Passengers and crew (except two negro deck hands, supposed to be drowned) were all saved on the upper canal, which parted from the hull as the boat was sinking. Most of the persons on board, floated on this wreck for the distance of eighteen miles. The ladies, three or four in number, were landed in a dock at the distance of eight or ten miles. The whole were relieved in about four hours by the steamer Eliza, of and for St. Louis.

STOCKS. U. S. bank of Pa. at New York 10th inst.

SUICIDES. During the year 1839 there were 2,747 suicides in France.

SLAYERS. From the 1st July, 1840, to the 3rd April, 1841, eleven slayers were captured by British crews on the coast of Africa, and carried into the harbor on board of which were found fourteen hundred and seventy-three slaves.

STEEL. The packet ship London left New York on the 1st inst. having 60,000 from one house on board.

STEWART. It is stated that Mr. Charles W. Dayton, who was indicted for the Great Western, is to bring back Samuel Stewart, who is reported to be residing in London in great penury.

A New York paper says that, among other things which have been discovered in the course of a custom house investigation, is the fact that Samuel Stewart's defection amounted to only about $800,000, and that the remaining 600,000 were pocketed by his speculators, and very successfully put to discomfit.

A THIEF DETECTOR has been invented by a Mr. W. P. Barber, of Boston, which is a piece of machinery which will detect the thief and apprehend him. When the machinery is set in motion, it causes the wheels like that attached to the locomotive, which connect the wheels and sound an alarm when the machine is run down.

TIN. The tin ore lately discovered in Jackson Co., New Hampshire, by Dr. Jackson, the state geologist, is said to be very abundant. It is the only place in the world where tin ore has been found in any quantity. Indeed, there are but three or four tin mines in the wide world, where the metals is produced on an extensive scale.

TRUCKS. Maryland inferior and common are in demand at $4 00 to $5 00, and good $5 00 to $6 00, better qualities between in less demand, command $6 00 to $6 50 for good, and $5 00 to $6 15 for fair.

TRUCKS. Maryland inferior and common are in demand at $4 00 to $5 00, and good $5 00 to $6 00, better qualities between in less demand, command $6 00 to $6 50 for good, and $5 00 to $6 15 for fair. The inspectors of the week comprising 45 hds. Md. Maryland, 10 hds. Va. Virginia, 10 hds. Kentucky, 1 hds. Pennsylvania, and 14 hds. Virginia, total 553 hds.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA. Judge Henry St. George Tucker, president of the court of appeals, has been elected by the legislature to the chair of law in the university of Virginia. The advocates predict for the appearance general approbation.

The general court of Virginia has decided to admit to hold public office a candidate who is a citizen of the United States, and who is a member of the Virginia university. The bill passed is $25,000.

THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON. Correspondence in relation to the return of the Mediterranean squadron to the United States.

Very department, June 16, 1841.

The secretary of the navy, to whom has been referred the resolution of the senate of the 12th inst. requiring the president of the United States to cause to be communicated to that body, "if not incompatible with the public interest, the correspondence of the minister of the United States in the Mediterranean squadron, in consequence of which the squadron left that station, and the despatches of captain Bolton to the secretary of the navy connected with that movement," has the honor to report to the president the accompanying papers embracing the correspondence and despatches called for. Respectfully submitted,

GEO. E. BADGER.
To the president of the United States.

U. S. frigate Bronxine,
Off Long Island, May 9, 1841.

Sir: I have concluded to the rev. Mr. Stewart the delivery of my despatches, to the department, which will inform it of the circumstances that induced me to quit the Mediterranean to return to the United States.

The ship has arrived in condition for any purpose the government may designate, and I shall feel most happy to meet its wishes. The officers and crew are of first rate character; have acted in great union; their discipline and practice perfect, and I therefore trust that no necessity may exist of separating one from the other.

On any point on which you may need information further than what the accompanying documents afford, I refer you to Mr. Stewart, who has been in close association with me since I left home; and, ignorant of any present circumstances which may at once determine the department in the future employment of this ship, I would venture without delay to express, through him, my own views and wishes in the case.

I have instructed this gentleman to await the pleasure of the department; as soon as that is understood, he is to return to me. If your duties admit of it, I would be gratified to receive a visit from you.

My intention is to keep every body by the ship until I hear from you.

In coming home, I forgo the attractions of the Mediterranean, and place at your disposal an effective ship, so far as she can be rendered such by my aid, which you will, I trust, be very anxious to honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. C. BOLTON, captain.
To the hon. secretary of the navy, Washington.

Minutes of proceedings of a council composed of the commanders of vessels of the Mediterranean squadron, under the command of Com. Isaac Hull.

On the 24th day of March, A. D. 1841, Commodore Hull issued his orders, calling a meeting on board the United States ship Ohio, in the harbor of Mahon, island of Minorca, at 11 o'clock, A. M. of the same day, of the following officers, viz: captain Willard Compton Bolton, commanding the U. S. frigate Bronxine, captain Elis A. T. Lavallette, commanding the U. S. ship Ohio, and commander Ralph Voorhes, commanding the U. S. sloop-of-war Preble.

The officers named assembled in the poop-deck cabin of the United States ship Ohio, in the presence of Com. Isaac Hull, on the day and at the time required.

Com. Hull briefly stated the objects of the meeting; and to more fully elucidate it, directed his secretary to read the following, viz:

GENTLEMEN: Com. Hull desires to say, he has called you together for the purpose of placing before you a letter he has received from the minister of the United States at the court of Great Britain, enclosing publications taken from the newspapers in relation to the existing difficulties which exist between the United States and Great Britain; that he is without instructions from the government in relation to those difficulties; and, under the circumstances of the case, he deems it necessary that some preparatory movement should take place in the squadron under his command.

Commodore Hull, therefore, desires to hear your views in relation to that measure, or to state as his own the following, viz: There are three positions which the squadron can select from; 1st, to proceed to Toulon, where the earliest information could be received, and where perhaps instructions from the government of the U. S. States would probably reach him earlier than at any other point; 2d, to proceed out of the Mediterranean to some point where he could have the result of the existing difficulties; and 3d, to put the squadron in motion to return to the U. S. States. The last, however, without more definite information or instruction from the naval department, Com. Hull is not much in favor of. Com. Hull desires to hear your sentiments on those propositions, and will also be glad to hear any others that may strike you as better adapted to the present doubtful and uncertain position in which he is left.

After this, the said secretary to commodore Hull was directed to read the letter aforesaid appended from his excellency A. Stevenson, United States envoy, dated "London, March 8th, 1841," and from John Hare Powell, esq. dated London, "March 11th, 1841," when the following views and sentiments were expressed by captain Wm. Compton Bolton. That he had reflected upon this subject, and was at first impressed with the belief that the squadron should at once proceed to Toulon, but that, on further consideration, he was convinced that the proper and only available course to pursue was to leave the Mediterranean, and to proceed outside, where information of events, and the actual state of affairs could be learned, by or from vessels traversing between the U. States and Great Britain; and if hostilities were to be resumed, the squadron would then be so situated as to be enabled to render efficient aid at sea, or might proceed to the U. States where its services would be available on the coast. In our harbors, the ships might be converted into moving harbor batteries, to be manned by militia or soldiers, and our seamen disposed of on the lakes, or to advantage otherwise. Another very great consideration is, that by taking this course, the policy or plan of our government in confronting the threatening war, and of which we are now entirely ignorant, would be ascertained. And in case of a favorable termination of the existing difficulties the squadron could return to the Mediterranean, and resume its station there.

The views of apt. Bolton were fully assented to by Capt. Ella A. T. Lavallette, and by com. Ralph Voorhees.

And to which com. Hull replied, I am prepared to pursue that course.

It was then suggested by captain Wm. Compton Bolton, that definite action on the movements of the squadron, had better be suspended until it should be ascertained if a French steamer from Toulon, then about entering the port of Mahon, brought latest news than was already at hand, which suggestion was adopted, and the council broke up.

It having been ascertained that the French steamer brought no information to change the views already formed, expressed and assented to by the officers of our fleet named, again met on the same day in Mahon, at half past one o'clock, P. M. when a verbal order was given by com. Isaac Hull, to the following effect, viz: that every preparation should be made to proceed to sea to-morrow, the 25th day of March, A. D. 1841.

The foregoing minutes contain the views expressed, in assemblage of which, we herewith affix our names.

Done in Mahon, island of Minorca, the 24th day of March, 1841.

London, March 8, 1841.
DEAR SIR: Although I am ignorant of your plans, and take it for granted you bear regular correspondence with our government, I yet deem it proper to write and apprise you of the excitement which prevails here and the fears which many entertain that we may be forced into war with Great Britain. Although, in my opinion, such will not be the immediate result, to say the least means improbable that this may be the case. The affair of the Caroline steamer, destroyed at Schlosser in 1837, and the imprisonment of McLeod, together with the boundary question, are the immediate causes of the excitement which now prevails in both countries. The arrival of the "United States" packet a few days ago, and the West Chester last night, bring accounts of the 16th of February. I send you the Times of this morning, containing the report of the committee on foreign relations, in the house of representatives, with a short summary of the proceedings on communication or papers from Washington. I hasten to apprise you of the present state of things, to enable you to decide what steps it may be proper to take with our squadron in the Mediterranean.—Would it not be the most judicious course to get nearer home, and within reach of orders from the department? Unless you have strong reasons for remaining, and of which I know nothing, I should think it the safest and most prudent course to return. I beg, however, that you will judge for yourself, for really it is a matter of which I know very little. I shall be glad to hear from you, as soon as you have decided what you mean to do. In haste, believe me, dear sir, your obedient servant,
A. A. STENSON.

Com. Isaac Hull, care of Frick, Brothers & Co. Marseille.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

London, March 11, 1841.
When war is threatened, the hero of the constitution is present to the mind of every American. I refer you, my dear sir, to the authors from the ministerial and opposition journals, the Chronicle and Times. My opportunities certainly are not small, as I am in daily converse with members of both houses of parliament, and I regret to find that in private as well as in debate, the most decided tone of hostility prevails through all parties. The Times have declared in the speeches of Lord Stanley and Sir Robert Peel, of Sir Henry Harding, of Mr. Smith O'Brien, their fixed determination to defend the position taken by the cabinet in relation to the demand in regard to McLeod. Lord Palmerston stated, in the house of commons, on the 8th February, that the Titipatum had been sent that night to Mr. Fox. Lord Melbourne stated in the house of lords on the same evening that measures had been taken to uphold the honor and dignity of the nation, and to "reconcile" McLeod. These remarks produced in both houses and from all sides loud and continued cheering.

Mr. S. and all men agreed as to the meaning of the term "sacrifice," when applied to a man in prison and in a foreign country. Notice the preparations for defence, the violent and warlike tone of the committee of foreign relations, the reports and resolutions in the legislature of Maine, the paragraphs of the ministerial journal, the Chronicle, stating that warships are employed by night and by day to force into readiness the steam frigates for the American coast. Read the report that ten sail of the line are ordered to assemble at Gibraltar in consequence of the trial of McLeod.

I am aware that an American minister wrote to you two days since; but in his absence from London for the day, I venture, with the approval of Mr. Rush the secretary of legation, to communicate the news just arrived. Mr. Rush's brother, of which I saw many of the facts in this important question.

You will pardon an American whose intrusion proceeds from a desire that Hull shall be prepared for his enemy, to add lustre to his name and glory to his country. I am, my dear sir, most truly yours,

JOHN HARE POWELL.
I open my letter to say Mr. Rush has heard this letter, and entirely approves it.

Orders of March 25, 1841.

U. S. ship Ohio, port Mahon, March 25, 1841.
The communications render necessary 25, 1841, rather a hasty movement in the squadron under my command.

I have, therefore, to direct that you proceed to sea, and make the best of your way out of the Mediterranean. You will understand, either by speaking or by touching at some port, to ascertain the state of affairs between the United States and Great Britain. In case of war you will use every exertion to protect yourself and command, and to annoy the enemy, cruising as long as your provisions are well restored, you will return to the Mediterranean, touching at Mahon, where you will probably hear from me. Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant.

ISAAC HULL, commander-in-chief of the U. S. naval force in the Mediterranean.
Captain Wm. C. Bolton, commanding U. S. frigate Brandywine, port Mahon.

Memorandum.

U. S. frigate Brandywine, at sea, April 10, 1841.
The squadron sailed from Mahon on the 25th of March. It was favored by a strong wind, and we were at sea for nine days, contending for the greater part of the time, with adverse winds, or delayed by calms, from getting out of the Mediterranean, which was a great object, I determined to make the best of my way and shift for myself, although the commander implied a wish, verbally, that I would accompany him past the rock of Gibraltar.

At the time of our departure, it was believed that the ships would prove quick sailers—that we should be favored by winds—have a good run, and so easily therefore, accommodate each other. The reverse turned out the case; our ship surpassed the Ohio in an astonishing manner; and I am confident a loss of at least sixty miles ensued to us from this inequality of sailing, and my manner of sailing to keep me him; which loss might have placed me, equally with himself, in the power of the heavy force reported as being on its way to capture or blockade us. Such support as I could give the Ohio would avail, comparatively, but I was determined to keep me, and sure way to avoid annoyance to either, and to give chance for distinction, security or escape to both, was to separate. If war exists with such a power as Great Britain, it cannot be the policy of our government to cruise in squadron on the ocean.

The views exchanged between commodore Hull and his captain, at Mahon, could not have undergone any material change, else he would have communicated it by signal, or by a boat, which on one occasion I sent to him at sea. It was apparent to me, that he could proceed to the Mediterranean, from the vessels present in the Mediterranean, to be relied on, because it could only be derived through interested channels—such as British steamers, or sources of doubtful authority—or of a date so recent as that which came to our knowledge from the coast of Spain, and which was interesting, and by my proceeding I could more readily meet it, and, possibly, convey intelligence of it to the commodore.

The "Pebble" separated from us both, under what circumstances I know not. My separation from the ship was first caused by bad weather at night. Whether the "Ohio" or the "Graciosa" was in fault, I cannot say.

I met a detention of three days from strong head winds, in sight of the rock of Gibraltar, which afforded time for the commodore to have reached that point. He not doing so, I availed myself of a fine opportunity of passing through; and, persuaded that there was no American interest behind me to protect, I, on mature deliberation, determined, under my orders, to lay my course direct to the only point at which any satisfactory and conclusive intelligence—such as could be depended on—could be speedily gained; knowing that it was within my ability to make the passage to the United States and back again, I determined to do so. I was, by me, also, being informed of the true state of the existing relations between the two countries. Respectfully submitted, W. C. BOLTON, capt.

To the hon. secretary of the navy, Washington.

Commodore of the U. S. Gibraltar, April 7, 1841.

MY DEAR SIR: Understanding the cause that induced you to come this way from Port Mahon, the quarantine department permitting me to communicate with you, I not only send by the bearer of this mail for your squadron, but with pleasure inform you that the steam packet this morning from England brings intelligence of the pacific dispositions of the two governments. President Harrison was formally installed on the 4th ult. his speech bearing eminently on foreign relations. On the 5th ult. Mr. Buchanan, the committee on foreign relations was discharged from considering the resolution requesting the president to communicate the correspondence with Great Britain on the northeastern boundary. That the peace treaty in its progress may every day be hastening to a consummation, I am very anxious to hear. Mr. Forsyth that Great Britain had a sincere desire to bring things to a termination; and Mr. Clay said himself that he had not been appointed to a special [mission] to England; he thought the relations of the two countries would be settled by necessary mutual difficulty, and without delay.

McLeod was in prison at Lockport, would be removed to Albany for trial; to facilitate his delivery, the British government had justified the burning of the Caroline; hence he would be great up to the owners of the steamer would continue their proceedings to recover the value of the steamer. All this was received in England by New York packet ship "Patrick Henry," dated the 8th ult.

On the 7th ult. I received from the legation of the United States, London, a despatch for your good self, to be forwarded at the earliest moment, by such mode of conveyance as would answer the certainty of its reaching you. A steamer starting the same day for Barcelona, I was enabled to use the conveyance for that port, with directions for want of opportunity to send it to Port Mahon, to send it forward to Marseilles, in the care of the naval contractors. At the same time addressed a letter to those agents directing them, in case of their receiving this letter, and of your leaving the Mediterranean, to return it to me.

Allow me to add, and express the hope that the pacific news from England will remove any objection you might feel to visit this port, being now so immediately in the neighborhood. I am, my dear sir, your friend and humble serv't.

HORATIO SPRAGUE, consul.
Com. Isaac Hull, commanding U. S. squadron in the Mediterranean.

On the 25th ult. endorsed by captain Bolton: "Received at sea, near Gibraltar, on the afternoon of the 8th of April; opened by me in presence of lieut. Mercer and chaplain Stewart, in consequence of the superscription of the envelope, thus: 'United States to the Commodore of the Gibraltar Squadron.'"

"To commodore Isaac Hull, or to any of the commanders of the United States ships of war in the Mediterranean."
W. C. BOLTON.
Witness: Samuel Mercer, Charles S. Stewart.

Reply to the foregoing.

U. S. ship Brandywine, off Gibraltar, April 8, 1841.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your communication of yesterday's date, addressed to "com. Hall or the commanders of any of the U. S. ships of war in the Mediterranean." I am in possession of the principal intelligence communicated, but I am not thus obliged for the attention of transmitting it. What I have received from you will not influence my movements. I am on a cruise, and shall not visit Gibraltar. Very sincerely, your friend,

W. C. BOLTON.

UNITED STATES EXPENDITURES.

To the editors of the National Register:

Perhaps it would be pleasing to the American people to place before them, through your columns, a comparative view of the expenditures of the different presidents, with the average amount yearly expended. Also, a recapitulation, showing how much each president expended above the other, from 1791 to 1841, fifty years.

NAME.	Term.	Whole amount expended by each president.	Average amt expended per year.
Washington,	6	$51,993,656	$8,665,943
Adams,	4	40,306,814	10,076,703
Jefferson,	8	16,257,899	2,032,237
Madison,	8	228,113,893	28,514,236
Monroe,	8	203,729,603	25,467,450
Adams,	4	93,905,467	23,476,367
Jackson,	8	229,126,184	28,640,773
Van Buren,	4	135,229,440	33,807,360

Recapitulation.

Adams	$1,412,643 more than Washington.
Jefferson	3,210,213 more than Adams.
Madison	15,227,337 more than Jefferson.
Monroe	2,798,033 less than Madison.
Adams	1,764,536 less than Monroe.
Jackson	4,689,406 more than Adams.
Van Buren	5,244,857 more than Jackson.

All which is respectfully submitted.

DECISION OF THE McLEOD CASE, BY THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK. On the 12th instant the supreme court, at Utica, decided against McLeod's application to be discharged from custody, and remanded him to prison for trial in the ordinary forms of law. The judges were unanimous in the opinion against his discharge. The opinion, which occupies several columns, reaches us too late for insertion in this number. We will give it a place in our next. Meantime, it will be gratifying to public curiosity to sum up in a few words, the grounds taken by the court. They decide:

That the points raised by the prisoner, first, that he did not participate to the alleged offence, and second, that, if present, he was acting in defence of his country from a treasonable insurrection, cannot be made available in a habeas corpus, even for letting him to bail, much less for ordering his unqualified discharge.

That on habeas corpus, the examination as to guilt or innocence cannot, in any case, be extended beyond the depositions or proof by which the prisoner is committed.

These the court consider sufficient answers to the application—nevertheless as the counsel have raised the question of jurisdiction, the court considers it, and decide:

That the plea that this is a national question, to be settled by the diplomatic powers of the United States and England, does not divest the court of jurisdiction, because to warrant the destruction of property or the taking of life, on the ground of public war, there must be what is called lawful war, by the law of nations, which can never exist without a concurrence of the war-making power.

That if the affair in question can be tortured into war between this nation and England, the United States might take possession of McLeod as a prisoner of war.

That the order, under which McLeod and his associates acted was not a lawful act of majesty, as contended for by Mr. Fox, since the transaction was then lawful factum and required no royal recognition, which is not pretended to be placed on it.

That the fitting out of the expedition under captain Drew, was an unwarrantable usurpation of authority on the part of the provincial authorities.

"This brings us to the great question in the case. We have seen that a capital offence was committed within their territory in time of peace, and the remaining inquiry is whether England can place the offenders above the law and beyond our jurisdiction, by ratifying and approving such a crime. It is due to her, in the first place, to deny that it has been so ratified and approved. She has approved a public act of legitimate defence only. She cannot change the nature of things. She cannot turn that into a lawful war which was murder in time of peace.—She may, in that way, justify the offender as between him and his own government. She cannot bind foreign courts of justice by insisting that what is the case in this whole world was a just crime and prepared attack, must be protected by the law of self defence.

"To the second place, I deny that she can, in time of peace, send her men into our territory, and render them impious to our laws by embodying them and putting arms in their hands. She may declare war if she claim the benefit of peace, as both nations have done in this instance, the moment any of her citizens enter our territory, they are as completely obnoxious to punishment by our law, as if they had been born and always resided in this country."

The concluding paragraphs are as follows:

"When a grand jury have charged that a man has committed murder in this state, I can imagine no case whether the charge relate to the time of open public war or peace, in which he can claim exemption from trial. If he show that he was in truth acting as a soldier in time of public war, the jury will acquit him. The judge will direct them to obey the law of nations, which is undoubtedly a part of the common law. So if the accused were acting in defence against an individual invader of his country. But above all things it is important in the latter case for the jury to inquire whether his allegation of defence be not false or colorable.

They cannot allow as an act of defence, the wilful pursuing even such an enemy, though dictated by sovereign authority, into a country at peace with the sovereign of the accused, seeking out that enemy and taking his life. Such indeed can be nothing but an act of vengeance. It can be nothing but a violation of territory, a violation of the municipal law, the faith of treaties, and the law of nations.

The government of the accused may approve, diplomacy may glaze, but a jury can only inquire whether he was a party to the deed, or to any act of illegal violence which he knew would probably ensue. If ratified by the law, it is no defence. If he sincerely hope they may be, upon the evidence in the case before us, they will then have the pleasant duty to perform of pronouncing him not guilty. But whatever may be their conclusion, we feel the utmost confidence, that the prisoner, though a foreigner, will have no just cause to complain that he has suffered wrong at the hands of an American jury.

At our hands the prisoner had a right to require an answer upon the facts presented in his papers, whether in law he can properly be held to a trial. We have had no declaration but to examine and pronounce upon the legal character of those facts in order to satisfy ourselves of the bearing they might have on the novel and important question submitted. That examination has led to the conclusion that we have no power to discharge the prisoner.

He must, therefore, be remanded, to take his trial in the ordinary forms of law."

Accounts from Utica further state, that it is probable McLeod's counsel will sue out a writ of error, and have the case carried to the court for the next session of errors, which meets next month, and if the decision of the supreme court is there affirmed, an appeal will be taken to the supreme court of the U. States.

FREE TRADE—CORN LAWS—TARIFF.

As preliminary to the consideration of the tariff question, the house of representatives have appointed a committee to take evidence in the principal ports of entry in the United States, as to the operation of the existing rates of duties on imports, upon the commercial, agricultural and manufacturing interest of the country.

We have never yet been seriously alarmed by the apprehension of a war being provoked between two countries whose people have so many interests in maintaining peace with each other, so much to lose by contention with each other, and whose respective governments are so decidedly under the influence of a wholesome public opinion as the governments of both England and America now are. Public opinion, which now in the real sovereign power in both countries would never consent that a war should be provoked by a paltry dispute respecting the prosecution of an individual like McLeod, or by an abstract question relative to the laws of nations as applicable to a frontier broil or originally unauthorized aggression of a marauding party, such as burning the Caroline, nor yet by the far more serious dispute relative to an undefined boundary line over an unsettled territory. We say that although we have never yet seriously apprehended a war as likely to grow out of any or all of those causes, in this era of higher christian feelings, yet that a conflict of another character between Great Britain and America, is to be apprehended, or averted, we do verily believe, and for that reason it is time that the people of this country were preparing their armor, for they have to meet in the field to which we allude the most powerful and wary adversary that ever attempted to monopolize the world. We allude to a contest for trade and commerce.

The British statement it appears here have been awake to the approach of the period when the task of revising our Tariff would be, by the termination of our "compromise" enactments, imposed upon the American congress—and they have either arfully or thoughtfully—as the case may prove, attempted to anticipate our true national policy under the existing regulations, by making either a road or a joint movement towards a more equitable arrangement of trade. It becomes us to be fully prepared for either contingency.

If the movement proposed by the party now in power in England, and who have certainly staked their hopes of retaining that power upon the issue of a change in the policy of the country in relation to the admission of broad stuffs—timber &c., free of the exactions now imposed under our coro laws, if that party shall be sustained at the approaching elections for parliament, which is itself a doubtful prospect, having as they have the whole landed interest of the nation, added to the Tory influence to oppose them, if they succeed over both, and then in good faith will set themselves about re-modeling their tariff according to their recent professions in favor of "free trade," we are for meeting them more than half way, and joining hand in hand, in the enlightened career towards ameliorating the condition of both hemispheres, a result that we have full faith would follow a liberal policy. We are advocates of free trade with all the world, and with every country, that will afford us fair and equitable reciprocity. But if other countries will restrict our trade with them, and subject us to onerous regulations or exactions for the benefit of their communities, we have no idea of submitting to all the disadvantages to which such regulations subject us, without attempting some countervailing measures. The real cause of four fifths of the difficulties under which the agriculturists and manufacturers of this country have had to labor for the last twelve years, have been owing to a want of due regard to maintaining an equipoise between importations and exportations, allowing ourselves to have from ten to twenty millions annually drained from us either in specie or in obligations of indebtedness in one form or other upon which we are compelled to pay interest, to make up the difference that has invariably been against us. The predicament of him who spends more than he makes, is inevitable as long as this policy is admitted, and all attempts at remedying the evil by fiscal contrivances, short of eradicating the root of the evil, will be unavailing.

Upon the subject to which we refer, we have received the report of the select committee of THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, which contains suggestions that ought to be examined by the people of this country. After referring to the examinations which have been officially made in relation to the import duties, by the British government the committee say:—

"The truth of the abstract proposition of free trade,—its advantages in promoting the interests of mankind, irrespective of circumstances resulting from the evils which attach to humanity—such as war, and the prevalence of the selfish principles which actuate nations as well as individuals—was long since demonstrated by that profound philosopher, Dr Franklin. "Suppose," says he, "a country, X., with three manufactures, as cloth, silk and iron, supplying three other countries, A., B., C., but is desirous of increasing the vent and raising the price of cloth in favour of its own clothiers.—In order to do this she forbids the importation of foreign cloths from A., in return, forbids silk from X.; then the silk workers complain of a decay of trade, and X. to content them, forbids silk from B. In return forbids iron-ware from X.; then the iron workers complain of decay, and X. forbids the importation of iron from C., and C., in return, forbids cloth from X. What is got by three prohibitions. Answer—all four find their common stock of the conveniences and enjoyments of life diminished."

"This is a plain exemplification of the case, without regard to the circumstances of war, &c. referred to above; and if the world would adopt the system of free trade, and constantly act upon it, the result might be universally beneficial. Unfortunately, hitherto mankind have been subjected to the misfortune of war, and it is not assumed by the advocates of the free system, that war is not a contingency for which it is prudent and wise to prepare.

"In such an event an agricultural people, depending upon other nations for their cloth, iron, &c., might find themselves in a deplorable predicament. Was one country in possession of advantages which its rival could never obtain whilst free trade was permitted, as skill or capital, or should any one of the community of nations refuse to be governed by the rules of free trade, it would obviously be for the interest of the others, by countervailing action, to prevent, as far as practicable, the evils which might result to them from their position. While England and France, the leading commercial nations of Europe, continue as they now do, to act upon the restrictive principle, no argument drawn from the abstract proposition, merely, can be of the least force in determining the course of other nations.

"The great business of society is the production of those commodities which minister to the wants and pleasures of man. To this end the energies of the millions are applied in different climates to the various soils, and the multiplied products of the soil, by other millions, are, with the aid of invention, art and science, fabricated and fashioned to answer the necessities and luxuries of society. The supply of food, clothing and habitations, suited to the diversified tastes, fashions, habits and wants that prevail among mankind, are leading objects with us all.—No one country possesses all these supplies. One country, viz. A., produces a surplus of one kind of articles, while her soil and her habits forbid her from producing others. Another country, B., produces more of the articles in which A. is deficient than her wants require, but is herself deficient in the articles of which A. has a surplus. The exchange of these surpluses, for the mutual accommodation of each, is what is called commerce. If one refuses to exchange with the other, it is clear that commerce, as respects those countries, must cease. It is also obvious that these exchanges must be reciprocal; the one party must be willing to receive such commodities as the other can part with, in order to induce an exchange. While the exchanges are confined to their elements, or rather, such will necessarily be the result, and none but a reciprocal commerce can exist. The exchanges of the world continued to be in a great degree of this character during the simpler ages, and whilst the only money in use was the precious metals; these being the products of an industry, which could only be gradually increased, their value, measured by the other products of industry, could also be increased or diminished by a very gradual process only, and then demand and supply would remain steady and uniform, except so far as their value might be influenced through fear or other circumstances, inducing a disposition to hoard; a passion coeval with man, and operating with greater force to an ignorant age. The modern invention of a currency of credit, based on the precious metals now in use, to a greater or less extent, over the whole commercial world, though of immense benefit, has yet this disadvantage, that it has heretofore been subject to sudden fluctuations. The commercial exchanges of the world not being arranged on the principles of reciprocity, the people using the larger proportion of credit are exposed to the destruction of their currency and the consequent derangement of all their affairs, unless by carefully guarding the home market, it is protected from the aggression of others, who, by abstracting metal in credit, by removing its basis whenever advantage or misfortune renders metal an object of desire.—The question of protection is therefore not only one of national defence, but emphatically a question of finance and currency, and should be so considered, if we would properly understand it and appreciate its importance.

"This view of the subject has led to the opinion so strenuously advocated by many distinguished men, that our true policy is abandonment of our currency of credit, and a return to that of metal.—Suppose it is admitted that ultimately, the contemplated result would follow the adoption of their plan; the wide spread ruin that would ensue from this attempt, can hardly be conceived. Nothing less than the entire prostration of the active portion of the present generation to a condition of hopeless bankruptcy, and a transfer of all their accumulations to the coffers of the capitalist, and a suspension of industry, involving a loss greater than the entire amount of the currency, both metallic and paper—and all this to gain what simply a reciprocal commerce, which may be more perfectly obtained by exchange for commodities, overthrows the currency duties on imports, which shall secure to our own industry such advantages in the home market, as will protect our currency from the destructive influence of foreign exchange.

"A system of countervailing duties is therefore our only hope, whilst European policy continues as it is at present. Let this be distinctly understood, not for the protection of the manufacturers, but for the protection of the currency of the nation; and necessary for each section, north, south, east and west, precisely in the proportion in which their various currencies are more or less constituted of credit."

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

The two following articles have been in type waiting for room in the Register, for nearly a month, postponed by matter of more immediate interest.

MOVEMENTS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.—We find in the Charleston Courier a detailed account of the proceedings of the great meeting of the friends of the national administration, which was lately held in that city. The hon. Thomas Lowndes was called to preside. A committee of thirty-two persons was appointed, of which James L.

Petigru, esq. was chairman, to draft resolutions expressive of the opinions of the meeting, on the great subject which had brought them together.

The resolutions reported by the committee were as follows:

1. Therefore, resolved, That a revenue tariff is a mode of providing for the national defence, not only consistent with the uniform practice of the country, but entitled to a decided preference over any other scheme of taxation, inasmuch as it regards the compromise of 1823 as the bond of peace and surest pledge of equal justice to the various and conflicting interests of our extended federal republic.

2. That the question of the constitutionality of a U. S. bank has been settled by reason of authority, and by experience of its indispensable utility.

3. That no other remedy has been found for the multiplied and increasing difficulties of a heterogeneous currency, and that the time and place for the establishment of such a bank, are subjects which call for the mature and deliberate consideration of congress.

4. That the hon. William C. Preston has well and faithfully served the state as a member of the senate of the United States, and by his uniform error of his course, has proved himself superior to the blandishments of power and the terror of proscription. That while we admire his eloquence, we still more highly appreciate his firmness and consistency as a statesman, and heartily unite in exalting him to the confidence of his country.

5. Resolved, That the right of instruction and the requisition to obey or resign; never assumed by the state of South Carolina, cannot surely belong to neighborhood associations or district meetings; that we trust in the firmness and sound judgment of our extensive senate, steadily to resist and repudiate any such usurpation of authority. And that we heartily approve of the course he has pursued in regard to this matter, and the expression of sentiment conveyed in his reply to the demands made upon him by a sectional, congressional caucus, of his political opponents. That the political independence of the representative is not only a privilege, but a sacred duty, an element of our institutions absolutely essential to the well being of a republican constitution, and that Colonel Preston is entitled to our cordial sympathy, and our prompt and unflinching support in the manly stand he has taken in its defence.

6. Resolved, That the public lands, ceded to the confederacy by Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, South Carolina and Connecticut, were ceded, in the words of the Virginia deeds of cession, on the condition that they "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said state of Virginia included, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

7. Resolved, That the scheme of surrendering these lands, thus made the common property of all the states of the union, to the few states in which they lie, is wild, visionary and wasteful, and in direct violation of the contract by which they were generously entrusted to the confederacy. That this scheme bringing a mass of neighboring contiguous states, under a common indebtedness to the general government, holds out such an enormous bribe of ambition and avarice, as could not fail to breed corruption and violence, and arouse the passions in distrust and hostility to the authority of the union, terminating in a conflict which would have one certain result—the total loss to the country of its splendid national domain.

Mr. Petigru then addressed the meeting in reference to the principles set forth in the resolutions, and at the close of his remarks they were unanimously adopted. The Courier has the following sketch of the remarks of Mr. Senator Preston and the gentlemen who followed him.

Senator Preston then called for, and received by the meeting with an applause and enthusiasm that sprang from the hearts of the audience. It is impossible to give more than a barren sketch of his speech, rich and glowing as it was in imagery, and fervid at times in indignant eloquence. He stated and his heart-felt thanks for the notice he had received to the resolutions, and the manner in which they had been received by the meeting. Peculiarly touching and near to his heart was this notice, this reception in Charleston; for he could not forget the very different expressions of opinion had found utterance. To these he had opposed patient endurance; he bowed to the rod, and appealed to future more calm considerations. Now, his heart was full of a proud joy, when he looked upon the scene. He had never believed the time would come when just credit would be given the shows for their performance of their perilous duty. That time had come. The battle had been fought, bravely, earnestly, desperately fought—the victory had been achieved. Never in the history of man had there been so sublime a spectacle as when the people rose to their might and majesty against the late administration. The whole country was erected into one vast tribunal, and the so-called democracy arrayed before it. The people of these United States impelled themselves as a jury—counsel were heard—ay, paid counsel on one side, and volunteer counsel on the other. The cause of the administration was tried, fairly tried—the verdict was rendered, and the guilty men were placed before. They are dead—fallen—crumbled in the dust.

Colonel Preston then proceeded to show how silently, calmly and beautifully amid all this tremendous change—the downfall of an organized and warring party—this passing out of old rulers and in-coming of new—continued the stately march of our glorious institutions, and how great a proof was this of their power and their purity. To strengthen this view, he adverted to the death of Harrison—stricken in the moment almost of his triumph—from the loftiest pinnacle of earthly greatness—the head of a nation removed from his great post—and yet, no jar, no stop, no delay to the progress and working of government. The president died, and his successor under the constitution takes his place, so all so quickly and easily; how powerful and well balanced must be that frame of government, which such events cannot cause for an instant to waver!

And to southern men, what a solace under this loss of the first choice of the people, John Tyler, of Virginia, fills the vacant place. He is dear to the south in every view. Entirely southern—yet not sectional, a state rights man, yet general Callicott, American in all points. And God forbid that sectional feelings should ever profane the presidential chair! For myself, exclaimed the orator, I would as soon have a "southern man with southern principles," as a southern man with exclusive southern spirit. First—my devotion is due to this state—then to the union. An American, as a senator of this Union, all that is American is mine.

But this succession of John Tyler to the presidency, continued Mr. Preston, will forever quell, abash and silence that cry of fraud and folly, which for so many months of the past year has been raised against Harrison and his supporters. Where is the man so bold in falsehood, so dare call John Tyler abolitionist! Since, then, no objection can be made to the present becalm of the administration, let us give him a fair trial, and who objects to Harrison may rally around Tyler. For though he will carry out the same principles that guided his predecessor, yet he comes, in as it were, a regency—he is not so imbedded in the glowing bias of the people as his predecessor, and will therefore demand the more earnest support from those who approve him. This will be an administration more southern in its tendencies. Both would steer by the same polar star, but with Tyler there might be some variation southward in the instrument.

The "great democratic party has vanished"—tis with the snow of the last year upon the mountains—melting away, day by day, each little rill winding down the side of the mountain, and emptying into the rushing stream of the whig party." It had no leaders, and no rank and file, not even a skeleton army. Yet in this very greatness of our party is danger; so much as to be done, so much expected, that the people have no time to spare, and the selfishness which have been left upon the ship of state.

Mr. Preston then took up in detail the propositions in the resolutions, and said that the subject of the public lands was one demanding the most earnest and thoughtful consideration. The idea of cession of the public domain to a portion of the states, was, as it had been expressed by some of its supporters, but a purchase of those states by wholesale. What would be the result of the various proposals on foot, we imported, we were to make, that no sacrifice of just rights should be made with his consent. He alluded to the attempt in the great tariff agitation, to crush Mr. Clay under the weight of this important question, to bury him under the public domain, but how true it proved to be, as he struggled through the weighty load and made of it a battery and fortification whence he has stormed the heart of the country.

The orator then presented, with withering ridicule, the spectacle of the states, each with its individual and federal credit toasting to and fro in billows of danger and dismay—and the little Magician waving his sub-treasury wand over the boisterous waters, that heeded not the charm, till the people impatient of the quackery hurried him from the seat.

On the subject of the national bank, Mr. Preston said that he had never been adverse to the bank, although he had not needed the admirable indications of Calhoun and McDuffie to show him that as a financial medium it worked beautifully. Yet he decried it as an engine which might work great mischief. But he relied on that clause of the constitution, that residuary bequest, of all powers necessary to carry into effect the functions and duties expressly assigned. If then, he found that the state of the country now struggling in agony and calling for aid, required a bank, however reluctantly, he should do, as Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, &c. had done—the whole republican party of the day, and vote for the measure because necessary. He was no believer in the doctrines that government could use any other currency, but that which was in use by the people. If the people use paper, the government must. Were we to exchange our situation and our prospects, dark as they seemed, for that beau ideal of hard money, that paradise of gold and silver, the island of Cuba, with negroes foot to one, and bloodhounds in equal proportion! Contrast this hard money colony, of 300 years growth, with Mississippi and Alabama, with all the evils of their currency, and choose.

Mr. Preston then disposed of the tariff question, by saying that he and his party would rigidly adhere to the compromise, and if any discrimination was made against our exports, or on luxuries, he would say wit and humor to the proposed tax on French silks and wines, which had excited the righteous indignation and apprehension of the good people of St. John's, Colleton, and closed with an eloquent and forcible appeal to all good citizens to lay aside all minor considerations, and unite earnestly in aiding to re-establish the true interests of the country.

Mr. Preston having concluded, the hon. H. S. Legare was called for, and, on coming forward, he received with an enthusiasm and spirit which showed how justly proud Charleston is of her eloquent and gifted son.

His address was of a nature so rich and so varied, so startling in its sudden changes, from a persuasive conversation and bold clear statement, to the loftiest flights of true eloquence, that his audience were completely taken by surprise, now chained in a rapt attention—now startled by a burst of indignant sarcasm, and then again by a flash of wit and humor. In position, but as he went on the orator forgot the man, and the wealth of his mind was never more suddenly drawn upon nor more triumphantly displayed. He spoke of the strange and sudden changes which have taken place in our history, and the character—and of the character which political opposition had assumed. Once, said he, in South Carolina, political rivalry was the noble contest of gentlemen and cavaliers—a hostility that hindered not an opponent from admitting and doing honor to the character of a rival. But now to judge from specimens lately displayed, these controversies are to be carried on in the spirit of savages and the language of fishermen.

To this spirit, let it be said, upon the death of its object, be its rebuke. While living general Harrison was the object of their most unenvied obloquy. How great a change was wrought by his death. Those who most vilified him living, do him honor in his new made grave. The shafts which were hurled at him while in life, fall harmless and spent from his shield.

Mr. Legare in his speech, introducing a resolution in favor of increasing our naval defenses, which he advocated with great force and energy, setting forth the importance of having at any time ready a fleet, and criticizing with the most acute severity the report of the committee on foreign relations, relative to the affair of the Carolina. He then in a burst of eloquence, demanded of the people of this state if now they were prepared to cut their throats, and whether they could strike of the hand that had but now so gallantly for them, because he had chosen to exercise his own judgment, and not submit to tyrannical party domination. His crime, said the orator, was his eminence, his usefulness, his honorable and wide spread fame.

Mr. Legare then closed his speech, and the resolution was put and carried.

The honorable R. H. Wilde, of Georgia, was called for, and in a brief but spirited address expressed the views of the honor done him by the meeting, almost strangers to him, and set forth his own views, in hearty concurrence with the resolutions offered.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE DEMOCRATIC STATES' RIGHTS PARTY.

The democratic states' rights party held a meeting in Charleston on the 27th ult. which the Mercury says was one of the largest and most brilliant popular assemblages ever held in that city.

The venerable H. Deas was called to the chair, and the hon. J. F. Mintzing, John Kerr Boyce, Nathaniel Heyward, esq. Dr. J. M. Campbell, col. J. S. Ashe, John Magnaghi, esq. Wm. Aiken, esq. and H. W. Conner, esq. were named as vice presidents; Wm. D. Porter, R. W. Gordon and J. H. Dukes, esq. were appointed secretaries.

A committee of three gentlemen, A. G. Magrath, M. I. Keith and H. Bailey, esq. waited upon the honorable John C. Calhoun, and requested his attendance at the meeting. He having accepted the invitation, and attended, his arrival was greeted with the greatest enthusiasm. When the applause had somewhat subsided, col. Elmore, from a committee of forty-two, appointed for the purpose, reported the following address and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

The call of an extra session of congress by those whose hands the affairs of the republic have fallen, and the measures which it is well understood are to be proposed for the adoption of that body, have caused us to assemble, that the opinions and wishes of the people shall be made known. These measures are such as must exercise a most important influence on the constitution of our Union, for good or for evil; and we should be wanting in our duty to our state, to ourselves and to our posterity, if we failed to proclaim, in the most solemn manner, our opinions upon them. We do so now since the formation of this meeting have so many and so grave subjects of public policy before us, and the session of the government. Hereafter they have come upon the country singly, or few at a time. They are now crowded into one session; and the deepest anxiety is felt by the people of this state for the result. Some of these questions have been, since the session of the government, so important, so important to agitate and shake the confederacy to its very foundations; and we now go into the arrangement of them collectively with fearful odds against us. Some of these questions have been in more fearful peril; that party, from its adoption, under one name or another, but ever the same in its principles, the advocates of a strong government and the enemy of popular rights and democratic principles, the old federal party of Alexander Hamilton, has again obtained a temporary triumph and seized upon the reins of power. How that power is to be wielded we are left but little room to doubt. Unless their leaders be arrested in their career of mischief, if by them our President is, we hope, for some kind purpose, but still he will be placed in a position to be dominated upon the country a series of measures disastrous to constitutional freedom and fatal to southern prosperity. These measures are: 1st. The distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the states. 2nd. The establishment of a protective tariff. 3d. The creation of a public debt. 4th. The repeal of the act establishing an independent treasury; and 5th the incorporation of a national bank.

Against all of these measures we declare an uncompromising opposition, because we believe they will exercise a fatal influence on the independence of the states, the principles of constitutional liberty and the constitution itself, while they will undermine and finally overthrow the industry, and perhaps the very institutions of the south.

We believe that congress possess no power but such as are expressly granted in the constitution, or are absolutely necessary to carry on those expressly granted; we believe the constitution to be a fundamental and unchanging rule of conduct to all others; and not altered, changed or controlled by circumstances what ever; we believe especially that in this strict construction consist the safety of southern institutions. As we are the weaker portion of the confederacy and becoming relatively more and more so every day, our property will be at the mercy of hostile majorities, which may as fairly construe a power out of the constitution to create a protective tariff, or to abolish slavery, as to establish a bank. We believe that property should be secured with no taxes, whether direct, or in the shape of duties on imports, but what are absolutely necessary for conducting the government with efficiency and economy and that no right exists in congress to make discrimination in laying taxes in order to encourage and protect one pursuit or branch of industry at the expense of others; we believe a national debt to be a national misfortune; and if created without necessity, as a fraudulent pretext for raising the taxes, or a means to provide a capital for a bank, we regard it as a national calamity which should be met by a strict and exacting application on all who support it.

At the head of the measures which it is understood will be pressed upon congress, is the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the states. The amount of these sales amounts to about $8,000,000 annually. At the very time this proposition is made to take out of the public treasury of the constitution, it is needless to say how joyfully South Carolina will stand side by side with him in every battle field, giving him her support, and sharing every danger with him. But should he, unhappily for his own fate, sanction the doctrines of federalism, and give his support to the principles and measures his life has been spent in combating, then he too will meet from us the same uncompromising opposition which we extend to all the enemies of our principles.

But, fellow citizens, our truest hope is in the justice of our cause and that intompatible spirit of freedom which has always enabled South Carolina, come whomever it may to resist and repel, and stand upon her rights. Let us, then, with the memory before us of the glorious examples of the past, raise every energy for this struggle, remembering that victory now will secure freedom FOREVER. Be it therefore

Resolved, That the distribution among the states of revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, is an impolitic, unauthorized and unconstitutional waste of the public money, degrading our sovereign state to dependent pensioners of the federal government, and stimulating thus to an extravagant subversion of all those maxims of economy which are the best securities of a republic; depriving the government of one of its legitimate sources of revenue, to furnish a fraudulent pretext for an increase of tariff, and at the same time, the intention of the states in their cessation of the public lands to the general government.

2. Resolved, That we regard the creation of a national debt as a great misfortune, which can only be averted by the utmost necessity to meet engagements honestly incurred to support the government, or in defence of the country.

3. Resolved, That congress has no power to lay protective duties, to encourage and aid one branch of industry or pursue it at the expense of others; that discrimination in duties with such a view is but another name for protection, and is unjust and unconstitutional; that in true intent and meaning the compromise repudiates protection, and requires that duties shall be levied for revenue only, and that no more shall be collected than is absolutely required for the economical administration of the government that all duties to be fairly laid, should be upon the equal and ad valorem principle, and if discrimination is made, it should be to take duties of the necessities of life, which will be a great benefit to the laboring classes, and lay them on all luxuries equally which will relieve none.

4. Resolved, That the law establishing a treasury independent of all banks, is in accordance with the constitution, a safe, sound and wise policy, and should not be repealed.

5. Resolved, That the power to incorporate a bank is not only not in the constitution, but was expressly refused to congress; that its establishment will be a wound in the constitution, and inflict a fatal blow upon the best interests of S. Carolina.

6. Resolved, That congress having no authority under the constitution to incorporate a national bank, if such an institution be incorporated, we hold that the charter may at any time be repealed and the bank abolished.

7. Resolved, That we deprecate severally the measures above named, as the mutually dependent of one another, which, if carried into effect, would of the constitution, and must result in heavy calamities to the country; that a national bank especially would be most injurious to the interests of South Carolina; and that no representative of hers can promote its passage, or its establishment, without such bank without the direct sacrifices of her principles, the disregard of her wishes, and in violation of his trust, the imposing upon her the heaviest of misfortunes.

Resolved, That the hon. John C. Calhoun, by his fidelity to South Carolina, his vindication of the constitution and the unwearied zeal and ability with which he has supported the rights and interests of the whole south has preserved unshaken our confidence in the principles and intentions of the people, and won for himself our admiration and gratitude; and that we gladly avail ourselves of this occasion to say to him, well done for the past, and God speed for the future.

DEBATE ON THE LOAN BILL.

From the National Intelligencer.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JULY 8.
The house having resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bayard of Massachusetts, in the chair), on the bill authorizing a loan not exceeding twenty millions of dollars.

Mr. PICKENS rose and addressed the committee during the hour, in urgent opposition to the bill. He did not think, he said, that it was the intention of the committee. He knew how great the disposition was to hurry business through, and he knew that there was a great indignation on the part of the house and the committee to consider such bills as these. During the whole period of his service here, he had been struck with the remarkable fact that on all money questions, upon all bills involving appropriations of the public money, there was much dissension and the committee was raising the ways and means to meet the exigencies and expenses of the government.

We had been taught to believe that nothing was more important in the affairs of government than the taxing power. This might be a prejudice, but, if it was, it had inherited it from our ancestors and from the proud associations of our own time. It had always been considered the test of liberty here and in Great Britain. The bill before the committee, although essentially a bill to borrow money, was in fact, a bill to lay a tax upon the community for the purpose of paying this loan. The great question now was, whether this loan was necessary under existing circumstances; and, if so, the great question for future consideration was, how were we to pay it?

How were we to lay a tax, to raise the means to pay off this loan? Every people had a peculiar criterion by which to judge of liberty; and the English people had always judged of the powers of government by all measures contrary to the maxims of the government. The line which separated the power of government from private property was the line which defined English liberty. And the true real mode by which to judge of the privileges and liberties of a people was to judge of the power they had to restrain taxation by government. It was this consideration which made this bill and others connected with it of the deepest importance to every portion of the tax paying community. He hoped and trusted that gentlemen who were countenanced by these measures would not be considered as acting from any factious desire to thwart the just purposes of government. His own opposition went to all these measures—to the system as a whole. And let not gentlemen get up upon technical or abstract notions. A gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD), the other day had spoken of the ridiculous idea of state authority or state rights. (He, Mr. P.) had known that a proper sense of justice and common sense had denounced as humbuggery that which they had not themselves the faculty to comprehend.

Mr. P. then proceeded to argue that we had a peculiar government, differing from any other of this very point of taxation. That there were no countries which even approached to it in its fiscal operation, except France and Russia; that, owing to our local interests, our extent of territory, and variety of climate, Great Britain could raise two hundred millions by tax, and disburse it over her small territory without producing any material effect on the resources or the national wealth of that country, where we could not raise fifty millions. And it was not to be wondered at, therefore, that to the fiscal necessities of the government, the tendency of which was to make one portion of our territory contribute to the revenue and another to receive it. This was the great difference between the government of Great Britain and the government of Great Britain, and the cause of the power and immense fiscal resources of the latter nation. And here was the fatal error into which gentlemen who sustained this system of measures had fallen; they had taken their example from the government of Great Britain, and English principles and customs, and they attempted to apply it to us—a people totally different in every respect. This argument Mr. P. carried out at some length.

What he said was that gentlemen should pause and consider what they were about. Let them not revive a system which Alexander Hamilton and his associates very patriotically at that time eugured upon our government in its first stages, when they believed the federal government to be the best. But those who now opposed this system of measures did so because they firmly believed that the tendency of them was to injure the country—to produce a full-telling and sectional jealousy, which would ruin the country. By no one had this critical state of our affairs been more loudly or extensively proclaimed to the world than by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS). He had made it known, not only to the people of this country, but he had led the people of England to believe that war with the U. States was inevitable; and so far had this impression been produced, that even our Mediterranean he would resist, but the tendency of these things was to produce the result he had spoken of.

Mr. P. then referred to the attempt to arraign parties, which, he said, had been made yesterday by the chairman of the committee of ways and means, (Mr. FILLMORE). Mr. P. deprecated any effort of the kind, and would say, he said, would the example which had been set in that respect.

The house was now presented in a remarkable attitude before the country. Only two days since, a bill had been passed which took three millions of dollars from the regular revenue, and then immediately afterwards, came the naked proposition to borrow twelve millions of dollars. Did gentlemen suppose that the tax paying portion of the people would not inquire into the matter—that they would not ask why it was that we distributed the revenues of the country with one hand, and with the other laid an additional tax upon the people? Such a proposition never had been presented to a deliberative assembly.

Mr. P. then laid down the proposition that there was not the slightest necessity for a loan at all, and, to sustain this position, examined with great minuteness the report and estimates of the secretary of the treasury made at the present session, comparing them with estimates made by himself, and with a view of ascertaining the reasons for the prospective wants of the treasury were. His calculations had brought him to a result the correctness of which he believed to be demonstrable that no loan was needed.

But Mr. P. contended that, even if the views he had taken of the wants of the government and the means of supplying those wants was not correct, the whig party, it was to be remembered, had come in upon principles of reform, and had not the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SOLLERS), who had said that reform was one of the virtues of the people; and that the representatives of the people were called upon to enter upon their judgment. He (Mr. P.) called upon this house to enter upon its judgment of economy and reform, instead of going further and deeper in public expenditures than any other administration which had preceded this, as it was now proposed to do.

Mr. PICKENS proceeded, in the next place, to point out the expenditure which might, without the least injury to the interest of the government or to the public service, suffer retrenchment. He quoted the report of the secretary of the treasury of December 9, 1840; from it he culled several items of retrenchment. The result, in his opinion, each might be reduced. The result of the first branch of this reduction of particular was a sum to be retrenched amounting to $862,000.

He next went into the items of the Florida war, and the expenditures of congress on these, with a few minor ones in addition, he estimated that there might, without injury, be a saving of four millions.

Mr. P. had gotten thus far in his subject, and was just about to enter into a comparison of the relative advantages of a loan and of treasury notes, when the hour allotted under the new rule to the speech of each member having expired, he was cut short by the chair. He remonstrated loudly and loudly, pronouncing the rule the most abominable regulation that ever was invented by tyranny, and it was not till repeatedly admonished by the chair that he was out of order that he finally took his seat, giving notice that he would, as soon as it should be in order, make a further statement, and introduce a substitute, giving ample means to the treasury, but avoiding the evils of which he complained in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. SPOFFORD next addressed the committee; and said that the reporter could regret that the extreme difficulty of hearing that gentleman; he fears that owing to this circumstance he will be able to present but an imperfect sketch of his argument.

Mr. S. remarked that the late administration had had possession of the treasury since the 1st of January of the 3d of March last, and had gone out of power leaving the government minus to the amount of twelve millions of dollars. This, of course, has been through a mistake—it must have been—for it could not have been the intention of those recently in power that the government should not be carried on; but, as they left it no means to do so, it must of course stop, or go limping and halting miserably along, during the rest of the year—and that during a very critical period in the history of the country. By no one had this critical state of our affairs been more loudly or extensively proclaimed to the world than by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS). He had made it known, not only to the people of this country, but he had led the people of England to believe that war with the U. States was inevitable; and so far had this impression been produced, that even our Mediterranean aquadrant had been notified that, looking to the state of high excitement which prevailed in England as well as on this side of the water, and especially at the high tone of feeling existing in this house, as manifested by the gentleman's report, the idea of avoiding a war was entirely out of the question; and in consequence, they had hastened to get out of the straits of Gibraltar in order to prevent any one from having stopped till the had actually come all the way home. [A laugh.] The country, then, had been, it seemed, on the brink of a war when this mistake had been committed; and it took as the providing no means to meet it, for, by some stop-rock or safety-valve, all this high-pressure excitement had been quickly drawn off, and the unlucky vessel, after running across the entire width of the ocean, had returned quietly back to her station. Mr. S. insisted that this course, on the part of the late administration, could have been nothing but a mistake, for, if the honorable chairman of the committee on foreign relations, (Mr. Pickens) was right, and the country was right in what he had concluded from his report, (and the impression then produced had never been out of sight in England till the disturbance of her own elections at Athens had put it out of her thought), and war had actually been so near at hand, the administration nevertheless had dreamed of the country without an arm of defence, or a dollar to meet the emergency. But what had happened in the meanwhile? A change of administration. And who made it? The people of the United States. How was it made? Under the provisions of the constitution, and what for? Because they chose it; that was a sufficient reason, nor was the sovereign power bound to give any other. The people choose to change the administration, and they did change it; but the country was not changed, or the principles of the country, or the relations between the government and the people. Not at all. These remain just as they had been—the duty on the one hand to provide the ways and means, and the duty on the other to take care of the union. The union was not broken, and the country had had any other; nor would he ever acknowledge any other; and he never would submit to have his country taken from him. And this, he believed, was the sober determination of the people of the nation.

It ever there was a time when all who loved the country were called to hold fast the truth that the union is our country, it was immediately after the utterance to the world of such a report as that of the gentleman, when its language threatened us with war in which every citizen would find the source we possessed must be taxed to the utmost. And what had been the cause of such a mistake as had been committed by the gentleman and his friends in power? He believed, he trusted that it had been for purpose of the country. S. turned to the history of the past. For what had been the history of the past? The ordinary revenue had all been spent, and from six to eight millions a year besides, amounting in all to thirty-one millions.—Where did the money come from? How was this state of things hidden from the people? In the first place, whatever had come into their hands had been used for the purposes of the government, and then came a called session in September, 1837, which ended in giving the power to issue treasury notes. To be sure, there had been one happy result from the exercise of this power; it had been that it had brought the government more in sympathy with the country than any other measure of that administration, for the whole country had been deluged with promissory notes of every possible description; and the government was not only in sympathy with the country, they issued this government paper without delay; and what for! Only to live upon for a few days; that they would have plenty of money to-morrow, and then they would all be paid off. How did it usually fare with the administration of the country? The same plan in his private affairs? He got his note discounted and thought no more of it for the sixty days; in the mean time the money was all spent; and then, when the sixty days were out, he gave a new note and paid the discount. So with the government. At every new batch of treasury notes the same song was sung in the ears of congress: "We only want it for a short time; funds will come in, and all will be right." And thus matters proceeded until the government was issued to the tune of the song of the day. S. then said: Of this amount it had paid, if payment it might be called, twenty two millions, and nine millions remained still outstanding, though five millions had been all that was asked for at first, and that only to meet the irregularity of the yearly income, which was deficient in one part and redundant in the other. What had been the inter-redundant history of the treasury? These issues of treasury notes had been renewed four times—until it was now growing into a habit of the government, and that at a high rate; it should be charged. We had not outlasted at one time, in 1838, no less than ten millions in this treasury paper, and there remained nine millions out still. Was this no public debt? Oh, no. There was no public debt. None at all. It was this new administration which was going to plunge the country into debt. It had been said yesterday about "juggling"; and many a man had juggled himself in this very way. But were the people to be juggled into the belief that they were not in debt when these notes were out for nine millions, but not paid? Was the debt so light because it had but 30 days to run, rather than ten years? No; but the difference between them might be, that in one case the debt hid itself from view.—Under the system of treasury notes to take up treasury notes, the cost of one, of fact, another, it was unknown to the country how much it was in debt at any one time. The debt was kept out of sight, and the people were boldly told that there was no national debt. And then, when a new administration came into power, and, looking into the actual state of the treasury, they found it was in a state of admitting its whole extent, and seeking means whereby to meet and to discharge it, then it was at once said "Oh, this is the new administration that is going into debt; under the good old times we were not in debt." The answer to this is, that the power that their first act is to plunge the nation into debt! Now so far, the treasury note power still survived; a loan only went to change the form of the debt, and, as Mr. S. thought, to change it for the body of the people. That was the danger. And if you do not do as we did." Well, what did you do!—pay the debt? No, you did not. If you had, we should not now have to provide for paying it.—You went in debt, and left your debt to us with no way to pay it. That was the danger. And if the country is in debt under this new administration, whose fault is it? The fault of those stewards who were entrusted with the revenue heretofore. They spent all the revenue, and six or eight millions a year besides.

There is a charge against us comes to this, that finding a debt on hand, we have not chosen to issue our notes for it, but prefer to give a bond. What course can be more open, upright, honest—if the creditor is willing! But in the present case there is no creditor, and we are not to issue a bond to the United States. We are for doing what is right and just, and doing it in such a way as all the people can understand. Here is no log; no mystification; we speak plain English that all can understand, and we have no more to add, judge, at the end of the period for which the bond is run, to whom course is the most manly and the wisest.

Mr. S. said he had had it in view when he rose to notice one or two of the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens) which, on account of the principle they contained, were of much more consequence than the fate of the bill. That gentleman was in the habit, on all occasions, of going back to first principles, as he understood them; principles which, traced to their consequences, struck the root of the union, and at the perpetuity of the constitution. The gentleman's doctrine went to the principles on which alone this government could be administered. If the gentleman was correct, the constitution ought never to have been administered, and he would be entitled to a permanent bill to be adopted in the government of this country; and the union itself is founded in injustice, and ought to be dissolved. What was the gentleman's doctrine, succinctly stated? As Mr. S. understood it, it amounted to this: That all taxes ought to be expended where they were raised. Mr. Pickens here interposed. Oh, no, I did not say that. I said that in a country possessing such an extensive territory, and embracing such diversified resources, the raising of taxes and their expenditure was a vital question. Not that we objected to the raising of taxes, but that the fact of their being raised by a general demand and expended in a particular direction makes us look with great solicitude at the manner in which the revenue is managed. I said that owing to the different views of the British government, that government could more easily raise and expend two hundred millions than we could fifty.

Mr. SEAGRAM resumed. There was a limitation in the power of the constitution. Mr. S. knew of no other. If what Mr. P. now stated, was that the taxes were raised in one place and expended in another, was a valid objection to the raising of taxes, then the constitution ought to be altered.

Mr. PICKENS again explained. He had not urged that as a remedy, but that it should be raised, and why the power to raise them should be watched with zealous care.

Mr. SEAGRAM said it came to the same thing at last: either the gentleman's argument was an argument for a tax or against a tax, or he was not an argument at all. Mr. S. knew that it was not an argument for a tax, therefore it must be against laying taxes, and so an argument out of the constitution and against the constitution. If the fact that taxes being raised in one place and spent in another was an argument against a tax, then it came to this—that all taxes ought to be expended where they were raised. The passage quoted by the gentleman had contained this very objection: "that people out of Virginia had power to tax the people in Virginia."

Mr. PICKENS said he had quoted those words, but not with approbation.

Mr. SEAGRAM reminded the committee that the gentleman had said that this (viz: that taxes raised in one part of the country should be expended in another) was the ground of our controversy with England, and its resistance ended in our independence. Now, Mr. S. would ask any gentleman if he had ever heard or read that this was the ground of our quarrel with England? No; the ground of that quarrel had been that the taxes we were taxed were not represented at all.

Mr. PICKENS. Exactly; that is just what I said. [A laugh.]

Mr. S. said they would soon come to the end of the argument. If this notion was to be preserved, the representative body must be collected from different parts of the union, unless, indeed, one state, from her greater power, or wealth, or patriotism, or bravery, claimed to be herself the representative body. [A laugh.] Then what was next proposed? A large country of this extent could not be a pure democracy, where all the people assemble to consult and to make the laws; they must select through representatives. If free, it must be a representative republic. The representatives must come from different portions of the community, else it would not be a popular government, and they must be in proportion to the number of the people, else it could not be a popular representation. If gentlemen could show that this government ought to represent property, and so to be an aristocracy, or to represent a privileged class and so to be an oligarchy, let them come out boldly and say so, and then their reasons should be examined. But in the mean time, Mr. S. said that the gentleman's argument was an argument against a representative republic; and if it was against a representative republic; and if there could be a greater political heresy imagined, he knew not what it was. Mr. S. was aware that the gentleman did not mean to carry out the consequences of his own principle, but these consequences would not be less clearly, if he intended about to direct his representative body every question involving taxation was assumed to be a ground of reproach and of complaint, not as against its authority or advocate, but as against the constitution itself. (Here a part of what Mr. S. said was lost, as he turned about to direct the remarks to Mr. PICKENS, who sat on the other side.)

Mr. S. said he would quote for the gentleman's benefit a book written in the British Isles, and printed in Scotland; it contained an article which went to show what interpretation was put abroad upon the arguments and sentiments advanced here by southern gentlemen. Mr. S. confessed that in reading it he had been, as much as any man ought to be, excited by witnessing the intemperance with which it spoke. He would not, however, look into a mirror, and there see what consequences were attributed abroad to arguments such as he had now employed. The article was from the last number of the Edinburgh Review, on the republic of Texas, and the gentleman's name was given as the author. It was written by Mr. Kennedy, formerly connected with the British colonial government in Canada, who last subsequently visited the United States, and had then gone to Texas.

Gentlemen all knew that England had recently acknowledged the government of Texas, and that the anti-slavery people in England had been dreadfully shocked at the idea, because they affected to believe that the whole of the late Texian revolution had been based chiefly, if not solely, upon the maintenance of slavery; and that by recognizing such a government England gave countenance to a government founded on slavery. This was an entire mistake; for in the first place the Texian revolution had started out on this principle; and in the second place the republicantine sentiment had never admitted of slavery. It was not going to be a slave country, but was to rely altogether upon free labor. Then there were vast commercial advantages to England to sometimes took place in that house for government appropriations, and the angry feelings which they sometimes produced, was it not to be expected that, if they wished our ruin, their eyes would beam with eager hope to see it accomplished? Doubtless they would. But they were doomed to disappointment; the day had not arrived that was to witness the dissolution of the union of these states. Mr. R. had seen a very learned pamphlet, the aim of which was to demonstrate from geographical considerations, and the directness of climate, that the union could not long continue. Mr. R. was no believer in this sort of geographical logic. How often were those whose geographical relation was precisely the same found at dagger's points with each other, and yet never at war? He spoke in the deep sympathy which bound together the Anglo-Saxon race—in the associations of the past and the common anticipations of the future. These would hold our people firmly together, and he defied the malice or the wit of man to separate them from each other. Notwithstanding all this, however, he did believe that the constitution operated unequally; but if it worked still more unequally, he was not going to give it up. The constitution was precious to him in its permanent principles though it might be unequal in its temporary operation. He made it but what it was intended to be; keep it above all suspicion by the purity of legislative action; let the general government be what it was intended to be, an shield against foreign nations. Do this and union and liberty would long be preserved for our prosperity.

As to what had been said about rivalry between Alabama and South Carolina, Mr. R. did not believe that their interests were in the least degree antagonistic. Let each be content to separate them from each other, and they might long live in harmony and peace. The same was true of the south and the north. Their interests harmonized—the north furnished to the south that best of all markets in the world—a domestic market—nor was there a man at the south who would not infinitely prefer to wear a suit of American manufacture to being dependent for his clothing on any nation on earth. This was their feeling—it pervaded the whole south, but they could not give up their rights—their pride, their interest, their duty alike forbade it. Give us, said Mr. R. the constitution; that is all we ask; but we cannot give up our rights under it, and we will not.

Mr. FESSENDEN expressed his satisfaction at listening to the utterance of such sentiments in such a quiet room. His mind had been greatly relieved by it, but he regretted to find, when the gentleman came to explain that all his attachment to the constitution and the union hung upon this condition, that every body else must adopt his peculiar views of the constitution, and abstain from the exercise of any power concerning which he entertained a doubt. When closely looked at, this was but nullification in another form. However, as the time he had to speak was so very limited, he should not pursue that subject further.

Mr. F. then went into a statistical examination of the grounds on which the bill rested, and spoke in its defence with much earnestness and force of argument. He called for proof in support of the feasibility of the long list of retrenchments which had been presented by Mr. PICKENS. He had all proper respect for that gentleman, but could not accept of his naked opinion as sufficient evidence on a question of this kind. Mr. F. had no patience for that sort of economy which would save money by refusing appropriations of obvious and pressing necessity, which would suffer our fortifications to go to decay, our harbors to remain defenceless, and our navy, to fall into dilapidation, rather than appropriate the money necessary to meet the expense of these great and important public works. Should a war arise, the people would pronounce it a poor and niggardly spirit, which for fear of asking for money necessary to be expended, had left them defenceless to their enemies.

Mr. F. inveighed with warmth against the course of the last administration in suffering a public debt to accumulate, and then denouncing their successors because they brought that debt to view and took measures to pay it. He strongly argued the necessity of a loan showing that there was no reasonable prospect of a speedy increase of revenue—in proof of which he went into an examination of the statistics of government receipts, which would not exceed thirteen and a half millions, while sixteen millions would be wanted to meet the ordinary expenses of government. He went into a comparison of the advantages of a loan and of treasury notes, warmly advocating the former as avoiding all mystification and presenting to the people a true view of their affairs. He scouted the affected horror of gentlemen on the other side at the idea of incurring a national debt while they themselves had created it, hidden it from the eye of the people under perplexed and unintelligible reports from the treasury, and then turned it over as a legacy to the present administration. As to state rights, they were not in the least danger, the representatives of the people would naturally love the rights of their states. He had much greater apprehensions for the rights of congress under the constitution, and had indeed been waiting to hear some strait-laced states rights gentlemen rise up and deny the right of congress to borrow money. The greater danger was from a want of attachment to the general government.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

July 8. Mr. Kerr presented a report of a committee of the general assembly of Maryland on the subject of the public lands, accompanied by a resolution, in effect, that the lands were never conveyed for public revenue, but in trust, for the purposes therein mentioned; and that a grant of the public lands to the states in which they lie would be a usurpation of power which was never conferred on congress. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial from citizens of New York, expressing their opposition to any bill establishing a bankrupt law.

Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial from citizens of Cherry Valley, New York, in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Wright presented a memorial from citizens of Dunkirk, New York, in favor of a bankrupt law. Mr. Smith, of Indiana, chairman of the committee on public lands, moved to take up the house bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption, for the purpose of reference.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the committee on the public lands.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Buchanan calling for the names of persons removed from office since the 4th of March last.

Mr. Linn rose and occupied the morning hour in the discussion of this subject. Mr. L. gave way at the close of the hour, to renew his remarks to-morrow.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Walker moved to amend the bill, by adding to the end of the 17th fundamental rule of the bill a proviso, to the effect "that the cashier of every office of discount or deposits shall, on the first Monday of January of every year, transmit to the president of each house of congress a list of all notes discounted, and of all bills of exchange bought and sold by those offices, together with the names of all drawers and endorsers of said notes, and of all bills of exchange, with the drawers, endorser and acceptors."

Mr. Walker said this amendment was the same in principle as that submitted on another occasion by his colleague, though somewhat different in form.

Mr. King said he entirely agreed with the amendments expressed by the senator from Mississippi, as to the necessity of publicity as a feature of safety, but suggested the propriety of publishing a weekly statement in some paper where the bank is located.

Mr. King was sorry to see congress so divided, and opposed the amendment, and gave his reasons therefor.

The amendment was further advocated by Messrs. Benton, Clay, of Ala. Calhoun, Allen, Culbert and Woodbury.

The question was then taken on Mr. Walker's amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young, 23.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge 22.

Mr. Walker then offered an amendment, to the effect that any ten or more stockholders should have the right to examine into the accounts, &c. of private individuals.

Mr. Buchanan expressed the hope that this amendment, at least, would be assented to.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, Mc-

Roberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Preston, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—23.

Mr. Benton then moved an amendment to the following effect, to come in at the end of the seventeenth fundamental rule:

"That the board of directors and exchange committee, the keeper of the public books, in which are to be entered all notes and bills offered to be discounted, together with the bills of exchange offered to be sold or purchased, the names of drawers and endorsers, the amount of time to run, and whether the same was discounted or purchased, or refused, or the same to be open daily during hours of business, and subject the inspection of the public."

And on this amendment Mr. B. demanded the yeas and nays, which were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young, 23.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—22.

Mr. Walker then moved an amendment to come in at the end of the 17th fundamental rule—the yeas and nays to be taken on the discounts at the bank, and to be entered upon the books, subject to the same inspection.

Mr. Clay thought it wholly unnecessary. The books were open, and the amendment would only have the effect of embarras. In a city like New York, where there might be 400 or 500 notes of a day, what chance would there be for such an operation?

On this amendment a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Sumner, Allen, Walker, Berrien, Bates, Woodbury and others participated, and it was finally so modified, at the suggestion of Mr. Bayard, as to admit of the yeas and nays being taken where any member of the board dissented, and in that shape was adopted.

Mr. Benton alluded to the shameful outrage which, he said, had been perpetrated by the other bank in excluding the government directors. Not only had that been known, but the party sustaining the bank had sustained it afterwards with a full knowledge of all the facts. He would, therefore, move to amend the bill by inserting:

"That no part of the proceedings of the bank, nor any loans, discounts or payments made by it, nor any order given, shall be made or kept secret from the government directors, nor shall said directors be excluded from the free and full participation in all the transactions and business of the institution."

Mr. Berrien would only observe that that was provided for in the bill in the most full and ample manner.

Mr. Benton referred to the experience of the past to show that an infamous outrage had been perpetrated by the other bank, and intimated the ease of the directors known to have been insolently excluded.

Mr. Bayard. Suppose government directors did not attend, were they to be informed of all the proceedings by notes or otherwise? Goodness was to be made by members, and after all the goods thrown around this bill, he did not think any thing was to be apprehended.

Mr. Benton insisted that it was done in the case of the old bank.

Mr. Bayard. Then all I have to say is, that it was a gross abuse and a violation of the spirit of the charter.

Mr. Sevier was clear for making every violation of the charter felony, as they would make the embezzlement of the funds felony.

The question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young, 23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—22.

Mr. Benton then moved to strike out the word "bullion" from the bill. As it stood, it was prohibited from paying out other than gold, silver, bullion or its own notes.

Mr. Huntington said there was nothing in the bill to compel persons to accept bullion. It was at the option of the individual, as it was with regard to the notes.

The question was taken on this amendment, after some further debate, and decided in the affirmative, as follows: yeas 26, nays 21.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said the bill provided that there should be no extension of time given by the bank, on any loan, beyond 180 days, but he had seen enough to know that there was no guard, unless some penalty was attached; and he would therefore move to insert that any contract for renewal or extension of any such loan should be null and void. And that he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. Berrien said the senator could not effect his object in that way. By the phraseology, the contract for renewal only would be void.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. said he would be glad if the senator would make any modification.

Mr. Berrien, smiling—not 1.

The question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Woodbury, Wright, Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrett, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

Mr. Sevier moved an adjournment, but the motion was lost.

After some time went into executive session, and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

July 9. Mr. Porter presented a petition of citizens of Saginaw county, Michigan, praying that the land office may be removed from Flint to Saginaw city.

Also, a remonstrance of citizens of Genesee and other contiguous counties against such removal.

Mr. Tallmadge presented a petition of citizens of New York in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Barrow submitted a resolution calling on the secretary of war for the report of the survey in relation to the removal of the raft in Red river; which was adopted.

Mr. King called up his motion made some days since to reconsider the vote given by yeas and nays, and to the commerce and navigation of the United States to be printed.

A short debate ensued, in which Messrs. King, Huntington, Phelps and Woodbury participated. The motion to reconsider was adopted.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Allen moved to amend the bill so as to provide—
